and thereupon the Court resolved only to arm an hundred Horsemen, and Four hundred Foot, in defence of the City; and to the Letters returned submissive, but dilatory Answers. After some other passages between the Protector and the Lords, Sir Edward Wingfield, Captain of the Guard, was sent from the Lords to Windsor; who so well persuaded the King of the Lords loyal Affection towards him, and of their moderate Intention towards the Protector, that the King was contented to have him presently removed from him, and suffered him within two Days after to be carried to the Tower. In whose absence, seven Lords of the Council, and four Knights, were appointed by turns to wait upon the King's Person; and for Affairs of State, the Government of them was referred to the whole Body of the Council. Soon after were sent to the Protector in the Tower certain Lords of the Council, with Articles against him, requiring his present Answer, whether he would acknowledge them to be true, or else stand upon his Justification. The chief Article was this, That he took upon him the Office of Protector, with express Condition, that he should do nothing in the King's Affairs but by assent of the late King's Executors, or the greatest part of them; and that, contrary to this condition, he had hindered Justice, and subverted Laws of his own Authority, as well by Letters as by other Command; and many other Articles, but all much to this purpose.

Upon his submission he is released, but no more Protector.

Divers Lords
made.

The Protector, whether thinking to speed better by Submission than by contesting, or perhaps finding himself not altogether innocent, (for indeed in so great a Place, who can bear himself with such Sincerity, but he will commit Errors wherewith he may be taxed?) subscribed an Acknowledgment with his own Hand, humbly submitting himself to the King's Mercy, and desiring their Lordships Favour towards him. Upon this Submission, three Months after he had been imprisoned, he was released, entertained, and feasted by the King, and sworn again to be a Privy Councillor, but no more Protector. At which time, between him and the Lords a shew at least of perfect Amity was made; and to make it the more firm, the Duke's Daughter was afterwards married to the Lord Lisle, Son and Heir to the Earl of Warwick; at which Marriage the King was present. And perhaps to honour their Reconciliation and this Marriage, the Earl of Warwick was made Lord Admiral of England; Sir John Russel, Lord Privy Seal, was created Earl of Bedford; the Lord Saint-John was created Earl of Wiltshire, and soon after made Lord Treasurer; Sir William Paget, Comptroller of the King's House, was made Lord Paget; Sir Edward Wingfield, Captain of the Guard, was made Comptroller, and Sir Thomas Darcy was made Captain of the Guard. But of the other side, the Earl of Arundel and the Earl of Southampton were put off from the Council; of whom the Earl of Southampton died shortly after at Lincoln-Place in Holbourn, and was buried in St. Andrew's Church there.

About this time a Parliament was held at Westminster, wherein one Act was made against spreading of Prophecies; another against unlawful Assemblies; but for fear of new Tumults, the Parliament was untimely dissolved, and Gentlemen were commanded to retire to their Country Habitations; and for the same cause also Trinity Term did not hold.

About this time also Pope Paul the Third died, after whose death the Cardinals being divided about the Election of a new Pope, the Imperial part, which was the greatest, gave their Voices for Cardinal Pool; which being told him, he disabled himself, and wished them to chuse one that might be most for the Glory of God, and Good of the Church. Upon this stop, some that were no Friends to Pool, and perhaps looked for the Place themselves, if he were put off, laid many things to his charge; amongst other, that he was not without suspicion of Lutheranism, as having been very conversant with Emanuel Tremellius, and Antonius Flaminus, great Lutherans; and not altogether without blemish of Incontinence, there being a young Nun that was thought to be his Daughter. But of these Criminations Pool so cleared himself, that he was afterwards more importuned to take that place than he was before; and thereupon one Night the Cardinals came unto him, being in Bed, and sent him word they came to adore him, (which is one special kind of electing the Pope.) But he being awaked out of his Sleep, and acquainted with it, made answer, That this was not a work of Darkness, and therefore required them to forbear till the next Day, and then to do as God should put into their Minds. But the Italian Cardinals, attributing this putting-off to a kind of Stupidity and Sloth in Pool, looked no more after him, but the next Day chose Cardinal Montanus Pope, who was afterwards named Julius the Third.

And now the King of France, upon many just Considerations, was grown desirous to have a Peace with England; and thereupon sent one Guidottin, a Florentine, into England, to make some overture of his Desire to the Lords of the Council; who addressing himself to the Earl of Warwick, whom he knew to be most prevalent, so prevailed, that it was concluded four Ambassadors should be sent from the King of England into France, and four from the French King to treat with them. The Commissioners for the English were John Earl of Bedford, William Lord Paget, Sir William Petre, and Sir John Mason, Secretaries of State. For the French, were Monsieur Rocheport, Monsieur Chatillon, Guyllart de Martier, and Rochetelle de Daffie. Much time was spent to agree about a place of meeting; till at last the English, to satisfy the French, were contented it should be before Bullogne, where were many Meetings, and many Differences about Conditions. But in conclusion, a Peace was concluded upon certain Articles, the chief whereof was, That Bullogne, and the Places adjacent should be deliver'd up to the French within six Weeks after the Peace proclaimed; and, that the French should pay for the same Two hundred thousand Crowns within three Days after delivery of the Town, and other Two hundred thousand Crowns upon the Fifth Day of August following. Hostages were on both sides given for performance, and to

to those Articles the French King was sworn at Amiens, and the King of England in London. The Lord Clinton, who had been Deputy at Buloigne, was made Lord-Admiral of England.

Presently after this Agreement, the Duke of Brunswick sent to the King of England, to offer his Service in the King's Wars with Ten thousand Men, and to entreat a Marriage with the Lady Mary, the King's eldest Sister. To his offer of Aid, Answer was made, that the King's Wars were ended; and, touching the Marriage with the Lady Mary, That the King was in speech for her Marriage with the Infanta of Portugal; which if it succeeded not, he should then be favourably heard. Upon this the Emperor's Ambassador demanded of the King, that the Lady Mary might have free exercise of the Mafs; which the King not only constantly deny'd, but thereupon Sermons were exercis'd at the Court, and Order taken, that no Man should have any Benefice from the King, but first he should preach before him. And shortly after, under pretence of preparing for Seammatters, Five thousand Pounds were sent to relieve Protestants beyond the Seas. At this time also an Ambassador came from Gustavus King of Sweden, to enter League with the King for Intercourse of Merchants; and charge was then also given, that the Laws of England should be administer'd in Ireland.

About this time the Queen-Dowager of Scotland, going from France to her Country, passed thro' England, having first obtain'd a safe Conduct: She arriv'd at Portsmouth, and was there met by divers of the English Nobility; conducted to London, she was lodg'd in the Bishop's Palace. After four Days staying, having been feasted by the King at White-hall, she departed, being waited on by the Sheriffs of Counties to the Borders of Scotland. And now was one Stewart, a Scot, apprehended in England, and imprison'd in the Tower, for intending to poison the young Queen of Scots; whom the King deliver'd to the French King upon the Frontiers of Calais, to be by him Justiced at his pleasure.

The Emperor
seeks to get the Lady Mary by stealth out of England.

At this time certain Ships were appointed by the Emperor to transport the Lady Mary, either by violence or by stealth, out of England to Antwerp. Whereupon Sir John Gates was sent with Forces into Essex, where the Lady lay: And besides, the Duke of Somerset was sent with Two hundred Men, the Lord Privy-Seal with other Two hundred, and Mr. Sentleger with Four hundred more, to several Coasts upon the Sea: And the Lord-Chancellor, and Secretary Petre were sent to the Lady Mary, who, after some Conference, brought her to the Lord-Chancellor's House at Lye in Essex, and from thence to the King at Westminster. Here the Council declar'd unto her how long the King had permitted her the Use of the Mafs, and, considering her Obstinacy, was resolv'd now no longer to permit it, unless she would put him in hope of some Conformity in short time. To which she answer'd, That her Soul was God's; and, touching her Faith, as she could not change, so she would not dissemble it. Reply was made, That the King intended not to constrain her Faith, but to restrain the outward profession of it, in regard of the danger the Example might draw. After some like Interchanges of Speeches, the Lady was appointed to remain with the King, when there arriv'd an Ambassador from the Emperor with a threatening Message of War, in case his Cousin the Lady Mary should be denied the free exercise of the Mafs. Hereupon the King presently advis'd with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and with the Bishops of London and Rochester, who gave their Opinion, that to give License to sin, was Sin; but to connive at Sin, might be allow'd, so it were not too long, nor without hope of Reformation. Then Answer was given to the Ambassadors, That the King would send to the Emperor within a Month or two, and give him such Satisfaction as should besit.

And now the King, being uncertain of the Faith both of his Subjects and of his Confederates, intended by Alliance to strengthen himself; and thereupon sent one Barrwick to the King of Denmark, with private Instructions to treat of a Marriage between the Lady Elizabeth, the King's youngest Sister, and the King of Denmark's eldest Son; but when it came to the point, the Lady could not be induced to entertain Marriage with any.

After this, the Marquis of Northampton was sent Ambassador to the French King, as well to present him with the Order of the Garter, as to treat with him of other secret Affairs. With him were joyn'd in Commission the Bishop of Ely, Sir Philip Hobby, Sir William Pickering, Sir John Mason, and Mr. Smith Secretary of State; also the Earl of Worcester, Rutland, and Ormond were appointed to accompany them; as likewise the Lords Liste, Fitzwater, Bray, Abergavenny, and Evers, with other Knights and Gentlemen of note, to the number of Six and twenty: And, for avoiding an immoderate Train, Order was given, that every Earl should have but four Attendants, every Baron but three, every Knight and Gentleman but two, only the Commissioners were not limited to any number.

Being come to the Court of France, they were forthwith brought to the King, he being then in his Bedchamber, to whom the Marquis presented the Order of the Garter, wherewith he was presently invested: Then the Bishop of Ely, in a short Speech, declar'd how the King of England, out of his Love and Desire of Amity, had sent this Order to his Majesty, desiring withal that some Persons might be authorized to treat with them about some other matters of importance: Whereupon a Commission went forth to the Cardinal of Lorraine, Memoranci the Constable, the Duke of Guise, and others. At first the English demanded, that the young Queen of Scots might be sent to England, for perfecting of a Marriage between King Edward and her; but to this the French answer'd, That conclusion had been made long before for her Marriage with the Dauphin of France. Then the English propos'd a Marriage between King Edward and the Lady Elizabeth, the French King's eldest Daughter. To this the French did cheerfully incline; but when they came to talk of Portion, the English demanded at first Fifteen hundred thousand Crowns, then fell to Fourteen, and at last to Eight hundred thousand. The French offer'd at first One hundred thousand Crowns, then rose to Two hundred thousand; and higher they would not be drawn, saying, It was more than ever had been given with a Daughter of France.

Shortly after, Monsieur the Marshal, and other Commissioners, were sent by the French King to deliver to the King of England the Order of St. Michael, and then was further Treaty about the Marriage. And because the French would be scrud no higher than Two hundred thousand Crowns, it was at last accepted, and the Agreement was reduced into Writing, and deliver'd under Seal on both sides.

Earls made.

And now King Edward supposing his State to be most safe, when indeed it was most unsure, in testimony both of his Joy and Love, advanc'd many to New Titles of Honour: The Lord Marquis Dorset, who had married the eldest Daughter of Charles Brandon, was created Duke of Suffolk; the Earl of Warwick, Duke of Northumberland; the Earl of Wiltshire was created Marquis of Winchester; Sir William Herbert, Lord of Cardiffe, and Master of the Horse, was created Earl of Pembroke: Also William Cecil the King's Secretary, John Cheek one of his Schoolmasters, Henry Dudley and Henry Nevil were made Knights; and (which perhaps had never been happy if it had never been) Sir Robert Dudley, one of the Duke of Northumberland's Sons, (the same who was afterward the great Earl of Leicester) was sworn one of the Six ordinary Gentlemen of the King's Chamber: After whose coming into a Place so near about him, the King enjoy'd his Health but a while.

The Duke of Northumberland seeks Accusations against the Duke of Somerset.

The aspiring Thoughts of the Duke of Northumberland were now grown to be put in execution: He was advanc'd in Title of Honour equal with the Highest; in Authority and Power above the Highest: He had placed his politick Son near about the King's Person; the next thing was, to remove the Duke of Somerset out of the Way: And for this also he had prepar'd Instruments, Sir Thomas Palmer, Crane, Hammond, Cecil, and others, who brought several Accusations against the Duke, some trenching upon the King and Kingdom, but one specially against the Duke of Northumberland's Person: Whose Practices when the Duke of Somerset found, and had cause to fear, he went one Day into the Duke of Northumberland's Chamber, with a Purpose to kill him; but finding him in his Bed, and being receiv'd with much kind Compliment by him, his Heart relented, and thereupon came away without any thing done. At his coming out, one of his Company ask'd him if he had done the Deed; he answer'd, No. Then, said he, you are your self undone. And indeed it so fell out; for when all other Accusations were refell'd, This only stuck by him, and could not be deny'd. And so on the First of December he was arraign'd at Westminster, where the Lord William Pawlet, Marquis of Winchester, and Lord-Treasurer, sat as High-Steward of England, and with him Peers to the number of Seven and twenty; the Dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland; the Marquis of Northampton; the Earls of Derby, Bedford, Huntington, Rutland, Bath, Sussex, Worcester, Pembroke, and Hereford; the Barons Abergavenny, Audley, Wharton, Evers, Latimer, Porrough, Zouch, Stafford, Wentworth, Darcey, Sturton, Windsor, Cromwell, Cobham, and Bray.

The Lords being sat, the Indictments were read, in number Five, containing a Charge for raising Men in the North parts of the Realm; and at his House, for assembling Men to kill the Duke of Northumberland; for resisting his Attachment; for raising London; for assaulting the Lords, and devising of their Deaths. To all which he pleaded, Not Guilty; and made a satisfactory Answer to every Point, tho' the King's learned Council press'd them hard against him.

This done, the Lords went together, where Exception was taken by some, as a thing unfit, that the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke, should be of the Jury, seeing the Prisoner was chiefly charg'd with Practices against them. But to this the Lawyers made answer, That a Peer of the Realm might not be challeng'd. So, after much variation of Opinions, the Prisoner was acquitted of Treason, but by most Voices was found guilty of Felony; and that by a Statute lately by his own procurement made, That if any should attempt to kill a Privy-Councillor, altho' the Fact were not done, yet it should be Felony, and be punish'd with Death. But upon his being acquitted of Treason, the Axe at the Tower was presently laid down, which made People conceive he had been acquitted of all; who thereupon for Joy gave so great a Shout, that it was heard as far as Charing-Cross. But the Duke was little the better for being acquitted of Treason, seeing he was found guilty of Felony, and had Judgment to die. It is thought by some, he might have sav'd his Life, if he had demanded his Clergy; but it is rather thought that in that Statute Clergy was deny'd. Two Months after his Condemnation, (much against the King's Will) he was brought to the Tower-hill to Execution; where, being ascended the Scaffold, he enter'd into a Speech, wherein tho' he justified himself for any matter tending to the Hurt of the King or Kingdom, yet he confess'd he was justly by the Law brought to his Death, and thank'd God, that had given him so large a time of Repentance; especially, that He had open'd his Eyes, to see clearly the Light of the Gospel: And going on in his Speech, a sudden Noise arose of some crying, Away, away; which made some think a Pardon had been come; but it was indeed the Voice of some that had been warn'd to be at the Execution, and were come somewhat late. But the Tumult being appeased, the Duke went on with his Speech; and at last commending his Soul to God, with a Countenance not shewing any sign of Fear or Perturbation, only his Cheeks a little redder than they used to be, he peaceably laid down his Head upon the Block, and in a moment, with one stroke of the Axe had it stricken off.

The death of this Duke made the Duke of Northumberland more odious to the People than he was before; and there were some that dipped Handkerchiefs in his Blood, and kept them to upbraid the Duke of Northumberland withal, when he came himself afterward to the like end. After execution of the Duke, Sir Ralph Vane and Sir Miles Partridge were hanged at Tower-Hill, Sir Michael Stanhope and Sir Thomas Arundel were there beheaded.

George Ferrers
Lord of Misrule at Christmas.

After the Duke's Condemnation, it was thought fit to have something done for averting the King's Mind from taking thought; and to that end, one George Ferrers, a Gentleman of Lincoln's-Inn, was appointed in the Christmas-time to be Lord of Misrule; who so carried himself, that he gave great Delight to many, and some to the King, but not in proportion to his Heaviness.

A call of Serjeants.

About this time was a call of seven Serjeants at Law, who kept their Feast at Grays-Inn, of whom Mr. Robert Brook, Recorder of London, was the first; and the next Mr. Dyer, who was chosen Speaker the next Parliament.

The Lord Paget hath the Garter taken from him, and why.

About this time also the Lord Paget was committed to the Tower, for what cause is not certain; and being a Knight of the Order, his Garter was taken from him by Garter King at Arms, upon this pretence, that he was said to be no Gentleman, either by Father or Mother; and the Garter was then bestowed on the Earl of Warwick, the Duke of Northumberland's eldest Son. And the Lord Rich, Lord Chancellor, was put off from his Place, and the Seal then delivered to Dr. Thomas Goodrick Bishop of Ely.

Sebastian Cabot sent to discover a Passage to the East-Indies.

About this time also three great Ships were set forth at the King's Charge, for discovery of a Passage to the East-Indies by the North-Seas. The chief Pilot and Director in this Voyage was one Sebastian Cabot, an Englishman, born at Bristol, but the Son of a Genovese. These Ships at the last arrived in the County of Muscovia, but not without the loss of their Captain Sir Hugh Willoughby, who being tossed and driven by Tempest, was afterwards found in his Ship frozen to death, and all his People.

Sir Hugh Willoughby frozen to death.

At this time also the Duke of Suffolk's three Daughters, which he had by Frances, Daughter of Charles Brandon and Mary Queen of France, were married at Durham-House: The eldest, Jane, to the Lord Gilsford Dudley, fourth Son to the Duke of Northumberland; the second, Katherine, to Henry, Son and Heir to the Earl of Pembroke; the youngest, Mary, being somewhat deform'd, to Martin Keyes, the King's Gentleman-Porter. And then also Katherine, the Duke of Northumberland's youngest Daughter, to the Lord Hastings, eldest Son of the Earl of Huntington. And now had the Duke of Northumberland gone a great way in his Design: It remain'd to persuade King Edward to exclude his two Sisters from Succession in the Crown; for that done, his Daughter-in-law, the Lady Jane, would come to have a Right. For as for pretenders out of Scotland, or any other, he made no great matter. And now to work the King to this Persuasion, (being in a languishing Sickness not far from death) he inculcates to him, how much it concern'd him to have a care of Religion, that it might be preserved in Purity, not only in his own Life, but as well after his Death, which would not be, if his Sister the Lady Mary should succeed; and she could not be put by, unless her other Sister, the Lady Elizabeth, were put by also, seeing their Rights depended one upon another. But if he pleas'd to appoint the Lady Jane, the Duke of Suffolk's eldest Daughter, and his own next Kinswoman to his Sisters, to be his Successor, he might then be sure that the True Religion should be maintain'd, to God's great Glory, and be a worthy Act of his own Religious Providence. This was to strike upon the right String of the young King's Affection, with whom nothing was so dear as the preservation of Religion; and thereupon his last Will was appointed to be drawn (contriv'd chiefly by the Lord Chief Justice Montague, and Secretary Cecil) by which Will, as far as in him lay, he excluded his two Sisters from the Succession, and all other but the Duke of Suffolk's Daughters. And then causing it to be read before his Council, he requir'd them all to assent unto it, and to subscribe their Hands; which they all, both Nobility, and Bishops, and Judges did. Only the Archbishop Cranmer refus'd at first; Sir James Hales, a Judge of the Common-Pleas, to the last; and with them also Sir John Baker, Chancellor of the Exchequer. And now remained nothing for the Duke of Northumberland's Purpose, but that the King should die; which soon after he did at Greenwich, the sixth of July, in the Year 1553. One Point of the Duke's Policy must not be forgotten, that fearing what Troubles the Lady Mary might raise after the King's decease, if she should be at liberty, he therefore, seeing the King drawing on, us'd all means possible to get her within his Power; to which end Letters are directed to her in the King's Name from the Council, willing her forthwith to repair to the King, as well to be a Comfort to him in his Sickness, as to see all Matters well order'd about his Person. Whereupon the Lady, suspecting nothing, address'd herself with all speed to the Journey; till being upon the Way, she was advertis'd of the Duke's Design; and she returned to her House at Hovesdon, and so escaped the Snare: By whose escape the whole Design of the Duke of Northumberland was disappointed; as soon after will be seen.

Of his Taxations.

IN no King's Reign were ever more Parliaments for the Time, nor fewer Subsidies; the greatest was in his last Year, when yet there was but one Subsidy, with two Fifteens and Tenths, granted by the Temporality, and a Subsidy by this Clergy. And indeed, to shew how loth the King was to lay Impositions upon his People this may be a sufficient Argument; and that though he were much in debt, yet he chose rather to deal with the Foulket in the Low-Countries for Money upon Loan, at the Interest of fourteen Pounds for a Hundred for a Year. But his ways for raising of Money were, by selling selling of Chantry-Lands and Houses, given him by Parliament; and by enquiring after all Church-Goods, either remaining in Cathedral and Parish-Churches, or embezzled away, as Jewels, Gold and Silver Chalice, ready Money, Copes, and other Vestments; reserving to every Church one Chalice, and one Covering for the Communion-Table, the rest to be applied to his Benefit. He also raised Money by enquiring after Offenders of Offices in great Places; in which enquiry one Beaumont, Master of the Rolls, being convicted of many Crimes, surrendered all his Offices, Lands and Goods into the King's Hands. Also one Whaley, Receiver of Torkshire, being found a Delinquent, surrendered his Office, and paid a great Fine besides. Also the Lord Paget, Chancellor of the Dutchy, convicted that he had sold the King's Lands and Timber-wood without Commission, and had applied the King's Fines to his own Use, for these and other Offences surrender'd his Office, and was fined at Four thousand Pounds, which he paid in hand. One thing more was done in his time for raising of Money; Twenty thousand pounds weight of Bullion was appointed to be made so much baser, that the King might gain thereby a hundred and forty thousand Pounds.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

IN his third Year a Parliament was holden, wherein one Act was made against spreading of Prophecies; another against unlawful Assemblies. In his fourth Year a Parliament was holden, wherein Priests Children were made legitimate; and Usury for Loan of Money was forbidden. In his fifth Year it was ordain'd, that the Law of England should be admitted in Ireland; and a King at Arms, named Ulster, was newly instituted for Ireland, whose Province was all Ireland; and he was the first fourth King at Arms, and first Herald appointed for Ireland. Also in his fifth Year base Monies formerly coined were cried down; so as the Shilling went but for Nine-pence, and shortly after but for Six-pence; the Groat but for Three-pence, and shortly after but for Two-pence.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

IN the first Year of this King's Reign, Injunctions were set forth for pulling down and removing all Images out of Churches, also certain Homilies were appointed to be made by learned Men, to be read in Churches, for the Peoples Instruction. And at Easter this Year it was order'd, That the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper should be ministr'd to the Lay-people in both kinds. Also Marriage was allowed to Clergy-men; Auricular Confession and Prayer for the Dead were forbidden. And it is observable, That the very same Day that Images were pull'd down at London, the great Overthrow was given to the Scots at Musselborough. Also at this time, by the Archbishop Cranmer's means, divers learned Protestants came over into England, and had here Entertainment, as Peter Martyr, Martin Bucer, and Paulus Fagius; of whom

Peter Martyr was sent to read a Divinity Lecture in Oxford, Bucer and Fagius in Cambridge. In this King's fourth Year all Altars in Churches were commanded to be taken down, and Tables placed in their rooms. In his fifth Year the Book of Common-Prayer was establish'd.

Casualties happening in his Time.

IN his second Year St. Ann's Church within Aldersgate was burnt. In his fifth Year a Sweating-sickness infested first Shrewsbury, and then the North Parts, and afterwards grew most extreme in London, so as in the first Week there died Eight hundred Persons; and was so violent that it took Men away in four and twenty Hours, sometimes in twelve, and sometimes in less. Amongst others of Account that dy'd of this Sickness, were the two Sons of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, who died within an Hour after one another, in such order that both of them died Dukes. This Disease was proper to the English Nation, for it follow'd the English wheresoever they were in foreign Parts, but seiz'd upon none of any other Country. In this Year one Mr. Arden of Kent, by procurement of his Wife, was murder'd in his own House; being dead, his Body was carried out, and laid upon the Ground in a Close hard by: Where this is memorable, that for two Years after, the Ground where his Body lay bore no Grass, but represented still as it were a Picture of his Body, only in the space between his Legs and Arms there grew Grass, but where any part of his Body touched, none at all. Yet this Miraculous Accident was not so much for the Murder, as for the Curses of a Widow-woman, out of whose Hands the said Mr. Arden had uncharitably bought the said Close, to her undoing. And thus the Divine Justice, even in this World oftentimes, works Miracles upon Offenders, for a merciful Warning to Men, if they would be so wise to take it. In his sixth Year the third of August, at Middleton-stony, eleven Miles from Oxford, a Woman brought forth a Child which had two perfect Bodies from the Navel upward, the Legs for both the Bodies grew out at the midst where the Bodies joyn'd, and it had but one issue for the Excrements of them both; they liv'd eighteen Days, and were Women-children. This Year also were taken at Queenborough three Dolphins, and at Black-Wall six more, the least of which was bigger than any Horse.

Works of Piety done by him, or others in his Time.

THIS King gave three Houses to the Relief of the Poor: First, for the Fatherless and Beggar-Children, he gave the late Gray-Fryers, in London, which is now call'd Christ's Hospital. Then for lame and diseased Persons, he gave the Hospital of St. Thomas in Southwark, and St. Bartholomew's in West-Smithfield. Thirdly, For riotous and idle Persons he gave his House of Bridewell: And for their Maintenance, he took Six hundred Pounds a Year Land from the House of the Savoy, (which had been long abus'd) and bestow'd it upon these Houses; to which

which he added Four thousand Marks a Year more. By his example Sir William Chester, Alderman of London, and John Calthrope Draper, at their own costs, made the Brick-Walls and Way on the Back-side that leadeth to the Hospital of St. Bartholomew, and also cover'd and vaulted the Town-Ditch, which before was very noisome. In the Second Year of this King, Sir John Gresham, then Mayor of London, founded a Free-School at Holt in Norfolk: Also at his decease he gave to every Ward in London Ten Pounds, to be distributed among the Poor; and to Maids Marriages Two hundred Pounds. In his third Year Sir Rowland Hill, the then Lord-Mayor of London, caus'd to be made a Cawsey, commonly call'd Overlane Pavement, in the Highway from Stone to Nantwich, in length four miles, for the ease of Horse and Man. He caus'd also a Cawsey to be made from Dunchurch in Warwickshire more than two miles in length; and gave Twenty pounds towards the making of Rieton Bridge, three miles from Coventry. He made likewise the Highway to Kilburn, near to London: Also four Bridges, two of them of Stone, containing eighteen Arches in them both, the one over the River of Severn, call'd Acham Bridge; the other, Terne Bridge; and two other of Timber at Stoke, where he built also a good part of the Church. A Free-School likewise he built at Drayton in Shropshire, with Master and Usher, and gave sufficient Stipends to them both. Also he purchas'd a free Fair to the said Town, with a free Market weekly; and every fourteen Days a free Market for Cattle. Besides all this, he gave to the Hospital of Christ Church in London in his Lifetime Five hundred pounds, and at his Death One hundred. In this King's fourth Year Sir Andrew Jud, Mayor of London, founded a notable Free-School at Tunbridge in Kent, and gave Threescore pounds Land a year to the Skinners of London, for which they be bound to pay Twenty pounds to the Schoolmaster, and Eight pounds to the Usher of his Free-School at Tunbridge yearly for ever. In his sixth Year Sir George Barnes, who was Mayor of London, gave a Windmill in Finsbury-fields to the Haberdashers of London, the Profits thereof to be distributed to the Poor of that Company: Also to St. Bartholomews the Little, certain Tenements to the like Use.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

Concerning his Personage it is said, he was of Body beautiful, of a sweet Aspect, and especially in his Eyes, which seem'd to have a Starry liveness and lustre in them. Concerning his Conditions in Matter of Fact, there is not much to be said, but in Matter of Disposition and Inclination very much, even to admiration; for tho' his Tree was not yet come to the maturity of bearing Fruit, yet it was come to the forwardness to bear plenty of Buds and Blossoms. For proof of his merciful Disposition, this one Example may be sufficient: When one Joan Butcher was to be burnt for Blasphemy and Heresie, all the Council could not get him to sign the Warrant, till the Archbishop Cranmer, with much Importunity, persuaded him, and then he did it, but not without weeping.

For his Pregnancy of Wit, and knowledge in all kinds of Learning, we shall need but to hear what Cardan (who coming into England, had often Conference with him) reporteth of him, That he was extraordinarily skilful in Languages, and in the Politicks, well seen in Philosophy and in Divinity, and generally indeed a very Miracle of Art and Nature. He would answer Ambassadors sometimes upon the sudden, either in French or Latin. He knew the state of foreign Princes perfectly, and his own more. He could call all Gentlemen of account thro' his Kingdom by their Names: And all this when he had scarce yet attain'd to the age of Fifteen Years, and died before Sixteen; that from hence we may gather, 'tis a sign of no long Life, when the Faculties of the Mind are ripe so early.

Of his Death and Burial.

IN the Sixth Year of his Reign, which was the Year before he died, he fell sick of the Measles; and being well recover'd of them, he fell soon after into the Small-Pox; and of them also was so well recover'd, that the Summer following he rode a Progress with a greater Magnificence than ever he had done before, having in his Train no fewer than Four thousand Horse.

In January following (whether procur'd by sinister Practice, or growing upon him by natural Infirmary) he fell into an Indisposition of Body, which soon after grew to a Cough of the Lungs: Whereupon a Rumour was spread abroad by some, that a Nofegay had been given him at Newyears-tide, which brought him into this slow, but deadly Consumption; by others, that it was done by a Glyster. However it was, he was brought at last to so great extremity, that his Physicians despair'd of his Life: And when Physicians could do him no good, a Gentlewoman (thought to be prepar'd for the Purpose) took him in hand, and did him hurt; for with her Applications his Legs swell'd, his Pulse fail'd, his Skin chang'd colour, and many other Symptoms of approaching Death appear'd. The Hour before his Death he was overheard to pray thus by himself: O Lord God! deliver me out of this miserable and wretched Life. O Lord, thou know'st how happy it were for me to be with thee; yet, for thy Chosen's sake, if it be thy will, send me Life and Health, that I may truly serve thee. O Lord God! save thy chosen People of England, and defend this Realm from Popery, and maintain thy True Religion, that I and my People may praise thy Holy Name, for thy Son Jesus Christ's sake. So turning his Face, and seeing some by him, he said, I thought you had not been so nigh. Yes, said Dr. Owen, we heard you speak to your self. Then said the King, I was praying to GOD. O! I am faint, Lord, have Mercy upon me, and receive my Spirit: And on so saying he gave up the Ghost, on the 6th Day of July, in the Year 1553, and in the sixteenth Year of his Age, when he had reign'd six Years, five Months, and nine Days.

selling of Chantry-Lands and Houses, given him by Parliament; and by enquiring after all Church-Goods, either remaining in Cathedral and Parish-Churches, or embezzled away, as Jewels, Gold and Silver Chalice, ready Money, Copes, and other Vestments; reserving to every Church one Chalice, and one Covering for the Communion-Table, the rest to be applied to his Benefit. He also raised Money by enquiring after Offenders of Offices in great Places; in which enquiry one Beaumont, Master of the Rolls, being convicted of many Crimes, surrendered all his Offices, Lands and Goods into the King's Hands. Also one Whaley, Receiver of Turksbire, being found a Delinquent, surrendered his Office, and paid a great Fine besides. Also the Lord Paget, Chancellor of the Duchy, convicted that he had sold the King's Lands and Timber-wood without Commission, and had applied the King's Fines to his own Use, for these and other Offences surrender'd his Office, and was fined at Four thousand Pounds, which he paid in hand. One thing more was done in his time for raising of Money; Twenty thousand pounds weight of Bullion was appointed to be made so much baser, that the King might gain thereby a hundred and forty thousand Pounds.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

IN his third Year a Parliament was holden, wherein one Act was made against spreading of Prophecies; another against unlawful Assemblies. In his fourth Year a Parliament was holden, wherein Priests Children were made legitimate; and Usury for Loan of Money was forbidden. In his fifth Year it was ordain'd, that the Law of England should be admitted in Ireland; and a King at Arms, named Ulster, was newly instituted for Ireland, whose Province was all Ireland; and he was the first fourth King at Arms, and first Herald appointed for Ireland. Also in his fifth Year base Monies formerly coined were cried down; so as the Shilling went but for Nine-pence, and shortly after but for Six-pence; the Groat but for Three-pence, and shortly after but for Two-pence.

Affairs of the Church in his Time.

IN the first Year of this King's Reign, Injunctions were set forth for pulling down and removing all Images out of Churches, also certain Homilies were appointed to be made by learned Men, to be read in Churches, for the Peoples Instruction. And at Easter this Year it was order'd, That the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper should be ministr'd to the Lay-people in both kinds. Also Marriage was allowed to Clergy-men; Auricular Confession and Prayer for the Dead were forbid'd. And it is observable, That the very same Day that Images were pull'd down at London, the great Overthrow was given to the Scots at Musselborough. Also at this time, by the Archbishop Cranmer's means, divers learned Protestants came over into England, and had here Entertainment, as Peter Martyr, Martin Bucer, and Paulus Fagius; of whom

Peter Martyr was sent to read a Divinity Lecture in Oxford, Bucer and Fagius in Cambridge. In this King's fourth Year all Altars in Churches were commanded to be taken down, and Tables placed in their rooms. In his fifth Year the Book of Common-Prayer was establish'd.

Casualties happening in his Time.

IN his second Year St. Ann's Church within Aldersgate was burnt. In his fifth Year a Sweating-sickness infested first Shrewsbury, and then the North Parts, and afterwards grew most extreme in London, so as in the first Week there died Eight hundred Persons; and was so violent that it took Men away in four and twenty Hours, sometimes in twelve, and sometimes in less. Amongst others of Account that dy'd of this Sickness, were the two Sons of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, who died within an Hour after one another, in such order that both of them died Dukes. This Disease was proper to the English Nation, for it follow'd the English wheresoever they were in foreign Parts, but seiz'd upon none of any other Country. In this Year one Mr. Arden of Kent, by procurement of his Wife, was murder'd in his own House; being dead, his Body was carried out, and laid upon the Ground in a Close hard by: Where this is memorable, that for two Years after, the Ground where his Body lay bore no Grass, but represented still as it were a Picture of his Body, only in the space between his Legs and Arms there grew Grass, but where any part of his Body touched, none at all. Yet this Miraculous Accident was not so much for the Murder, as for the Curses of a Widow-woman, out of whose Hands the said Mr. Arden had uncharitably bought the said Close, to her undoing. And thus the Divine Justice, even in this World oftentimes, works Miracles upon Offenders, for a merciful Warning to Men, if they would be so wise to take it. In his sixth Year the third of August, at Middleton-stony, eleven Miles from Oxford, a Woman brought forth a Child which had two perfect Bodies from the Navel upward, the Legs for both the Bodies grew out at the midst where the Bodies joyn'd, and it had but one issue for the Excrements of them both; they liv'd eighteen Days, and were Women-children. This Year also were taken at Queenborough three Dolphins, and at Black-Wall six more, the least of which was bigger than any Horse.

Works of Piety done by him, or others in his Time.

THIS King gave three Houses to the Relief of the Poor: First, for the Fatherless and Beggar-Children, he gave the late Gray-Fryers, in London, which is now call'd Christ's Hospital. Then for lame and diseased Persons, he gave the Hospital of St. Thomas in Southwark, and St. Bartholomew's in West-Smithfield. Thirdly, For riotous and idle Persons he gave his House of Bridewell: And for their Maintenance, he took Six hundred Pounds a Year Land from the House of the Savoy, (which had been long abus'd) and bestow'd it upon these Houses; to which

'Tis observ'd by some, that he died the same Month, and the same Day of the Month, that his Father King Henry the Eighth had put Sir Thomas Moor to Death. His Body was buried upon the Ninth of August, in the Chapel of St. Peter's Church in Westminster, and laid near to the Body of King Henry the Seventh, his Grandfather.

At his Funeral, which was on the Tenth of August following, his Sister Queen Mary shew'd this Respect to him, that tho' Dr. Day, a Popish Bishop, preach'd, yet all the Service, with a Communion, was in English.

THIS King's Reign being short, and having but small Wars, had not many Swordmen famous for any Acts they did. Gownmen there were some; as, Edward Hall, a Counsellor in the Law, who wrote a notable Chronicle of the Union of the two Houses of York and Lancaster; William Hugh, a Yorkshire Man, who wrote a notable Treatise, call'd The Troubled Man's Medicine; Thomas Sternhold, born in Southampton, who turn'd into English Metre Thirty-seven of David's Psalms.

The Interregnum between the Death of King Edward, and the Proclaiming at London of Queen Mary.

The Duke of Northumberland bears all the sway. He causes both the Mayor and Aldermen to swear Allegiance to the Lady Jane,

KING Edward being dead, the Duke of Northumberland took upon him to sit at the Stern, and order'd all things at his pleasure. So, two Days after, he, with others of the Council, sent to the Lord-Mayor, that he, with six of the Aldermen, and twelve principal Commons, should repair presently to the Court; to whom when they came, 'twas signified that King Edward was dead; and, that by his last Will, to which all the Nobility and Judges had given assent, he had appointed the Lady Jane, Daughter to the Duke of Suffolk, to succeed him, his Letters-Patents whereof were shew'd them; and thereupon they were requir'd to take their Oaths of Allegiance to the Lady Jane, and to secure the City in her behalf; which, whether dissemblingly or sincerely, whether for Love or Fear, yet they did, and departed. The next Day the Lady Jane, in great state, was brought to the Tower of London, and there declar'd Queen; and by Edict with the sound of Trumpet proclaim'd so thro' London. At which time, for some Words seeming to be spoke against it, one Gilbert Pot, a Vintner's Servant, was set in the Pillory, and lost both his Ears.

The Lady Mary rides post into Norfolk.

Takes upon her the Name of Queen, and is assisted by the Norfolk Men, upon her Promise not to alter Religion.

Before this time, the Lady Mary having heard of her Brother's Death, and of the Duke of Northumberland's Designs, remov'd from Hovesdon to her Mannor of Kenninghall in Norfolk, and under pretence of fearing Infection, (having lately lost one of her Household-servants of the Plague) in one Day she rode forty miles, and from thence afterward to her Castle at Framlingham in Suffolk; where taking upon her the name of Queen, there resorted to her the most part of the Gentlemen both of Norfolk and Suffolk, offering their Assistance, but upon condition she would make no alteration in Religion; to which she condescended. And thereupon soon after came to her the Earls of Oxford, Bath, and Sussex, the Lord Wentworth, Thomas Wharton, and John Mordaunt, Barons eldest Sons; and of Knights, Cornwallis, Drury, Walgrave, Shelton, Benningfield, Ferningham, Sulliard, Fresken, and many others. The Lady Mary being thus assisted, wrote her Letter, sign'd the 9th of July, to the Lords of the Council, wherein she claim'd the Crown, as of Right belonging to her, and requir'd them to proclaim her Queen of England in the City of London, as they tender'd her Displeasure.

To this Letter of hers the Lords answer'd, That for what they did they had good Warrant, not only by King Edward's last Will, but by the Laws of the Land, considering her Mother's Divorce, and her own Illegitimation, and therefore required her to submit her self to Queen Jane, being now her Sovereign. This Letter was written from the Tower of London, under the Hands of these that follow, Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Ely Chancellor, William Marquis of Winchester, John Earl of Bedford, Henry Duke of Suffolk, Francis Earl of Shrewsbury, John Duke of Northumberland, William Earl of Pembroke, Thomas Lord Darcy Lord-Chamberlain, Cobham, Rich, Huntington, Cheyney, John Gates, William Petre, William Cecil, John Clark, Mason, Edward North, and Robert Bowes. The Quarrel on both sides being thus begun by Letters, is prosecuted by Arms; and the Lords for their General made choice of the Duke of Suffolk, as a Man most likely to be firm and sure in the Employment. But the Queen, his Daughter, cannot miss his Presence, and besides, is not willing to hazard his Person; and thereupon, she by Entreaties, and the Lords by Persuasions, prevail with the Duke of Northumberland to undertake the Charge; who, before his going, having Conference with the Lords, let them know how sensible he was of the double Danger he underwent in this Enterprize, both in respect of the Lady against whom he went, and in respect of them whom he left behind him; for if they in his absence should by any Accident be drawn to waver in their Resolution, they might work their own Safety with his Destruction, and make themselves seem innocent in his guiltiness. To which one of the Lords reply'd, and said, Your Grace makes a Doubt of that which cannot be; for, Which of us all can wash his Hands clean of this Business? And thereof it behoves us to be as resolute as your self. And the Earl of Arundel,

Arundel to testify his Resolution in the matter, said, he was sorry it was not his chance to go with him, at whose Feet he could find in his Heart to spend his Blood. So the Duke, with the Marquiss of Northampton, the Lord Gray, and divers others of account, on the fourteenth of July set forward on the Journey with eight thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; and passing through Shoreditch, the Duke said to the Lord Gray, See how the People press to see us, but not one of them saith, God speed you. The Duke had every Day's March, how far he should go, appointed by the Commission; which being very slow, whether it were done on purpose by some that favour'd the Lady Mary's side, was certainly a great help to her Proceedings; for by this means she had the longer time to make her Preparations. And indeed in this time two Accidents happen'd of great benefit to her: One, that Edward Hastings, the Earl of Huntington's Brother, having an Army of Four thousand Foot committed to him by the Duke of Northumberland, he now left his Party, and went to the Lady Mary: The other, that six great Ships which lay before Yarmouth, to intercept the Lady Mary, if she should attempt to fly, now at the perswasion of Mr. Ferningham came to her aid. Which two Revolts so terrified the Londoners, that though Dr. Ridley, Bishop of London, on the sixteenth of July, at Paul's Cross, preach'd a Sermon, wherein he invited the People to stand firm to Queen Jane, whose Cause he affirm'd to be most just, yet few or none were perswaded by him; so as the Lords themselves fell off from the Side; who assembling at Baynard's Castle, first the Earl of Arundel, then the Earl of Pembroke fell to Invectives against the Duke of Northumberland; and then all the Lords joyning in Opinion with them, they call'd for the Mayor, and in London proclaim'd the Lady Mary Queen; as likewise the Lord Windsor, Sir Edmund Peckham, Sir Robert Drurie, and Sir Edward Hastings did in Buckinghamshire; Sir John Williams of Tame and Sir Leonard Chamberlain in Oxfordshire, and Sir Thomas Tresham in the County of Northampton. All this came to the knowledge of the Duke of Northumberland, being then at Bury; who thereby seeing how the World went, thought it his best Course to turn with the Stream; and thereupon returning to Cambridge, he took the Mayor of the Town with him into the Market-place, and there himself, for want of a Herald, proclaim'd the Lady Mary Queen, and in sign of Joy threw up his Cap: Which yet serv'd not his turn; for the next Morning, Henry Fitz-Allen, Earl of Arundel, came into Cambridge from Queen Mary; who entering his Chamber, the Duke at his Feet fell on his Knees, desiring him for God's Love to consider his Case, that had done nothing but by Warrant of him and the Council. My Lord, (saith the Earl) I am sent hither by the Queen to Arrest you. And I (saith the Duke) obey your Arrest; yet I beseech your Lordship to use Mercy towards him, whose Acts have been no other than were enjoyn'd by Commission. You should have thought of that sooner, (saith the Earl) and thereupon committed him to a Guard, and left him to the Queen's Mercy. Thus ended all this great Duke's Designs in his own Destruction, and brought him to fall on his Knees to them who had often before bowed their Knees to him: And the Earl, who at the Duke's going out could have been contented to spend his Blood at his Feet, was now contented to be made an Instrument of his Fall. So sudden are the Turns of Mens Affections, and so unstable is the building upon their Asseverations; at least no Man must look to have his Case be of any weight against him who hath his own Case put in the Ballance. Together with the Duke, his three Sons, John, Ambrose and Henry, the Earl of Huntington, Sir Andrew Dudley, the two Gates's, John and Henry, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Dr. Sands, were convey'd towards London, and brought to the Tower; and the next Day the Marquiss of Northampton, the Lord Robert Dudley, and Sir Robert Corbet. Before which time the Duke of Suffolk, entering his Daughter's the Lady Jane's Chamber, told her, She must now put off her Royal Robes, and be contented with a private Life. To which she answer'd, She would much more willingly put them off than she had put them on; and would never have done it, but in Obedience to him and her Mother. And this was the End of the Lady Jane's ten Days Reign.

THE REIGN OF QUEEN MARY.

1553.
The Lady Mary having been proclaim'd Queen, comes to London, and so to the Tower.

Where she sets divers Lords at liberty.

And restores the Bishops who had been depriv'd.

THE Lady Mary having been proclaim'd Queen in London, and other parts of the Realm, remov'd from her Castle of Framlingham towards London; and being come to Wansted in Essex, on the thirtieth of July, the Lady Elizabeth her Sister, with a Train of a thousand Horse, rode from her Palace in the Strand to meet her. On the third of August the Queen rode through London to the Tower; where at her Entrance were presented to her Thomas Duke of Norfolk, Edward Lord Courtney, Stephen Gardiner, late Bishop of Winchester, and the Dutchess of Somerset, who all kneeling down, she kiss'd them, and said, These be my Prisoners, and then caused them presently to be set at liberty. The next Day she restored the Lord Courtney to the Marquisate of Exeter; and the same Day also she not only restored Stephen Gardiner to his Bishoprick of Winchester, but a few Days after made him Chancellor of England: Yet this was the Man that had subscribed to her Mother's Divorce, and had written Books against the Lawfulness of her Marriage. The fifth of August, Edmund Bonner, late Bishop of London, Prisoner in the Marshalsea, and Cuthbert Tonstal the old Bishop of Durham, Prisoner in the King's-Bench, had their Pardons, and were restored to their Sees. Shortly after, all the Bishops that had been depriv'd in the Time of Edward the Sixth; were restored to their Bishopricks, and the New remov'd: As Ridley was remov'd from London, and Bonner plac'd; Scory from Chichester, and Day plac'd; Miles Coverdale from Exeter, and West plac'd; John Hooper from Worcester, and Heath plac'd. Also all Beneficed Men that were married, or could not renounce their Religion, were put out of their Livings, and others of a contrary Opinion put in their rooms.

On the thirtieth of August, one Mr. Bourne a Canon of Paul's, Preaching at Paul's Cross, not only pray'd for the Dead, but also declar'd, That Dr. Bonner Bishop of London, (late restored, and there in presence) for a Sermon by him made four Years before in the same Place, and on the same Text, had unjustly been cast into the vile Prison of the Marshalsea. Which Speech so offended some of the Auditory, that they cry'd, Pull him down, pull him down; and had certainly done him Violence, (for a Dagger was thrown at him) if Mr. Bradford, a Protestant Preacher, had not stepped into his Place and appeas'd the Tumult, and Mr. Rogers, another Protestant Minister, (who were both afterwards burnt for Religion) had not shifted away Bourne into Paul's School.

Hitherto Queen Mary's Reign had been without Blood, but now the Cataracts of Severity will be opened, that will make it rain Blood: For now, on the eighteenth of August, John Dudley Duke of Northumberland, William Parre Marquis of Northampton, and John Earl of Warwick, Son and Heir to the Duke, were arraign'd at Westminster-Hall, before Thomas Duke of Norfolk as High Steward of England. Where the Duke of Northumberland, after his Indictment read, requir'd the Opinion of the Court in two Points: First, Whether a Man doing any Act by Authority of the Prince's Council, and by Warrant of the Great Seal of England, might for any such Act be charg'd with Treason: Secondly, Whether any such Persons as were equally culpable, and by whose Commandments he was directed, might be his Judges, and pass upon his Tryal. Whereunto was answer'd, That concerning the first, the Great Seal, which he alledg'd for his Warrant, was not the Seal of the lawful Queen of the Realm, but of an Usurper, and therefore could be no Warrant for him: And as to the second, it was resolv'd, That if any were as deeply to be touch'd in the Case as himself, yet so long as no Attainder were of Record against them, they were Persons able in Law to pass upon his Tryal, and not to challeng'd but at the Prince's pleasure. After which Answers, the Duke us'd few Words, but confess'd the Indictment, and accordingly had Judgment to die. By whose Example, the other Prisoners arraign'd with him confess'd the Indictments, and thereupon had Judgment. The nineteenth of August Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir John and Sir Henry Gates, Brethren, and Sir Thomas Palmer, Knights, were arraign'd at Westminster; who confess'd their Indictments, had Judgment, which was pronounc'd by the Marquis of Winchester, Lord High Treasurer, sitting that Day as Chief Justice. After these Condemnations follow'd the Executions; for on the two and twentieth of August John Duke of Northumberland was brought to Tower-Hill, and there beheaded. Being upon the Scaffold in a Gown of green-colour'd Damask; he put it off, and then made a long Speech, wherein he ask'd the Queen forgiveness, ness, whom he acknowledg'd to have grievously offended; and then making profession of his Faith, that he died a true Catholick, (meaning a Papist) he said the Psalms of Miserere & Profundis, the Pater noster, and six of the first Verses of the Psalm In te Domine speravi, ending with this Verse, Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my Spirit. And this said, he look'd about him, as looking for a Pardon; but none coming, he laid his Head down upon the Block, and at one Blow had it stricken off. His Body, with the Head, was buried in the Tower, by the Body of Edward late Duke of Somerset, (mortal Enemies while they lived, but now lying together as good Friends) so as there lieth before the high Altar in St. Peter's Church two Dukes between two Queens, namely, the Duke of Somerset and the Duke of Northumberland between Queen Ann and Queen Katherine, all four beheaded. Of what Religion this Duke was, may well be doubted, seeing at his Death he profess'd himself a Papist; and lately before, he had importuned King Edward to make the Lady Jane his Successor, lest the Papal Religion should be restored. It seems he was not greatly of either, but for other Ends, a Protestant then, when it was to make his Daughter-in-law Queen; now a Papist, when it was to save his life, (for it was thought he had a Pardon promis'd if he would recant.) At the same Time and Place were beheaded Sir John Gates and Sir Thomas Palmer, who were no such Temporizers, but persisted and died in the Protestant Religion, which they had always profess'd.

After this, a sprinkling of Mercy came from the Queen; for, on the Third of September the Lord Ferrers of Chartley, the two Chief-Justices Sir Roger Cholmley and Montague, Sir John Cheek, and others, were deliver'd out of the Tower, whither they had been committed; but a shewre of Severity follow'd soon after: For, on the 15th of September, Mr. Latimer and Dr. Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, were sent to the Tower; and on the Third of November following, the said Archbishop Cranmer, the Lady Jane, (late Queen) and the Lord Guilford her Husband, with the Lords Ambrose and Henry, Sons to the late Duke of Northumberland, were arraign'd at the Guild-hall, found guilty, and had Judgment to die.

All this while Queen Mary had contented her self to be Queen by Proclamation; but now that things were something settled, she proceeds to her Coronation; for, on the last of September, she rode in her Chariot thro' London towards Westminster in this order: First rode a number of Gentlemen and Knights, then Doctors, then Judges, then Bishops, then Lords, then the Council; after whom follow'd the Knights of the Bath, Thirteen in number, in their Robes, then the Bishop of Winchester Lord-Chancellor, and the Marquis of Winchester Lord High-Treasurer; next came the Duke of Norfolk, and after him the Earl of Oxford, who bore the Sword; then the Mayor of London in a Gown of Crimson Velvet, who bore the Sceptre of Gold; after came the Queen's Chariot, and then follow'd another Chariot, wherein sat the Lady Elizabeth her Sister, and the Lady Ann of Cleve; and then came Ladies and Gentlewomen riding on Horses trapped with red Velvet, &c. In this order they came thro' London to Westminster, where, in many places by the way, were Pageants and stately Shews, and many rich Presents given to the Queen. The next Day she went by Water to the old Palace, and remain'd there till Eleven of the Clock, and then went on foot upon blue Cloth, being rail'd on each side, to St. Peter's Church, where she was crown'd and anointed by the Bishop of Winchester, the two Archbishops being then in the Tower, with all Rites and Ceremonies of old accusom'd.

After her Coronation a general Pardon was publish'd in her Name, but interlaced with so many Exceptions of Matters and Persons, that very few took Benefit by it: For, after the Pardon publish'd, there were Commissioners assigned to compound with such Persons as were excepted, from some of whom they took away their Fees and Offices, some they fined, and some they depriv'd of their Estates and Livings.

A Pardon granted, but full of Exceptions.

About this time Sir James Hales, one of the Justices of the Common-Pleas, who in the time of King Edward had refus'd to sign a Writing for disinheriting the Lady Mary and the Lady Elizabeth, (a Fact worthy at least of a kind Remembrance from the Lady Mary, now Queen) yet now, because at a Quarter Sessions in Kent he gave Charge upon the Statute of King Henry the Eighth, and King Edward the Sixth, in derogation of the Primacy of the Church of Rome, he was first committed to the Kings-bench, then to the Compter, and lastly to the Fleet, where he grew so troubled in Mind, that he attempted with a Pen-knife to kill himself: And being afterward recover'd of that Hurt, and brought to the Queen's presence, who gave him very comfortable Words, yet could he never come to be quiet in his Mind, but in the end drown'd himself in a River not half a mile from his House, the River being so shallow, that he was fain to lie groveling before he could dispatch himself of Life.

of the Common-Pleas,

self, and why.

And now another sprinkling of Mercy came from the Queen; for the Marquis of Northampton and Sir Henry Gates, lately before condemn'd to die, were now pardon'd, and set at liberty. The Lady Jane also was allow'd the liberty of the Tower, not without hope of Life and Liberty altogether, if her Father the Duke of Suffolk had not a second time been the cause of her Destruction.

The Lady
Jane, tho' condemn'd, is
Liberty of the Tower.

About this time also a Synod was assembled for consulting about Matters of Religion, and the Point especially of the Real Presence in the Sacrament. The Prolocutor was Dr. Weston; and of the Protestant side were John Aylmer and Richard Cheyney, both Bishops afterward in Queen Elizabeth's time, also John Philpot, afterward burnt, James Haddon, and others. After a long Disputation, wherein Reasons were not so much weigh'd as Voices numbred, the Papal side, as having most Voices, carried it; and thereupon was that Religion again restor'd, and the Mass commanded in all Churches to be celebrated after the ancient manner.

Upon a Conference about Religion, the Mass is again
restor'd.

It was now, this Year 1553, when Queen Mary was come to the age of Seven and thirty Years, and therefore high time now to think of Marriage, at least if she meant to have Issue of her Body; but hard matter it was to find a Husband in all points fitting for her; yet Three at this time (in common fame at least) were taken into consideration: One was, the Lord Courtney, Marquis of Exeter, a goodly Gentleman, and of Royal Blood; but there was an Exception against him, because inclining (as 'twas thought) to Lutheranism. Another was Cardinal Pool, of a Dignity not much inferior to Kings, and by his Mother descended from Kings; but there was an Exception against him also, because Four and fifty Years old, (as old a Batchelor as Queen Mary was a Maid) and so the less hope of Issue between them: But the third (if he might be had) was without Exception, and that was Philip Prince of Spain, the Emperor Charles's eldest Son, with whom, being a Spaniard, she was the fitter match'd, as being by the Mother a Spaniard her self. And now very opportunely came, in the beginning of January, Ambassadors into England about it; amongst others, the Count of Egmont, Admiral of the Low-Countries, and John of Momorancy (Lord of Curriers, whose Message was so kindly entertain'd, that the Marriage in short time was absolutely concluded; tho' it seem'd something strange to many, that she should now be the Wife to the Son, who Thirty Years before should have been the Wife to the Father: But so it is, Queens are never old, so long as they are within Years of bearing Children. And indeed the Match was concluded with Conditions of far more advantage to Queen Mary than they were to King Philip; as, on the 14th of January, Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, and Lord-Chancellor of England, openly in the Presence-Chamber at Westminster, declar'd to all the Lords and Gentlemen there present: For it was agreed, That after the Marriage King Philip should have the Title of all the Queen's Dominions, and be assumed into fellowship of the Government, but yet with Reservation to the Queen of all Privileges and Customs of the Kingdom, and free disposition of all Offices and Honours. As likewise the Queen would be assumed into the fellowship of all the King's Dominions, and surviving him, should have a Joynture of Two hundred thousand Pounds a Year. Then, for the Issue between them, if she had a Son, That he should inherit the Low-Countries and Burgundy; and King Philip's Son Charles, which he had by a former Wife, should inherit all his Dominions in Italy and Spain: But if his Son Charles should fail without Issue, then the Son he should have by Queen Mary should inherit his Kingdom of Italy, and Spain also. And the like good Provision was also made for Daughters.

But notwithstanding these great Advantages of the Match, yet such was the precipitant Rashness of some, that (thinking themselves wiser than the Queen and the Council) they fought by all means to oppose the Match, giving out, that they intended to bring England under the Yoke of Spain, and to make the Country a Slave to Strangers. This was the general murmuring of the People; but the first that shew'd himself in Arms was Sir Thomas Wyat of Kent, who having communicated the matter to the Duke of Suffolk, the Lady Jane's Father, with Peter Carew a Knight of Devonshire, and divers others, intended only to make secret provision, but not to stir till Prince Philip should be come, that so their Cause of taking Arms might have the better colour.

On the 15th of January, Robert Dudley; Son to the Duke of Northumberland, was arraign'd at the Guild-hall for High-Treason, who confess'd the Indictment, and had Judgment given by the Earl of Suffex, to be drawn, hang'd, bowel'd, and quarter'd.

But now in Counsels communicated many, 'tis a hard matter to have Counsel kept; and Sir Peter Carew finding that their Plot was discover'd, fled privily into France, where lurking for a time, he was afterwards taken at Brussels, and brought Captive into England; as likewise at the same time and place Sir John Cheek, King Edward's Schoolmaster, was taken; who being drawn by Terrors to embrace the Papal Religion, with very Grief afterward for his Error pined away and died. Sir Peter Carew lived many Years after, and died in Ireland; tho' it be falsly recorded they were both burnt for Religion in June this Year. Wyat hearing of Sir Peter Carew's Flight, and that all their Purpose was discover'd, was driven before his time to enter into Arms, giving out for the cause, That it was not to attempt any thing against the Queen, but only to remove ill Counsellors, and chiefly to repel Prince Philip, lest by his Marriage the Kingdom should come in subjection to the Spaniard. With Wyat were joyn'd Sir Henry Isle, Sir George Harper, Anthony and William Knevet, and divers other Gentlemen of the County. Against him were the Lord Abergavenny, Sir Thomas Cheyney Lord-Warden of the Ports, Sir Robert Southwel Sheriff of Kent, Sir Warham Saintleger, Sir Thomas Kemp, Sir Thomas Moyle, Sir Thomas Finch, with divers others; yet all these Great Men had such Doubt of the People that they durst not proceed but very warily. The 25th of January News came to London of Wyat's Rising, against whom was presently sent the Duke of Norfolk, with Sir Henry Jerningham Captain of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray, Sir John Fogge, John Covert, Roger Appleton, Esquires, and Five hundred Soldiers out of London appointed to go after him, under the command of Captain Brett. And now see in Times of Sedition how uncertain a thing it is to trust to the People; for before Brett could overtake the Duke, Sir George Harper was secretly got to him, who so persuaded him, that he and his Five hundred Soldiers left the Duke, and went over to Wyat, which made the Duke, and those with him, presently flee, and put such Boldness into Wyat, that now he march'd with great confidence towards London, with so great Terrour to all sorts of People, that at Westminster-hall the Serjeants, and other Lawyers, pleaded in Harness.

In the mean time the Duke of Suffolk was perceiv'd in Warwickshire to be raising of Forces in assistance of Wyat; against whom was presently sent the Earl of Huntington: And the Duke finding himself unable to make resistance, stance, having with all his industry gotten together but only fifty Men, he betook himself to a Tenant of his, one Underwood, with whom he hoped, and had promise to remain undiscovered, till he might have opportunity to escape, as some say, as others, to a Keeper of his Park, call'd Nicholas Lawrence, who kept him in a hollow Oak in the said Park for two or three Days. But whether Underwood or Lawrence, either out of Fear, or out of hope of Reward, he betray'd him to the Earl, by whom he was taken, and with a strong Guard carry'd to the Tower. Upon this, Queen Mary her self came into London, where calling the Mayor and chief of the City together, she made an Oration, wherein she shew'd the Insolence of Wyat; who, though he pretended but on'y the crossing of the Marriage, yet now was grown to such Presumption, that he requir'd to have the Custody of her Person, and to have Councillors retain'd or remov'd at his pleasure. And as for her Marriage, she there affirm'd she had done nothing in it but by the Advice of her Council; and for her self, that she was not so longing for a Husband, but that if it were not more for the Good of the Kingdom, than for her own Satisfaction, she would never once think of entertaining it. Having by her Speech confirm'd the Minds of the Citizens, Forces were presently rais'd and placed about the Bridge, and other fit Places of the City. The third of February, Wyat with an Army of three or four Thousand came to London hoping for present Entrance; but finding the Bridge broken, and Soldiers placed to resist him, after two Days stay in Southwark, he removed to Kingston, where he found likewise the Bridge broken; yet with great Industry suddenly repairing it, he pass'd over his Men, and meant with all speed to get to the Court before the Queen should have notice of his coming: And had done so indeed, if a Mischance, and an Error upon that Mischance had not hinder'd him: For being come within six Miles of London, the Carriage of one of his great Ordnance broke; in mending whereof so much time was spent, (and Wyat by no persuasions would go forward without it) that the Time was past in which his Friends at London expected his coming; which Disappointment made many in those Parts to fall off, and being perceiv'd by those about him, many of them also; so as one half of his Army was suddenly gone and left him; amongst other, Sir George Harper, the most intimate of all his Counsel, went to the Queen and discover'd all his Purposes. Whereupon the Earl of Pembroke, with a Company levied upon the sudden, was sent against him, which made Wyat slack his pace, so as it was Noon before he came to the Suburbs of the City; and then placing his Ordnance upon a Hill, and leaving there the greatest part of his Army, he only with five Ensigns march'd towards Ludgate, and being encounter'd at Charing-Cross by the Lord Chamberlain and Sir John Gage, after a small Fight put them to flight in such sort, that word was carried to the Queen how near Wyat approacht, and how wonderfully he prevail'd all the way he came; with which nothing dismay'd, Well then,

(said she) I will go in Person against him myself; and was preparing to do so indeed, (so much was her Father's Valour running in her Veins) but it need'd not; for by this time Sir Henry Feringham Captain of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray Master of the Ordnance, and Sir Philip Parris had given him Battel, and slain many of his Men. And that which was more, coming to Ludgate he was denied Entrance; and then thinking to retire, he heard the Earl of Pembroke with his Forces were behind at Charing-Cross; so as neither able to go forward, nor yet backward, he was at a stand and in amazement, and then leaning a while upon a Stall by the Bell-Savage, after a little musing, he return'd toward Temple-Gate; where Clarenceux the Herald meeting him, fell to persuade him not to be a cause of more effusion of Blood, nor by persisting in obstinacy to exclude all hopes of the Queen's Mercy. The Soldiers of Wyat were earnest with him to have stood it out; but Wyat as fillily ending as he had unadvisedly begun, yielded himself to Sir Maurice Berkley, and getting up upon his Horse behind him, in that manner rode to the Court; where he had not the Entertainment he expected, for without more ado he was presently sent away to the Tower. The Captain taken, the rest made no resistance; few fled, and of the other, many were taken and laid in Prison: and this was done the sixth of February. And now Consultation was held what Delinquents should be punish'd; where the first that was thought on was the Lady Jane, in whom was verified, The Fathers have eaten sower Grapes, and the Childrens Teeth are set on edge; the innocent Lady must suffer for her Father's Fault: For if her Father the Duke of Suffolk had not this second time made shipwreck of his Loyalty, his Daughter perhaps had never tasted the Salt-water of the Queen's Displeasure: But now, as a Rock of Offence, she is the first that must be remov'd; and thereupon is Dr. Fecknam sent to acquaint her, That she must prepare her self to die the next Day. Which Message was so little unpleasing unto her, that she seem'd rather to rejoyce at it, as whereby she should at last be set at liberty. And the Dr. being earnest with her to change her new Religion, and to embrace the old; she answer'd, She had now no time to think of any thing but of preparing her self to GOD by Prayer. Fecknam thinking she had spoken this to the end she might have some longer time of Life, obtain'd of the Queen three Days longer, and then came and told so much to the Lady Jane, whereat she smiling said, You are much deceiv'd, if you think I had any desire of longer Life; for I assure you, since the time you went from me, my Life hath been so tedious to me, that I long for nothing so much as Death; and since it is the Queen's pleasure, I am most willing to undergo it. Before she was brought to Execution her Husband the Lord Guilford had made suit, and obtain'd to see her, and have some conference with her: But she refus'd it, saying, These were rather augmenters of Grief, than Comforts of Death; she made no doubt, but they should shortly meet in a better Place, and in a better condition of Society. So on the twelfth of

February, her Husband the Lord Guilford first, and then she, an hour or two after, was beheaded within the Tower, where she acknowledged her self to have deserv'd Death, not for seeking the Crown, but for not refusing it, being offer'd: And, after Prayers to GOD, unclothing her self, and putting a Handkerchief before her Eyes, she laid her Head down upon the Block, and patiently suffer'd Death, more grievous to the Beholders than to her self.

She's beheaded

Her Piety and Learning.

Judge Morgan who had given Sentence upon her, falls mad.

This End had the Lady Jane Gray, a Lady of incomparable Piety, and (for her Years) of incomparable Learning; for, being not past seventeen Years of age, she understood perfectly the Greek and Latin Tongues, and was so ready in Points of Divinity, as if she knew them by Inspiration rather than by Instruction; no less a Miracle in this kind than King Edward, and therefore no marvel if he appointed her to succeed him in the Kingdom, who in the Endowments of Mind was so like unto him, that whilst she reign'd it might be thought he continued to reign himself, at least no more differing but only in Sex. It may not be forgotten, that Judge Morgan, who at her Arraignment gave the Sentence against her, shortly after fell mad, and in his raving cried continually to have the Lady Jane taken away from him, and so ended his Life.

Two Days after the Execution of the Lady Jane, namely, the 14th and 15th of February, Twenty pair of Gallows were set up, in divers places of the City, whereon were hang'd Fifty of Wyat's Faction. On the 18th of February Brett was hang'd at Rocheſter in Chains: Sir Henry Isle, who had been taken in an old Frize Coat, and an old pair of Hose, with his Brother Thomas Isle, and Walter Mantell, were hang'd at Maidſtone: Anthony Knevet, and his Brother William, with another of the Mantells, were executed at Sevenoak: But then, on the 20th of February, a sprinkling of Mercy came; for Four hundred of Wyat's followers being brought before the Queen with Halters about their Necks, they were all pardon'd and set at liberty. But then Severity soon after began again, for on the Twenty-third of February the Lord Henry Gray, Duke of Suffolk, and Father to the Lady Jane, who the Week before had been arraign'd and condemn'd, was on the Tower-Hill beheaded; and on the Eleventh of April in the same place was beheaded (the Author of all this Mischief) Wyat himself, whose Quarters were set up in divers places of the City, his Head upon the Gallows at Hay-hill, beside Hide-Park. This Man, in hope of Life, having before accused the Lord Courtney, and the Lady Elizabeth, the Queen's Sister, to be privy to his Conspiracy, yet at his Death he clear'd them, and protested openly, that they were altogether innocent, and never had been acquainted with his Proceedings. Yet was this Matter so urg'd against them by Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Wincheſter and Lord-Chancellor, that both of them, in March before, had been committed to the Tower, tho' in May following they were both again releas'd, but yet confined, the Lady Elizabeth to Woodſtock, under the Custody of Sir Henry Bedenfield of Oxenborough, in the County of Norfolk; the Lord

Courtney to Fotheringhay, under the Custody of Sir Thomas Tresham; who after some time was set at liberty, and going into Italy, there died. It is as memorable what Malice this Bishop Gardiner bore to the Lady Elizabeth, by whose only procurement she was not only kept in most hard Durance, but a Warrant was at last framed under certain Councillors Hands, to put her to Death: Which had been done, but that Mr. Bruges, Lieutenant of the Tower, pitying her Case, went to the Queen to know her Pleasure, who utterly deny'd that she knew any thing of it; by which means her Life was preserv'd. Indeed the Bishop would sometimes say, Tho' they cut off Boughs and Branches, yet as long as they let the Root remain, all was nothing. And 'tis not unworthy the remembring what Trains were laid to ensnare her. The common Net, at that time, for catching of Protestants was, the Real Presence; and this Net was used to catch her: For being ask'd one time what she thought of the Words of Christ, This is my Body, whether she thought it the true Body of Christ that was in the Sacrament; it is said that after some pausing she thus answer'd,

*Christ was the Word that spake it;
He took the Bread and brake it;
And what the Word doth make it,
That I believe, and take it.*

Which, tho' it may seem but a slight Expression, yet hath it more solidness than at first sight appears; at least it serv'd her turn at that time to escape the Net, which by direct Answer she could not have done.

On the 17th of February, Thomas Lord Gray, the Duke of Norfolk's Brother, was beheaded; the last, and indeed the least in Delinquency, that suffer'd for having any hand in Wyat's Conspiracy. There remain'd yet a fagg-end, and was indeed but a fagg-end, as nothing worth; for on the same Day Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, being accus'd to have been a Party in Wyat's Conspiracy, was at the Guild-hall arraign'd before Sir Thomas White Lord Mayor, the Earls of Shrewsbury and Derby, Sir Thomas Bromley Lord Chief-Justice of England, Sir Nicholas Hare Master of the Rolls, Sir Francis Englefield Master of the Wards, Sir Richard Southwell and Sir Edward Walgrave Privy-Councillors, Sir Roger Cholmley, Sir William Portman, one of the Justices of the King's Bench, Sir Edward Saunders, one of the Justices of the Common-Pleas, Mr. Stamford and Mr. Dyer, Serjeants at Law, Mr. Edward Griffin Attorney-General, Mr. Sendall and Peter Tichborne, Clerks of the Crown; where the said Sir Nicholas Throgmorton so fully and discreetly answer'd all Objections brought against him, that he was found by the Jury Not Guilty, and was clearly acquitted; but the Jury notwithstanding was afterward troubled for acquitting him, and sent Prisoners some of them to the Tower, and some to the Fleet, and afterward fined to pay a thousand Marks a-piece at least, and some Two thousand Pounds, tho' the sums were afterward something mitigated.

More of Wyat's Accomplices had been taken, arraign'd, and adjudg'd to die, but in Judgment the call'd the Spirit in the Wall.

'Tis scarce worth remembring, that in the end of this first Year of the Queen's Reign, one Elizabeth Croft, a Wench of 18 Years old, was by Practice put into a Wall, and thereupon call'd The Spirit in the Wall, who, with a Whistle made for the purpose, whistled out many seditious Words against the Queen, the Prince of Spain, the Maf, Confeſſion, and ſuch other Points; for which ſhe did Penance, ſtanding upon a Scaffold at Paul's Croſs all Sermon-time, where ſhe made open Confeſſion of her Fault.

Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer
adjudg'd Hereticks, and condemn'd to die.

There had been good ſtore of Laymens Blood ſhed already, and now the time is coming to have Clergyemens ſhed: And, as a Preparative to it, on the tenth of April, Cranmer Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Nicholas Ridley late Biſhop of London, and Hugh Latimer late Biſhop of Worceſter, are convey'd from the Tower to Oxford, there to diſpute with Oxford and Cambridge-men in Points of Religion, but eſpecially of the Eucharift. The Oxford men were Cole, Chadſey, Pye, Harpsfield, Smith, and Dr. Weſton Prolocutor; the Cambridge-men, Young, Seaton, Watſon, Atkinſon, Fecknam, and Sedgwick. The Diſputation ended, which (we may well think as the matter was carried) went againſt the Priſoners. On the 20th of April they were brought again on the Stage, and then demanded, whether they would perſiſt in their Opinion, or elſe recant; and affirming they would perſiſt, they were all three adjudg'd Hereticks, and condemn'd to the Fire; but their Execution we muſt not look for till a Year or two hence: But in the mean time we have John Rogers, the firſt Martyr of theſe Times, burnt at London the 4th of February; after whom, the 9th of February, John Hooper, late Biſhop of Worceſter, burnt at Glouceſter; after him, Robert Ferrar Biſhop of Man, burnt at Caermarthen; after him, John Bradford, with many others; and then the two famous Men, Ridley and Latimer, no leſs famous for their conſtant Deaths than their religious Lives, both burnt at Oxford the 16th of October.

The firſt that ſuffer'd for Religion in
time.

This Riſing of Wyat had been a Remora to the Queen's Marriage; and now, to avoid all ſuch Obſtacles hereafter, the Queen in April call'd a Parliament, wherein were propounded two things; one for Confirmation of the Marriage, the other for reſtoration of the Pope's Primacy. This latter was not aſſented to but with great difficulty; for the Six Years Reign of King Edward had ſpread a plantation of the Proteſtant Religion in the Hearts of many; but the Propoſition of the Marriage was aſſented to readily, but yet with the adding of ſome Conditions which had not been thought of in the former Articles: 1. That King Philip ſhould admit of no Strangers in any Office, but only Natives.

2. That he ſhould innovate nothing in the Laws and Customs of the Kingdom. 3. That he ſhould not carry the Queen out of the Realm without her conſent, nor any of her Children, without conſent of the Council. 4. That ſurviving the Queen, he ſhould challenge no Right in the Kingdom, but ſuffer it to deſcend to the next Heir. 5. That he ſhould carry none of the Jewels of the Realm out of the Kingdom, nor ſuffer any Ship or Ordnance to be remov'd out of the Realm; and laſtly, That neither directly nor indirectly he ſhould cauſe the Realm of England to be entangled with the War between Spain and France.

All things being thus agreed on, the Earl of Bedford Lord Privy-Seal, the Lord Fitzwaters, and divers other Lords and Gentlemen, are ſent into Spain, to fetch Prince Philip, who arriv'd at Southampton the 20th of July, in the Year 1554, and the 23d came to Wincheſter, where the Queen met him, and the 25th the Marriage between them was there openly ſolemniz'd, (the diſparity of Years, as in Princes, not much regarded, tho' he were then but 27 Years of age, the 38.) at which time the Emperor's Ambaſſadors being preſent, openly declar'd, That in conſideration of that Marriage, the Emperor had given to Prince Philip, his Son, the Kingdoms of Naples and Hieruſalem. And thereupon (the ſolemnity of Marriage being ended) Garter King of Heralds, openly in the Church, in the preſence of the King and Queen, and the Lords both of England and Spain, ſolemnly proclaim'd the Title and Stile of theſe two Princes, as followeth:

Philip and Mary, by the Grace of GOD, King and Queen of England, France, Naples, Hieruſalem, and Ireland, Defenders of the Faith, Princes of Spain and Sicily, Archdukes of Austria, Dukes of Milan, Burgundy, and Brabant, Counts of Habsperg, Flanders, and Tyrol.

After this the King and Queen by eaſie Journeys came to Windſor-Caſtle, where the King was install'd Knight of the Garter, and the Earl of Suffex with him. The 11th of Auguſt they remov'd to Richmond, the 27th to Suffolk-Place in Southwark, and the next day to London, where the ſtately Shews that were made may well enough be conceiv'd without relating. From hence, after four Days, they remov'd again to Richmond, where all the Lords had leave to depart into their Countries; and indeed ſo many departed, that there remain'd not an Engliſh Lord at Court, except the Biſhop of Wincheſter. From Richmond they remov'd to Hampton-Court, where the Hall-door within the Court was continually kept ſhut, ſo as no Man might enter, unleſs his Errand were firſt known; which might perhaps be the Faſhion of Spain, but to Engliſhmen ſeem'd very ſtrange.

About this time Cardinal Pool, ſent for by the King and Queen, came over into England, and had come ſooner, but that the Emperor, fearing he might prove a Co-rival with his Son Philip, had uſed means to ſtop his paſſage; but now, that his Son's Marriage was paſt, he was content to let him paſs; who, tho' he came from Rome with the great Authority of a Legate a Latere, yet he would not but come privately into London, becauſe his Attainder was yet upon Record. An Act therefore was preſently paſfed to take it off, and to restore him in Blood ; for passing of which Act the King and Queen in Person came to the Parliament-house, whither a few Days after the Cardinal came himself, which was then kept in the great Chamber of White hall, because the Queen, by reason of sickness, was not able to go abroad. And here the King and Queen sitting under the Cloth of State, and the Cardinal on their right hand, all the Lords, Knights, and Burgeses being present, the Bishop of Winchester, Lord-Chancellor, made a short Speech to them, signifying the presence of the Lord-Cardinal, and that he was sent from the Pope as his Legate a Latere, to do a Work tending to the Glory of God, and the Benefit of them all ; which (saith he) you may much better hear from his own Mouth. Then the Cardinal rose up, and made a long solemn Oration, wherein he first thank'd them for his restoring, by which he was enabled to be a Member of their Society ; then exhorting them to return into the Bosom of the Church, for which End he was come ; not to condemn, but to reconcile ; not to compel, but to call and require : And for their first Work of Reconcilement, requiring them to repeal and abrogate all such Laws as had formerly been made in derogation of the Catholick Religion. After which Speech the Parliament, going together, drew up a Supplication, which within two Days after they presented to the King and Queen ; wherein they shew'd themselves to be very penitent for their former Errors, and humbly desir'd their Majesties to intercede for them to the Lord-Cardinal and the See Apostolick, that they might be pardon'd for all they had done amiss, and be receiv'd into the Bosom of the Church, being themselves most ready to abrogate all Laws prejudicial to the See of Rome.

Card. Pool makes a solemn Speech to the Parliament, exhorting them to return to the Bosom of the Church.

The Parliament desire Pardon of their former Errors.

And thereupon the Cardinal gives the whole Realm Absolution.

The Parliament will not yield King Philip should be crown'd.

The Queen is preach'd in Churches to be with Child, and Prayers made for her safe Delivery, but prov'd no such thing.

This Supplication being deliver'd to the Cardinal, he then gave them Absolution in these words ; [ We, by the Apostolick Authority given unto Us by the most holy Lord Pope Julius the Third, (Christ's Vicegerent on Earth) do absolve and deliver you, and every of you, with the whole Realm, and Dominions thereof, from all Herefie and Schism, and from all Judgments, Censures, and Pains for that cause incurred. And also we do restore you again to the Unity of our Mother the Holy Church. ] The Report hereof coming to Rome, was cause that a solemn Procession was made, for Joy of the Conversion of England to the Church of Rome. And now the Queen had a great desire to have King Philip crown'd, but to this the Parliament would by no means assent. In October this Second Year of her Reign a Rumour was spread of the Queen's being with Child ; and so forward, that she was quick : And hereupon were Letters sent from the Lords of the Council to Bonner Bishop of London, that Prayers and Thanksgiving should be made in all Churches : And the Parliament it self was so credulous of it, that they enter'd into considering of the Education of the Child, and made an Act, desiring the King, (out of the confidence they had in him) that if the Queen should fail, he would be pleas'd to take upon him the Rule and Government of the Child. But after all this, in June following it came to be known that it was but a Tympany ; or, at least, the Queen so miscarried that there was no Child, nor the Queen likely ever after to have any : But howsoever, in hope of the Joy that was expected, in January this Year divers of the Council, as, the Lord-Chancellor, the Bishop of Ely, the Lord-Treasurer, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Comptroller of the Queen's House, Secretary Bourne, and Sir Richard Southwell Master of the Ordnance, were sent to the Tower, to discharge and set at liberty a great part of the Prisoners in the Tower, as namely, the late Duke of Northumberland's Sons, Ambrose, Robert, and Henry ; also Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir James Crofts, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, Sir John Rogers, Sir Nicholas Arnold, Sir George Harper, Sir Edward Warner, Sir William Santlow, Sir Gowen Carew, William Gybbs Esq; Cuthbert Vaughan, and others.

Divers that were in the Tower condemn'd are set at liberty.

About this time one William Featherston, a Miller's Son, of the age of eighteen Years, named and bruited himself to be King Edward the Sixth ; for which being apprehended and examin'd, he answer'd as one lunatick, and thereupon was whipt at the Carts-tail and banish'd into the North : But, the Year after, spreading abroad again, that King Edward was alive, and that he had talk'd with him, he was arraign'd and condemn'd of Treason, and at Tyburn hang'd and quarter'd.

Is taken and hang'd at Tyburn.

In the Month of March the Queen was taken with a Fit of Devotion, and thereupon call'd unto her four of her Privy-Council, namely, William Marquis of Winchester Lord-Treasurer, Sir Robert Rochester Comptroller, Sir William Petre Secretary, and Sir Francis Englefield Master of the Wards, and signified unto them, That it went against her Conscience to hold the Lands and Possessions, as well of Monasteries and Abbeys as of other Churches, and therefore she did freely relinquish them, and leave 'em to be dispos'd as the Pope and the Lord-Cardinal should think fit ; and thereupon charg'd them to acquaint the Cardinal with her Purpose. And shortly after, in performance hereof, John Fecknam, late Dean of Pauls, was made Abbot of Westminster, and had possession deliver'd him, and with him 14 Monks receiv'd the Habit at the same time : On the 20th of November Sir Thomas was instituted Lord of St. John's of Hierusalem, and was put in possession of the Lands belonging to it. And when 'twas told her, that this would be a great diminution of the Revenues of her Crown, she answer'd, She valued more the Salvation of her Soul than a thousand Crowns. A most religious Speech, and enough, if there were but this, to shew her to be a most pious Princess.

The Queen delivers up all the Lands of Monasteries that were in her hands.

The fourth of September this Year King Philip, waited on with the Earl of Arundel Lord-Steward, the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Huntington, and others, went over to Calais, and from thence to Brussels in Brabant, to visit the Emperor his Father ; who delivering him possession of the Low-Countries, in March following he return'd into England ; but on the sixth of July following, by reason of Wars with France, he pass'd again over to Calais, and so into Flanders, from whence he return'd not till 18 Months after ; which made great muttering among the common People, as tho' he took any little Occasion to be absent, for the little Love he bore to the Queen.

King Philip goes to Flanders, where he staid eighteen months.

In the third Year of the Queen died Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, at his Houle in Southwark. Of whose death it is memorable, That the same Day in which Bishop Ridley and Mr. Latimer suffer'd at Oxford, he would not go to Dinner till four a Clock in the Afternoon, tho' the old Duke of Norfolk was come to dine with him: The reason was, because he would first hear of their being burnt; and as soon as word of that was brought him, he presently said, Now let us go to Dinner; where sitting down, and eating merrily, upon a sudden fell into such extremity, that he was fain to be taken from the Table and carried to his Bed; where he continu'd fifteen Days, without voiding any thing either by Urine or otherwise; which caus'd his Tongue to swell in his Mouth, and so he died. After whose death, Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York was made Lord Chancellor.

Bishop Cranmer upon hope of Life recants.

And now comes the time of Archbishop Cranmer's Execution, who the Year before had been condemn'd, and degraded by Commission from the Pope: After which, being by the Subtilty of some put in hope of Life, out of Frailty he subscrib'd to a Recantation, which yet did him no good; for whether it were that Cardinal Pool would no longer be kept from being Archbishop, (which he could not be so long as he liv'd) or that the Queen could not be gotten to forget his being the chief Instrument of her Mother's Divorce, his Execution was resolv'd to be the 14th of February, in the same Place at Oxford where Ridley and Latimer five Months before had died. Before the Execution, Dr. Cole preach'd; who, to make use of Cranmer's Recantation, told the People, They should do well to hearken to this Learned Man's Confession, who now at his Death, and with his Death, would testifie which was the True Religion; never thinking that Cranmer would have denied his former Recantation. But Cranmer being brought to the Stake (contrary to expectation) acknowledg'd, that thro' Frailty he had subscrib'd it, praying GOD heartily to forgive it; and now for a punishment, that Hand which had done it, should first suffer; and therewithal thrusting his Right-hand into the Fire, he there held it, till it first, and then his whole Body was consum'd; only (which was no small Miracle) his Heart remain'd whole, and not once touch'd with the Fire. The same Year also, no fewer than Eighty four of both Sexes were burnt for Religion. And it was a Cruelty very far extended, that the Bones of Bucer and Fagius, some time before dead and buried, were taken up, and publicly burnt in Cambridge. No sooner was Cranmer dead, but the very same Day Cardinal Pool was made Archbishop of Canterbury.

Yet is brought to the Stake and burnt: Where he burneth his Hand first, When his whole Body was burnt, his Heart remain'd untouched of the Fire.

The Lord Stourton for a Murther is hang'd in a filken Halter.

In the fourth Year of the Queen, exemplary Justice was done upon a great Person: For the Lord Stourton, a Man much in the Queen's Favour, as being an earnest Papist, was for a Murther committed by him, arraign'd and condemn'd, and he (with four of his Servants) carried to Salisbury, was there in the Market-place hang'd, having the Favour to be hang'd in a filken Halter; his Servants in places near adjoining to the Place where the Murther was committed.

The 24th of April Thomas Stafford second Son to the Lord Stafford, with others to the Number of twenty or thirty Persons, (set on by the French King) attempted to raise Sedition against the Queen, for marrying with King Philip; and coming out of France, arriv'd at Scarborough in Yorkshire, where they took the Castle, but within two Days were driven out by the Earl of Westmoreland, and then taken and arraign'd. The 28th of May, Stafford was beheaded on Tower-Hill; and the next Day three of his Associates, Strelly, Bradford and Proctor were drawn from the Tower to Tyburn, and there executed. The 1st of May, Thomas Percy was first made Knight, after Lord, and the next Day was created Earl of Northumberland, to whom the Queen gave all the Lands that had been his Ancestor's.

Thomas Percy made Earl of Northumberland.

At this time the Queen entangled her self Queen Mary (contrary to her Promise) in her Husband's finds Aid to Quarrel; sent a Defiance to the French King, King Philip, by Clarenceux King at Arms; and after on the with which he Monday in Whitsun-week, by sound of Trumpet, besieges and proclaim'd open War against him in Cheapside, takes St. Quintins. and other Places of the City: And shortly after caus'd an Army of a thousand Horse, and four thousand Foot to be transported over, to the Aid of her Husband King Philip, under the leading of the Earl of Pembroke Captain-General, Sir Anthony Brown Viscount Montague Lieutenant-General, the Lord Gray of Wilton Lord Marshal, the Earl of Rutland General of the Horse, the Earl of Lincoln Colonel of the Foot, the Lord Robert Dudley Master of the Ordnance, the Lord Thomas Howard, the Earl De la Ware, the Lord Bray, the Lord Chandois, the Lord Ambrose Dudley, the Lord Henry Dudley, with divers Knights and Gentlemen; who joyning with King Philip's Forces, they all set down before St. Quintins, a Town of the French King's of great importance. To the Rescue whereof the French King sent an Army, under the leading of the Constable of France, which consisted of 900 Men at Arms, with as many light Horse, 800 Reysters, 22 Ensigns of Lancequenets, and 16 Ensigns of French Footmen. Their Purpose was not to give Battel, but to put more Succours into the Town; which the Philipians perceiving, encounter'd them, and in the Fight slew John of Bourbon Duke of Anguien, the Viscount of Turenne, the Lord of Chadenier, with many Gentlemen of account. They took prisoners the Duke of Momorancy Constable of France, the Duke of Montpensier, Duke Longueville, the Marshal of St. Andre, the Lord Lewis, Brother to the Duke of Mantua, the Baron of Courton, the Rhinegrave Colonel of the Almanes, Monsieur d'Aubigny, Monsieur de Biron, and many others; and then pursuing the Victory, under the Government of the Earl of Pembroke, on the 27th of August they took the Town of St. Quintins: in the Assault whereof, the Lord Henry Dudley, youngest Son to the Duke of Northumberland, was with a piece of great Ordnance slain, and some other of account. The Sackage of the Town King Philip gave to the English, as by whose Valour chiefly it was won.

The Joy was not so great for winning of St. Quintins, but there will be a greater Sorrow presently for other Losses: Many of the Garrison of Calais had been drawn from thence for service service of St. Quintins, and no new Supply sent; which being perceiv'd by the French King, a Plot is laid how to surprize it, which yet was not so secretly carried but the Officers of Calais had Intelligence thereof, who thereupon signified it to the Council of England, requiring speedy Succours, without which (against so great an Army as was rais'd against them) they should not be able to hold out: But, whether they gave no credit to the Relations, or whether they apprehended not the Danger so imminent, as indeed it was, they neglected to send Supplies till 'twas too late; for the Duke of Guise, with no less Speed than Policy, took such a course, that at one and the same time he set both upon Newnham Bridge, and also upon Ricebank, (the two main Sconces for defence of the Town) and took 'em both; and then fell presently to batter the Walls of the Castle it self, and that with such violence of great Ordnance, that the noise was heard to Antwerp, being a hundred Miles off: But having made the Walls assaultable, the English used this Stratagem; they laid trains of Powder, to blow 'em up when they should offer to enter: But this Stratagem succeeded not; for the French in passing the Ditch had so wet their Clothes, that dropping upon the Train, the Powder would take no Fire, (so all things seem'd to concur against the English) and thereupon the Castle was taken also, and with it the Town also had been taken, but that Sir Anthony Ager, with the loss of his own Life and his eldest Son's, valiantly defended it, and for that time repell'd the French: But their number encreas'd so fast upon the Town, that the Lord Wentworth (the Deputy) seeing no other way of safety, demanded Parley; where a Composition was made, That the Town should presently be yielded to the French King, the Lives of the Inhabitants only saved, and safe Conduct to pass away, saving the Lord Deputy, with Fifty others, such as the Duke should name. And here, to be quit with the English for their hard usage at St. Quintins, the Duke caused Proclamation to be made, That all and every Person of the Town should bring their Money, Jewels, and Plate, to the value of a Groat, and lay it down upon the high Altar of the Church; by which means an inestimable sum of Treasure was there offer'd, enough to enrich an Army, which had before enrich'd a Town. And now to make it appear how unable the Town was to hold out against so great an Army, 'tis said, there were in it but only 500 Soldiers of ordinary, and scarce 200 more of able fighting Men; but of other People, Men, Women, and Children, 4200; all which were suffer'd to depart, save the Lord Wentworth Deputy, Sir Ralph Chamberlain Captain of the Castle, John Hurlstone Captain of Ricebank, Nicholas Alexander Captain of Newnham Bridge, Edw. Grimston the Comptroller, John Rogers the Surveyor, with others to the number of Fifty, who were all carried Prisoners into France. And thus Calais, which had been in possession of the English above 200 Years, was won from the English in 8 Days, which King Edward the Third had not won from the French in less than a Year. The Lord Wentworth was suspected, and in Queen Elizabeth's time arraign'd for betraying it, but was acquitted by his Peers. Calais thus won, the Duke with his Army march'd to Guifnes, five miles distant, whereof was Captain the Lord Gray of Wilton, who held out the Siege and Batteries five or six days, with so great Valour and Resolution that he appear'd in nothing inferior to the Enemy, but in multitude; yet at last, overlaid with their numbers, and importuned by his Soldiers, much against his own Will he made composition, That the Town and Castle should be wholly render'd, himself and all Officers remain Prisoners, all others to depart with their Armour and Baggage: The Lord Gray was afterward ransom'd for 24000 Crowns. And now the Duke of Guise considering that Guifnes would be too costly a Castle to be kept, and too dangerous a Neighbour to Calais if it should be recover'd, razed it, with the Bulwarks and Fortifications, to the Ground. Guifnes thus won, there remained nothing within the English Pale but the little Castle of Hammes, whereof was Captain the Lord Edward Dudley, who considering that tho' it were naturally strongly situate, as being environ'd with Fens and Marshes, yet it had but little helps by Art, or Fortification; and being assur'd the Duke of Guise would speedily come upon him, he secretly in the Night, with all his Garrison, departed into Flanders, so as the Castle was not won, but taken by the Duke of Guise; and with the loss of this Castle the English lost all their footing in Terra Firma, and the Kings of England all the reality of their Title in France, having nothing left but nudum nomen.

Guifnes also won by the French.

And so the English lost all their footing in France.

Presently after this, the French King caused the Marriage between his eldest Son Francis, the Dauphin, and Mary Stuart, sole Heir of James the fifth King of Scotland, to be solemniz'd: Whereupon great Wars ensued soon after between England and Scotland.

The Dauphin of France marries Mary Stuart Heir of Scotland.

Queen Mary being infinitely troubled in Mind for the loss of Calais, sent presently forth her Admiral the Lord Clinton with a Fleet of more than a hundred Sail, to recover at least reparation of Honour, by doing some Exploit upon France, who not finding opportunity to set upon Brest, as he was appointed, fell upon the Town of Conquest, which he took and burnt, and also divers Villages thereabouts, and then return'd.

In the mean time many Conflicts having been between King Philip and the King of France, at last, by mediation of the Dutcheffs of Lorraine, a Treaty of Peace is agreed on, where all things seem'd to be well accorded, but only K. Philip by all means requir'd the restitution of Calais, to which by no means the French would assent.

An agreement of Peace between King Philip and the K. of France; but only want of restitution of Calais.

But whilst they stood on these terms it hapned that first the Emperor Charles, K. Philip's Father, died, and shortly after Queen Mary, and the day after Cardinal Pool, and shortly after Sir John Baker, of Sissinghurst in Kent, who had been a Privy-Councillor to Henry the Eighth, Edward the Sixth, and Queen Mary. And so our Story hath no further relation to either War or Peace between the two Kings of France and Spain.

Queen Mary dies.

Of her Taxations.

SHE began with a rare Example, for in the first Year of her Reign was pardon'd by Proclamation the Subsidy of Four Shillings the Pound on Land, and Two Shillings the Pound on Goods, granted in the last Parliament of King Edward 1558.

Edward the Sixth. In her second Year, in a Parliament then holden, was granted to the King and Queen a Subsidy on the Laity, from 5 l. to 10 l. of 8 d. in the Pound; from 10 l. to 20 l. of 12 d. in the Pound; from 20 l. and upwards, of 16 d. in the Pound; all Strangers double, and the Clergy 6 s. in the pound. If this were all, then upon the matter, in all her time there came no new Charge upon her People; for one Subsidy remitted, and one receiv'd, made but even. In her last Year she borrow'd 20000 pounds of the City of London, and paid 12 l. a Year Interest for every Hundred pound.

New Coins of Gold and Silver.

IN her first Year, on the 4th of September, were proclaim'd certain new Coins of Gold and Silver; a Sovereign of Gold 30 s. the half Sovereign 15 s. an Angel 10 s. the half Angel 5 s. of Silver, the Groat, the half Groat, and Penny: All these Coins to be current as before. In her second Year Proclamation was made, forbidding the shooting in Hand-guns, and bearing of Weapons. The Year in which she was married to King Philip, a strict Charge was to all Victuallers, Taverners, and Alehouse-keepers that they should sell no Meat, nor Drink, nor any kind of Victuals, to any Serving-man whatsoever, unless he brought a Testimonial to shew whose Servant he was. Also in a Parliament holden this Year, amongst other Acts, the Statute Ex Officio, and other Laws made for the punishment of Heresies, were reviv'd; but chiefly the Pope's Bull of Dispensation of Abbey-Lands was then confirm'd. In her second Year, on Michaelmas-Eve, the Prisoners that lay in the Compter in Breadstreet were remov'd to a new Compter made in Woodstreet, of the City's purchase and building; the which removing was confirm'd by the Common-Council of the City.

IN the first Year of this Queen's Reign, all Bishops which had been depriv'd in the Time of King Edward the Sixth were restor'd to their Bishopricks, and the new remov'd; also all beneficed Men that were married, or would not forsake their Opinion, were put out of their Livings, and other of a contrary Opinion put in their rooms. Also this Year, on the 27th of of August, the Service began to be sung in Latin in Paul's Church. Also this Year the Pope's Authority was by Act of Parliament restored in England, and the Mass commanded in all Churches to be used. In her second Year the Realm was absolv'd, and reconciled to the Church of Rome by Cardinal Pool, and First-fruits and Tenths were restor'd to the Clergy; but this was soon revoked, the Council finding the Necessity of it for the Queen's Support. In her fourth year Monasteries were begun to be re-edified, of which number were that of Westminster, that of Sheen and Sion, that of Black-fryers, and the Fryers of Greenwich. Of the number of those that died for Religion in her Time, there are recorded five Bishops, twenty-one Divines, and of all sorts of Men and Women two hundred threescore and seventeen.

THIS Queen restor'd a great part of Abbey-Lands that were in her possession, and if she had liv'd longer, very likely she would have restor'd more. In her first Year Sir Thomas White, then Mayor, erected a College in Oxford, now call'd St. John's College; before, Bernard College. He also erected Schools at Bristol and Reading, and gave Two thousand pounds to the City of Bristol, to purchase Lands, the Profits whereof to be employ'd for the benefit of young Clothiers for ten Years; and after that, to be employ'd in like manner to the benefit of 22 other Shires and Cities. In her third Year died Sir John Gresham, late Mayor of London, who founded a Free-School at Holt in Norfolk, and gave to every Ward in London Ten pounds, to be distributed to the Poor; also to Maids Marriages Two hundred pounds. Cuthbert Tonstall, Bishop of Durham, erected a goodly Library in Cambridge, storing it with many excellent both printed and written Books; he also bestow'd much upon building at Durham, Alnwick, and Tunbridge.

St. John's College in Oxford founded.

IN her first year, on the 27th of August, the goodliest Ship in England, call'd The Great Harry, being of the Burthen of a thousand Tun, was burnt at Woolwich, by Negligence of the Mariners. In her second year, on the 15th of February, appear'd in the Sky a Rainbow revers'd, the Bow turning downward, and the two Ends standing upward: Also two Suns shined at one time a good distance asunder; which were taken for ill Signs. This year also, in the Month of August, at a place in Suffolk, by the Sea-side, all of hard Stone and Pebble, lying between the Towns of Orford and Aldborough, where never Grass grew, nor any Earth was ever seen, there chanc'd suddenly to spring up, without any tillage or sowing, so great abundance of Peason, that the Poor gather'd above a hundred Quarters; yet there remain'd some ripe, and some blossoming, as many as were before. In her fourth year hot-burning Agues and other strange Diseases took away much People, so as between the 20th of October and the last of December, there died seven Aldermen, namely, Henry Heardson, Sir Richard Dobbs late Mayor, Sir William Laxton late Mayor, Sir Henry Hobblethorn late Mayor, Sir John Champneis late Mayor, Sir John Ayleph late Mayor, and Sir John Gresham late Mayor. In this year, before Harvest, Wheat was sold for four Marks the quarter, Malt at 2 l. 4 s. the quarter, and Pease at 2 l. 6 s. and 8 d. where, after Harvest, Wheat was sold for 5 s. the quarter, Malt at 6 s. 8 d. Rye at 3 s. 4 d. a quarter: In the Country, Wheat was sold for 4 s. the quarter, Malt at 4 s. 8 d. and, in some places, a bushel of Rye for a pound of Candles, which was 4 d. In her fifth year, within a Mile of Nottingham, so marvellous a Tempest of Thunder hapned, that it beat down all the Houses and Churches thereabouts, cast the Bells to the outside of the Church-yard, and some Webs of Lead 400 foot into the Field, writhen as it had been Leather: The River of Trent running between the two Towns, the Water, with the Mud in the bottom, was carried a quarter of a Mile, and cast against Trees, with the violence whereof the Trees were pull'd up by the Roots and cast twelve yards off: Also a Child was taken forth of a Man's Hand, and carried two Spears length high, and then let fall two hundred foot off, of which Fall it died; five or six Men thereabouts were slain, and neither Flesh nor Skin perish'd: Also there fell some Hailstones that were 15 inches about. This year also in Harvest-time was a great Mortality, especially of Priests, so as many Churches were unserv'd, and much Corn was lost in the Field for want of Workmen, whereupon ensued a great scarcity, so that Corn was sold for 14 s. a quarter, and Wood sold in London for 13 s. a thousand of Billets, and Coals 10 d. a sack. Also this year, on the last of September, fell so great store of Rain, that Westminster-Hall was full of Water, and Boats were row'd over Westminster-Bridge into Kings-Street.

OF her Personage we can make no particular Description, only we may say, she was none of the most amiable, but yet without Deformity: But of her Conditions we may say, she was not without Deformity, and yet was very amiable. If we count her Religion a Deformity, yet her Constancy and Devotion in it we must needs count a Beauty. If it were a Deformity to promise the Suffolk-men not to alter their Religion, which King Edward had establish'd, yet it was certainly a pious Dissembling, Cretizare cum Cretensibus; and Equivocation (will some say) was there a Virtue, where she deceiv'd 'em into Truth, and did 'em good against their wills. And as for her Sister Elizabeth, if she did not love her, 'twas but a Quality hereditary in her, for their Mothers did not love one another before; and indeed not without some cause in both, for as those upbraided each others Marriage, so these each others Birth. We shall not do her Right, if we deny her to be of a merciful Disposition, seeing oftentimes she pitied the Person where she shed the Blood. She could have found in her Heart to have spared the Lady Jane's Life, if Ragion di Stato had not been against it; and she did spare her Father the Duke of Suffolk's Life, till his second Offence gave her just provocation. The goodness of her Nature might be seen in the badness of her Fortune, who took nothing so much to heart as unkindness of Friends; the Revolt of Calais, and the Absence of King Philip, being the two chief Causes that brought her to her end.

THE Conceit of her being with Child had kept Physicians from looking into the state of her Body, so that her Distemper, at first neglected, brought her by degrees into a Dropsy, to which was added a Fever, brought upon her by a double Grief, one for the long absence of King Philip, (who had now been away a year and a half) the other, and perhaps the greater, for the loss of Calais; as she forbore not to say to some about her, That if they look'd into her Heart, being dead, they should find Calais there. She began to fall sick in September, and died at her Mannor of St. James on the 17th of November, 1558, having reign'd five years, four months, and eleven days; liv'd 43 years. Her Body was interr'd in a Chapel in the Minster of St. Peter's Church at Westminster, without any Monument or other Remembrance.

OF Men of Valour in her Time there were many, as may be seen in the Story of her Reign; but to name some for example, there was William Herbert Earl of Pembroke, chief Assistant of King Philip in winning St. Quintins; there was William Lord Gray of Wilton, Captain of Guisnes, who tho' he yielded the Town, 'twas more out of tenderness to his Soldiers than fear of his Enemies, which he never else would have yielded up. And, to speak of one of a meaner rank, there was Sir Anthony Ager, who in defence of the Town of Calais lost his Life, but not till he made the Enemy turn their backs and fly. Of Learned Men also there were very many; as, John Rogers, born in Lancashire, who translated the Bible into English with Notes; Richard Moryson Knight, born in Oxfordshire, who wrote divers Treatises; Robert Record Doctor of Physick, who wrote a Book of Arithmetick; Cuthbert Tonstall, of a worshipful Family in Lancashire, tho' base born, whose Ancestor came into England with the Conqueror as his Barber, and therefore hath three Combs his Arms, Bishop first of London, and after of Durham, who wrote divers learned Works: Richard Sampson Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, who wrote certain Treatises; Lucas Shepherd, born at Colchester in Essex, an English Poet; Jane Dudley, Daughter to Henry Gray Duke of Suffolk, who wrote divers excellent Treatises; Will. Thomas a Welshman, who wrote the History of Italy, and other things; James Brooks and John Standish, both of them Writers in defence of the Pope's Doctrine; William Peryn a Black-Fryer, who wrote in defence of the Mass, as also divers Sermons; Henry Lord Stafford, Son to Edward Duke of Buckingham, who, among other things that he wrote, translated a Book out of Latin into English, entitled Utriusq; Potestatis Differentia, which Book (as some think) was first compiled by Edward Fox Bishop of Hereford; John Hopkins, who translated divers of David's Psalms into English Metre, which are to be found amongst those appointed to be sung in the Church.

In her first year,

Sir Thomas White was Mayor.

Thomas Offley, William Hewet, Sheriffs.

In her second year,

Sir John Lion was Mayor.

David Woodroffe, William Chester, Sheriffs.

In her third year,

Sir William Garret, or Gervard, was Mayor.

Thomas Lee, or Leigh, John Machel, Sheriffs.

In her fourth year,

Sir Thomas Offley was Mayor.

William Harper, John White, Sheriffs.

In her fifth year,

Sir Thomas Curteis was Mayor.

Richard Mallory, James Altham, Sheriffs.

In her sixth year,

Sir Thomas Lee, or Leigh, was Mayor.

QUEEN Mary dying on Thursday the Seventeenth of November, in the Year 1558, her Sister the Lady Elizabeth, of the age of Five and twenty Years, the only surviving Child of King Henry the Eighth, by undoubted Right succeeding her in the Crown; which happening in a time of Parliament, Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York, and Lord-Chancellor, sent to the Knights and Burgesses in the Lower-House, to repair immediately to the Lords of the Upper-House; to whom he signified, that Queen Mary was that Morning dead, and therefore he requir'd their Assents to joyn with the Lords in proclaiming Queen Elizabeth: Which accordingly was done by the sound of Trumpet, first at Westminster, and after in the City of London.

The Queen was then at Hatfield, from whence, on Wednesday the Three and twentieth of November, she remov'd to the Lord North's House in the Charter-house, where she staid till Monday the Eight and twentieth of November, and then rode in her Chariot thro' London to the Tower; where she continued till the Fifth of December, and then remov'd to Somerset-house in the Strand; from whence she went to her Palace at Westminster, and from thence, on the Twelfth of January, to the Tower, and on the Fourteenth of January to Westminster to her Coronation: Whither as she went she said this Prayer:

O Lord, Almighty and Everlasting God! I give thee most hearty Thanks that thou hast spared me to this joyful Day: And I acknowledge that Thou hast dealt as wonderfully and as mercifully with me as thou didst with thy faithful Servant Daniel, whom Thou deliveredst out of the Den, from the Cruelty of the raging Lyons; even so was I overwhelmed, and only by Thee deliver'd. To thee therefore only be Thanks, Honour, and Praise for ever.

And 'tis incredible what Pageants and Shews were made in the City as she pass'd. On Sunday the Five and twentieth of January she was crown'd in the Abbey-Church at Westminster, by Dr. Oglethorp Bishop of Carlisle, with all Solemnities and Ceremonies in such Case accustomed.

At this time, to honour her Coronation, she conferr'd more Honour than in all her Time after: William Parre, degraded by Queen Mary, she made Marquis of Northampton; Edward Seymour, whose Father had been attainted, she made Earl of Hartford; Thomas Howard, second Son to the Duke of Norfolk, she made Viscount Bindon; Sir Henry Carew, her Cousin-german, she made Baron of Hunsdon; and Sir Oliver Saint-John she made Baron of Bletsoe.

Divers Lords created.

And now the Queen, tho' she were her self very wise, yet would not trust (and 'twas a great point of Wisdom that she would not trust) to her own Wisdom, and therefore she chose Councillors to assist her; in which number she took Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York, William Pawlet Marquis of Winchester, Lord High-Treasurer, Henry Fitz-Allen Earl of Arundel, Francis Talbot Earl of Sbrewsbury, Edward Stanley Earl of Derby, William Herbert Earl of Pembroke, Edward Lord Clinton Lord-Admiral, and William Lord Howard of Effingham, Sir Thomas Cheyney, Sir William Petre, Sir Richard Sackville, and Nicholas Winton Dean of Canterbury; all which had been Councillors to Queen Mary, and were of her Religion. But then, to make a counterpoise of Councillors of her own Religion, she joyn'd with them William Parre Marquis of Northampton, Francis Russel Earl of Bedford, Sir Thomas Parvey, Sir Edward Rogers, Sir Ambrose Cave, Sir Francis Knolles, and Sir William Cecil, late Secretary to King Edward the Sixth; and, a little after, Sir Nicholas Bacon, whom she made Keeper of the Great Seal. And having thus provided for her State at home, she seeks Correspondence with Princes abroad. To the Emperor Ferdinand she sent in Embassage Sir Thomas Chaloner; to the King of Spain, in the Low-Countries, the Lord Cobham; to the Princes in Germany, Sir Henry Killigrew; Sir Armigill Wade to the Duke of Holstein, and another Ambassador to the King of Denmark. There were also Ambassadors sent to the Pope, to the State of Venice, and to the

the French King, with whom at this time there was a Treaty of Peace holden at Cambray, between the Kingdoms of France, England, and Spain; where for England were employ'd the Earl of Arundel, Thursby Bishop of Ely, and Dr. Wotton Dean of Canterbury, with whom William Lord Howard of Effingham was joyn'd by a new Commission.

As soon as King Philip heard of the Death of his Wife Queen Mary, partly out of Considerations of State, and partly out of Affection of Love, he solicited Queen Elizabeth by his Ambassador the Earl of Feria, to joyn in Marriage with himself; it being no more for two Sisters to have successively one Husband, than was done before, for two Brothers to have successively one Wife; and for this he promis'd to procure a Dispensation from the Pope. To which Motion the Queen, tho' she well knew that to allow a Dispensation in this case to be sufficient, were to make her own Birth illegitimate, yet to so great a Prince, and who in her Sister's time had done her many Favours, she would not return so blunt an Answer, but putting the Ambassador off for the present in modest terms, she conceiv'd there could be no better Way to take him off clean from further suit, than by bringing in an alteration of Religion; which yet she would not do all at once, and upon the sudden, (as knowing the great danger of sudden Changes) but by little and little, and by degrees: As, at first she permitted only Epistles and Gospels, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Creed, to be read to the People in the English Tongue; in all other Matters they were to follow the Roman Rite and Custom, until Order could be taken for establishment of Religion by Authority of Parliament; and a severe Proclamation was set forth, prohibiting all Points of Controversie to be meddled with: By which means she both put the Protestants in Hope, and put not the Papists out of Hope. Yet privately she committed the correcting of the Book of Common-Prayer, set forth in the English Tongue under King Edward the Sixth, to the Care and Diligence of Dr. Parker, Bill, May, Cox, Grindall, Whitehead, and Pilkington, Divines of great Learning, with whom she joyn'd Sir Thomas Smith, a learned Knight; but the matter carried so closely, that it was not communicated to any but to the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Bedford, and Sir William Cecil.

The 22d of March the Use of the Lord's Supper, in both kinds, was by Parliament allow'd. The 24th of June the Sacrifice of the Mass was abolish'd, and the Liturgy in the English Tongue establish'd; tho' (as some say) but with the difference of six Voices. In July the Oath of Supremacy was propounded to the Bishops and others; and in August Images were remov'd out of Churches, and broken or burnt. By these degrees Religion was changed; and yet the Change, to the wonder of the World, bred no disturbance; which, if it had been done at once, and on a sudden, would hardly, at least not without dangerous Opposition, have been admitted.

During this time a Parliament had been summon'd to begin at Westminster upon the 15th of January; and now the Queen, for satisfaction of the People, appointed a Conference to be held between the Prelates of the Realm and Protestant Divines now newly return'd, who had fled the Realm in the time of Queen Mary. For the Prelates were chosen John White Bishop of Winchester; Ralph Bayne, Bishop of Conventry and Litchfield; Thomas Watson, Bishop of Lincoln; Dr. Cole, Dean of Pauls; Dr. Langdell, Archdeacon of Lewes; Dr. Harpfield, Archdeacon of Canterbury; and Dr. Chadsey, Archdeacon of Middlesex. For the Protestant side were appointed Dr. Story, Dr. Cox, Dr. Sands, Dr. Whitehead, Dr. Grindall, Mr. Horne, Mr. Gueft, Mr. Elmer, and Mr. Jewel. The place was prepar'd in Westminster Church; where, besides the Disputants, were present the Lords of the Queen's Council, with other of the Nobility, as also many of the Lower-House of Parliament. The Articles propounded against the Prelates and their Adherents were these: First, That it is against the Word of God, and the Custom of the ancient Church, to use a Tongue unknown to the People in Common-prayer, and in the Administration of the Sacrament. Secondly, That every Church hath Authority to appoint and change Ceremonies and Ecclesiastical Rites, so they be to Edification. Thirdly, That it cannot be prov'd by the Word of God that there is in the Mass a Sacrifice propitiatory for the Living and the Dead. For the manner of their Conference, it was agreed it should be perform'd in Writing; and, that the Bishops should deliver in their Writing first. The last of March was the first Day of their meeting; where, contrary to the Order, the Bishops brought nothing in Writing, but said they would deliver their Minds only by Speech. This breaking of Order much displeas'd the Lords, yet they had it granted. Then rose up Dr. Cole, and made a large Declaration concerning the first Point: When he had ended the Lords demanded if any of 'em had more to say; who answer'd, No. Then the Protestant Party exhibited a written Book, which was distinctly read by Mr. Horne. This done, some of the Bishops began to affirm, they had much more to say in the first Article. This again much displeas'd the Lords, yet this also was granted them to do at their next meeting the Monday after; but when Monday came, so many other Differences arose between them, that the Conference broke off, and nothing determin'd: But in the Parliament there was better agreement; for there it was enacted, That Queen Elizabeth was the lawful and undoubted Queen of England, notwithstanding a Law made by her Father King Henry the Eighth, that excluded her and her Sister Mary from the Crown, seeing, tho' the Law be not repeal'd, yet it is a Principle in Law, that the Crown once gain'd, taketh away all Defects. Also in this Parliament First-fruits and Tithes were restor'd to the Crown; and the Title of Supreme Head of the Church of England was confirm'd to the Queen, with so universal Consent, that in the Upper-House none oppos'd these Laws but only the Earl of Shrewsbury and Sir Anthony Brown Viscount Montague; and in the Lower-House, only some few of Papal Inclina-

Inclination murmur'd, saying, that the Parliament was pack'd; and, that the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Arundel, and Sir William Cecil, for their own ends, had cunningly begg'd Volces, to make up their Party.

The Oath of Supremacy readily taken by all but a few, and who they were,

Supremacy thus confirm'd to the Queen, the Oath was soon after tender'd to the Bishops and others; of whom as many as refus'd to take it were presently depriv'd of their Livings. And that we may see how inclining the Kingdom at this time was to receive the Protestant Religion; 'tis said, that in the whole Realm (wherein are reckon'd above Nine thousand spiritual Promotions) there were no more that refus'd to take the Oath than only fourscore Parsons, fifty Prebendaries, fifteen Masters of Colleges, twelve Archdeacons, twelve Deans, six Abbots, and fourteen Bishops, (indeed all that were at that time, except Anthony Bishop of Landaffe) as, Nicholas Heath Archbishop of York, Edmund Bonner Bishop of London, Cuthbert Tonsil Bishop of Durham, Thomas Thursby Bishop of Ely, Gilbert Lorne Bishop of Bath and Wells, John Christopherson Bishop of Chichester, John White Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Watson Bishop of Lincoln, Ralph Bayne Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, Owen Ogletborp Bishop of Carlisle, James Turberville Bishop of Exeter, and David Pool Bishop of Peterborough, and with these Dr. Fecknam Abbot of Westminster: All which were at first committed to Prison, but soon after deliver'd to the custody of private Friends, excepting those two sawcy Prelates, Lincoln and Winchester, who threatned to excommunicate the Queen. Three only, namely, Cuthbert Scot Bishop of Chester, Richard Pate Bishop of Worcester, and Thomas Goldwell Bishop of St. Asaph, chang'd their Religion of their own accord; as also did certain Noble Personages, namely, Henry Lord Morley, Sir Francis Englefield, and Sir Robert Peckham, (who had been Privy-Councillors to Queen Mary) Sir Thomas Shelly, and Sir John Gage.

Papal Bishops remov'd, and Protestants placed in their rooms,

In the Sees of the Prelates remov'd were placed Protestant Bishops; as, Matthew Parker was made Archbishop of Canterbury, (who was consecrated by the Imposition of the Hands of three that formerly had been Bishops, namely, William Barlow of Bath and Wells, John Scorey of Chichester, and Miles Coverdale of Exeter) and being consecrated himself, he afterward consecrated Edmund Grindal Bishop of London, Richard Cox Bishop of Ely, Edwin Sands Bishop of Worcester, Rowland Merick Bishop of Bangor, Thomas Young Bishop of St. Davids, Nicholas Bullingham Bishop of Lincoln, John Jewel Bishop of Salisbury, Richard Davis Bishop of St. Asaph, Edward Guesf Bishop of Rochester, Gilbert Barksley Bishop of Bath and Wells, Thomas Bentham Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, William Alley Bishop of Exeter, John Parkhurst Bishop of Norwich, Robert Horne Bishop of Winchester, Richard Cheyney Bishop of Gloucester, Edmund Scambler Bishop of Peterborough, William Barlow Bishop of Chichester, John Scorey Bishop of Hereford, Young Archbishop of York, James Pilkington Bishop of Durham, John Best Bishop of Carlisle, and William Downham Bishop of Chester.

Whilst these things were done in England, the Treaty of Peace at Cambray continued still, wherein King Philip stood for the restitution of Calais to the English, as firmly as if it had been his own Interest, and without it would agree to no Peace with France. But when by Meilages he understood that his suit for Marriage with Queen Elizabeth was rejected, and that the Protestant Religion was establish'd in the Kingdom, he then left Queen Elizabeth, seeing she would not be his, to her self; and tho' he became not presently a Foe, yet he became presently less than a Friend, and forbore to do any more good Offices in that Business.

Queen Elizabeth, thus left to her self, agreed with the French King, to conclude her own Peace apart; and thereupon Delegates on both sides were appointed to meet at Cambray: For the Queen of England were Thursby Bishop of Ely, the Lord Williams, the Lord Howard of Effingham, Chamberlain to the Queen, and Dr. Wotton Dean of Canterbury and York: For the King of France were Charles Cardinal of Lorraine the first Peer of France, Anne Duke of Momcrancy, James Allon Lord of St Andrews, John Marvilliers Bishop of Orleans, and Claude Aubespine Secretary to the Privy-Council.

The Commissioners meeting, the chief point in difference was the Restitution of Calais, for which the English Commissioners, by the Queen's appointment, offer'd to remit Two millions of Crowns, that by just account were due from France to England; but the Queen was not more desirous to recover Calais than the French King was to hold it; and thereupon at last it was concluded, That Calais should remain in the possession of the French for the term of Eight Years; and those expir'd, it should be deliver'd to the English, upon forfeiture of Five hundred thousand Crowns, for which Hostages were given.

But all this notwithstanding, tho' the Conditions were seal'd and sworn to, and tho' Hostages were assign'd to remain in England till one or other were perform'd, yet all was frustrate, and came to nothing.

About this time Henry King of France married his Daughter Isabel to Philip King of Spain, and his Sister Margaret to Emmanuel Philibert Duke of Savoy; at the solemnity of which Marriages he would needs be a Tilter himself, and thereupon commanded the Earl of Montgomery to run against him; who unfortunately breaking his Launce upon the King's Curiafs, a Splinter thereof (his Beaver being somewhat open) struck him so deep in the Eye, that within a few Days he ended his Life; after whose Death Francis his Son, at the age of sixteen Years, succeeded him in the Crown, having by the Marriage of Queen Mary the Title of Scotland, and upon ground thereof laying Claim to the Crown of England also, and giving the Arms of England, as properly belonging to him.

And now begins the Game of Faction to be play'd, wherein the whole State of Queen Elizabeth lies at stake; a Game that will hold playing the most part of her Reign, and if not play'd well, will put her in jeopardy of losing all, seeing all about her were against her. Philip of Spain hath a Quarrel to her, for being rejected in his Suit: The King of France hath a Quarrel to her in right of his Wife, which is now his Right: The Queen of Scots hath a Quarrel to her for detaining her Inheritance: The Pope hath a Quarrel to her for excluding his Authority: The King of Sweden hath a Quarrel to her for slighting his Son in the way of Marriage. And all these being against her, whom hath she on her Side but her own Subjects, Papists yesterday, and to-day Protestants! who being scarce settled in their Religion, how shall they be settled in their Loyalty? And, not being loyal, where can she find to cast Anchor for her Safety? But 'tis a true Saying, Nullum nomen adest, si sit Prudentia; Wisdom is a Supply for all Defects: And indeed the Queen being very wise in her self, and having a wise Council about her, she surmounted all these Difficulties, tho' not without danger, yet with little or no hazard.

It happen'd (if at least it happen'd, and were not rather plotted on purpose) that a Reformation of Religion was pretended in Scotland, but was indeed an Encroachment upon the Prince's Authority; for at the preaching of John Knox, and other headstrong Ministers, not only Images and Altars were cast down and burnt, the Monasteries of St. Andrews, of Scone, of Strive-ling, and of Linlithgow were overthrown, but it was further put into the Heads of the Nobility, that it pertain'd to them, of their own Authority, to take away Idolatry, and by force to reduce the Prince to the prescript of Laws: Whereupon there was presently a bandying of the Lords of Scotland against the Queen-Dowager, Regent of the Country; and in this Case each of 'em fought for Aid. The Queen-Dowager had Aid out of France, the Lords of Scotland sent for Aid to the Queen of England; but this was matter of Consultation. It seem'd a bad Example, for a Prince to give Aid to rebellious Subjects of another Prince: On the other side, it seem'd no less than Impiety not to give Aid to Protestants of the same Religion; but most of all, it seem'd plain Madness to suffer Adversaries to be so near Neighbours, and let the French nestle in Scotland, who pretend Title to England. Upon such Considerations 'twas resolv'd to send them Aid: And thereupon an Army of Six thousand Foot, and Twelve hundred Horse, was sent under the Command of the Duke of Norfolk, the Lord Gray of Wilton his Lieutenant-General, Sir James Crofts Assistant to him, the Lord Scroop Lord-Marshal, Sir George Howard General of the Men at Arms, Sir Henry Piercy General of the Light-Horse, Thomas Huggens Provost-Marshal, Thomas Gower Master of the Ordnance, Mr. William Pelham Captain of the Pioneers, and Mr. Edward Randal Serjeant-Major, and others. These coming into Scotland, joyn'd with the Scottish Lords, and set down before Leith; where pass'd many small Skirmishes, many Batteries, and sometimes Assaults; to whom, after some time, a new Supply came of above Two thousand Foot, whereof were Captains Sir Andrew Corbet, Sir Rowland Stanley, Sir Thomas Hesbith, Sir Arthur Manwaring, Sir Lawrence Smith, and others; yet with this Supply there was little more done than before, many light Skirmishes, many Batteries, and sometimes Assaults; so long, till at last the young French King, finding these Broils of Scotland to be too furious for him to appease, he sent to the Queen of England, desiring that Commissioners might be sent to reconcile these Differences: Whereupon were dispatch'd into Scotland, Sir William Cecil, her principal Secretary, with Dr. Wotton Dean of Canterbury, who concluded a Peace between England and France upon these Conditions: That neither the King of France, nor the Queen of Scotland, should thenceforth use the Arms or Titles of England or Ireland; and, That both the English and the French should depart out of Scotland, and a general Pardon should be enacted by Parliament for all such as had been Actors in those Stirs.

This Peace was scarce concluded when Francis K. of France died, leaving the Crown to his younger Brother Charles, who was guided altogether by the Queen-Mother, and molested with the Civil-Dissentions between the Princes of Guise and Conde; for whose Reconcilement the Queen sent Sir Henry Sydney, Lord-President of Wales; and shortly after an Army, under the Leading of the Lord Ambrose Dudley Earl of Warwick; who arriving at New-haven, was receiv'd into the Town.

About this time, when the Parliament was upon dissolving, it was agreed upon by the House of Commons to move the Queen to marry, that she might have Issue to succeed her. To which purpose Thomas Gargrave, Speaker of the House, with some few other chosen Men, had access to the Queen, who humbly made the Motion to her, a thing which the Kingdom infinitely desir'd, seeing they could never hope to have a better Prince than out of her Loins: Whereunto the Queen answer'd in effect thus: That she was already married, namely, to the Kingdom of England; and behold (saith she) the Pledge of the Covenant with my Husband; and thereupon she held out her Finger, and shew'd the Ring wherewith at the time of her Coronation she gave herself in Wedlock to the Kingdom: And if (saith she) I keep my self to this Husband, and take no other, I doubt not but God will send you as good Kings as if they were born of me; forasmuch as we see by daily Experience that the Issue of the best Princes do often degenerate. And for my self, it shall be sufficient that a Marble Stone declare, that a Queen having reign'd such a time, liv'd and died a Virgin.

Indeed, before this time, many Matches had been offer'd her: First, King Philip; and when he was out of hope of matching with her himself, he then dealt with the Emperor Ferdinand his Uncle, to commend his younger Son Charles Duke of Austria to her for a Husband. And when this succeeded not, then John Duke of Finland, second Son to Gustavus King of Sweden was sent by his Father, to sollicite for his eldest Brother Ericus, who was honourably receiv'd, but the Match rejected. Then Adolphus Duke of Holstein, Uncle to Frederick King of Denmark, came into England, upon a great hope of speeding, but the Queen bestow'd upon him the Honour of the Garter, and a yearly Pension, but not herself. Then James Earl of Arran was commended to her by the Protestants of Scotland, but neither neither the Man nor the Motion was accepted. Of meaner Fortunes there were some at Home that pleas'd themselves with hopes of her Marriage: First, Sir William Pickering, a Gentleman of a good House, and a good Estate; but what most commended him was, his studiousness of Letters, and sweet demeanor. Then Henry Earl of Arundel, exceeding rich, but now in his declining age. Then Robert Dudley, youngest Son of the Duke of Northumberland, of an excellent Feature of Face, and now in the flower of his age. But these might please themselves with their own conceit, but were not considerable in her apprehension; they might receive from her good testimonies of her Princely favour, but never pledges of her Nuptial love.

Great Offers made by the Pope to the Queen, if she would become a Papist.

About this time the Earl of Feria, (who had married the Daughter of Sir William Dormer) being denied Leave of the Queen for some of his Wife's friends to live out of England, grew so incens'd, that he made means to Persuade the 4th, then Pope, to have her excommunicated as an Heretick and Usurper: But the Pope, inclining rather to save than to destroy, and knowing that gentle Courses prevail more with generous Minds than Roughness and Violence, in most loving manner wrote unto her, exhorting her to turn to the Unity of the Catholick Church; and, as is said, made her great Offers, if she would hearken to his Counsel; particularly, that he would recall the Sentence pronounc'd against her Mother's Marriage, confirm the Book of Common-prayer in English, and permit to her People the Use of the Sacrament in both kinds. But Q. Elizabeth, neither terrified with the Earl of Feria's Practices, nor alured with the Pope's great Offers, according to her Motto, semper eadem, persisted constant in her Resolution to maintain that Religion which in her Conscience she was persuaded to be most agreeable to the Word of God, and most consonant to the Primitive Church.

But she persisted constant in her Religion.

Whilst these Grounds of Troubles are sowing in England, France, and Scotland, it is not likely that Ireland will lie fallow, tho' indeed it be a Country that will bring forth Troubles of it self, without sowing; but however, to make the more plentiful harvest of Troubles at this time, John O-Neal, (whose Father K. Henry VIII made Earl of Tyrone) to prevent the punishment of a private Outrage upon a Brother, broke into open Rebellion against the Prince; and tho' his Attempts were maturely made frustrate by timely Opposition, yet this was he that in the beginning of the Queen's Reign sow'd the Seeds of that Trouble in Ireland, which afterward took so deep root, that till the ending of her Reign it could never thoroughly be rooted out; tho' this Man, a Year or two after, came into England, and casting himself at the Queen's Feet, acknowledged his Fault, and obtain'd Pardon.

Q. Elizabeth requires the Treaty of Edinburgh to be confirm'd by the Queen Dowager, and her Answer.

The Treaty of Edinburgh should by promise have been confirm'd by Francis the French King while he liv'd, but he not having done it, Queen Elizabeth requires his Dowager the Queen of Scots to confirm it; but she, solicited often to it by Throgmorton, the Queen's Leiger in France, made always answer, She could not do't without the Counsel of her Nobility in Scotland. Whereupon Queen Elizabeth suspecting that this Answer was but to hold her in amusement while some mischief was practising against her, sent Sir Thomas Randal into Scotland, to persuade the Lords there to enter into a League of mutual Amity with her and other Protestant Princes; and farther, by no means to permit their Queen, now a Widow, to marry again to any foreign Prince; for which she alledg'd many great Reasons. In the mean while the Queen of Scots, purposing to return again into Scotland, sent beforehand d'Oysette, a French Lord, to entreat Queen Elizabeth, that with her Leave she her self might pass by Sea into Scotland, and d'Oysette might pass by Land; but Queen Elizabeth openly denied both the one and the other, unless she would confirm the Treaty at Edinburgh, saying, It was no reason she should do the Queen of Scots courtesie, if the Queen of Scots would not do her right.

The Queen of Scots, much troubled at this Answer, expostulates the matter with her Leiger Throgmorton, and much complains of the unkindness; but in the mean time providing Shipping, she loosed from Calais, and under couvert of a Mist, notwithstanding Ships were laid to intercept her, she arriv'd safe in Scotland, where she treated her Subjects in so loving a manner, that she gave great contentment to the whole Kingdom, as well to the Protestant Party as the other, and then sent Letters to Queen Elizabeth, proffering all Observance, and readiness to enter League with her, so she might by authority of Parliament be declar'd her Successor, which was but her Right. To this Queen Elizabeth answer'd, That tho' she would no way derogate from her Right, yet she should be loth to endanger her own security, and as 'twere to cover her own Eyes with a Grave-cloth while she was alive; and then fell to her old Admonition, requiring her to confirm the Treaty of Edinburgh. And now, to shew the respect she bore her, when her Uncles the Dukes d'Aumale, d'Elbeuf, and other Lords of France, that had brought her home, return'd thro' England, she gave them most bountiful and loving Entertainment.

The Queen of Scots passes safely into Scotland, tho' laid wait for to be intercepted.

She offers all Observance to Q. Elizabeth, so she might be declar'd her Successor.

These two Queens indeed were both of great Spirits, and both very wise, but there grew such Jealousies of State between 'em, (the Queen of Scots doubting lest Queen Elizabeth meant to frustrate her Succession, Qu. Eliz. doubting lest the other meant to frustrate her Succession) that it kept them more asunder in Love than they were near in Blood, and was cause of many unkind passages between 'em; in all which, tho' the Q. of Scots was a very near Match to the Q. of Eng. in the abilities of her Mind, yet in the favours of Fortune she was much her Inferior.

But now for all the Courtesie which Queen Elizabeth shew'd to the Queen of Scots's Uncles, at their returning thro' England, yet new practices were again set on foot against her at Rome, the Duke of Guise especially labouring to have her excommunicated: But Pope Pius, still averse to such roughness, meant to try the Queen another way, and thereupon sent the Abbot Martinuzzi: And when he might not be admitted to enter England, then caus'd the Bishop of Viterbo, his Nuncio in France, to deal earnestly with the Queen's Leiger Throgmorton, that she (as other Princes had done) would send her Orators to the Council of Trent, which he before had call'd: But the Queen, nothing rendring this this point, made peremptory answer, That a Papish Assembly she did not acknowledge to be a General Council; nor did she think the Pope to have any more right or power to call it than any other Bishop. This Answer not only exasperated the Pope, but also alienated the K. of Spain's mind from her, that he was never after so kind a friend to her as he had been; and none of her Ambassadors ever after had any great liking to be employed to him. And now, as the Abbot Martinenghi was the last Nuncio that ever was sent from the Pope into England, so Sir Edward Carne now dying at Rome, was the last Leiger that ever was sent to the Pope from the Kings of England.

And now Queen Elizabeth knowing well that she had drawn many ill-willers against her State, she endeavour'd to strengthen it by all the means she could devise. She caused many great Ordnance of Brasse and Iron to be cast: She repair'd Fortifications on the Borders of Scotland: She increas'd the number of Ships, so as England never had such a Navy before: She provided great store of Armour and Weapons out of Germany: She caused Musters to be held, and Youth to be train'd in exercises of Artillery; and to please the People (whose love is the greatest strength of all) she gave leave to have Corn and Grain transported, and call'd in all base Coins and brasse Money.

Divers great Persons question'd and condemn'd, but had their Lives spar'd.

It was now the Fifth Year of Qu. Elizabeth's Reign, when divers great persons were call'd in question: Margaret Countess of Lenox, Neice to King Henry VIII, by his eldest Sister, and her Husband the Earl of Lenox, for having had secret Conference by Letters with the Queen of Scots, were deliver'd Prisoners to Sir Richard Sackville Master of the Rolls, and with him kept a while in custody. Also Arthur Pool and his Brother, whose Great Grandfather was George Duke of Clarence, Brother to King Edward IV. Anthony Fortescue, who had married their Sister, and others, were arraign'd for conspiring to withdraw themselves to the Duke of Guise in France, and from thence to return with an Army into Wales, to declare the Queen of Scots Queen of England, and Arthur Pool Duke of Clarence; which particulars they confess'd at the Bar, and were thereupon condemn'd to die, but had their Lives spar'd in regard they were of the Blood Royal. Also the Lady Katherine Gray, Daughter to Henry Gray Duke of Suffolk, by the eldest Daughter of Charles Brandon, having formerly been married to the Earl of Pembroke's eldest Son, and from him soon after lawfully divorced, was some years after found to be with Child by Edward Seymour Earl of Hartford; who being at that time in France, was presently sent for, and being examin'd before the Archbishop of Canterbury, and affirming they were lawfully married, but not being able, within a limited time, to produce Witnesses of their Marriage, were both committed to the Tower, where she was brought to bed; and after, by the connivance or corruption of their Keepers, being suffer'd sometimes to come together, she was with Child by him again, which made the Queen more angry than before, so that Sir Edward Warner, Lieutenant of the Tower, was put out of his place, and the Earl was fined in the Star-Chamber Five thousand pounds, and kept in Prison Nine Years after; tho' in pleading of his Case one John Hales argued they were lawful Man and Wife, by vertue of their own bare consent, without any Ecclesiastical Ceremony. The Lady a few years after falling thro' grief into a mortal Sickness, humbly desir'd the Queen's Pardon for having married without her knowledge, and commending her Children to her Clemency, died in the Tower.

At this time (the King being under-age) Dissensions among the Peers grew hot in France, of which there were two Factions, both pretending the cause of Religion: Of one the Duke of Guise (a Papist) was Head; of t'other the Prince of Conde a Protestant: But while, delirant Reges, plectuntur Achivi, these Princes are at variance, the People suffer for it, and chiefly the Protestant Party: Upon which Queen Elizabeth (having well learnt the Lesson, Tum tua res agitur, paries cum proximus ardet, and fearing lest the Flame of their Dissention might kindle a Fire within her own Kingdom) sent over Sir Henry Sydney, Lord-President of Wales, into France, to endeavour by all possible means their reconciliation: Which when he could not effect, (and perhaps 'twas never meant he should, but only to see what Invitation would be made to the Queen for her assistance) she thereupon at the moan of the afflicted Protestants, sent over an Army of 6000 Soldiers, under the Conduct of the Earl of Warwick, in assistance of the Prince of Conde and other Protestant Lords, who deliver'd to him the Town of Newhaven, to hold in the King of France's Name, until such time as Calais was restor'd: But the Prince of Conde marching to joyn with the English Forces, was by the Duke of Guise intercepted and taken Prisoner; which had been a great Disappointment to the English, but that the Adm. Caligny joyn'd with him, besieg'd Caen in Normandy, and took it, together with Bayeux, Falaise, and St. Loo. The French Hostages that were pledges for the payment of Five hundred thousand Crowns if Calais were not restor'd, were remaining still in England; who perceiving there was like to be War with France, prepar'd secretly to get away, but being ready to take shipping, were discover'd, and brought back again.

Qu. Elizabeth sends over an Army to assist the Protestants in France.

In the mean while the Prince of Conde, drawn on with a hope to marry the Queen of Scots, and to have the chief Government in France during the King's minority, concluded a Peace with the King and with the Guises, so as now all French, as well Protestants as Papists, requir'd to have Newhaven deliver'd up: But the Earl of Warwick perceiving the fickleness of the French Protestants, first to make suit to draw him into France, and now upon so slight occasion to require him to be gone, he shutteth all French, both Protestants and Papists, out of the Town, and lays hold of their Ships. The French on the other side make ready to set upon the Town, saying, They fought not now for Religion, but for their Country; wherefore 'twas mete that both Protestants and Papists should joyn their Forces, seeing they had already concluded a Peace betwixt themselves. And hereupon the Duke of Montmorancy sent a Trumpeter to the Earl of Warwick, commanding him to yield the Town; who making answer by Sir Hugh Pawlet, That he would never yield it without the Queen's Leave; he thereupon besieg'd the Town, and with a great violence of Battery sought to get it by force: Which

Which Queen Elizabeth hearing of, she sent a Commission to the Earl of Warwick to yeild it up, if upon honourable Conditions, which soon after was accordingly done, after the English had held it eleven Months: And then the Earl, without any Dishonour for yielding up a Town, which the Pestilence made him no less unwilling than unable to hold, return'd into England. But that which was more doleful than the loss of Newhaven, he brought the Pestilence with him into England. The Recovery of this Town not only made the French to triumph, but hereupon the Chancellor of France declar'd openly, That by this War the English had lost all their Right to Calais, and were not to require it any more, seeing it was one of the Conditions, that neither of the Nations should make War upon the other: Which was the Point stood upon by the King of France and his Mother, when Queen Elizabeth sent Sir Thomas Smith to demand Calais to be restor'd.

At this time there was such cross Designs amongst the Princes of Christendom, that a very good Politician could hardly understand their Aims. The Duke of Guise being slain in the Civil War, the Queen of Scots Dowry was not paid her in France, and the Scots were put off from being the King's Guard. This exceedingly displeas'd the Queen of Scots. But then to please her again, and for fear lest hereupon she should apply her self to the Friendship of the English, her Uncle the Cardinal of Lorraine solicites her afresh, to marry Charles Duke of Austria; offering for her Dowry the County of Tyrol.

The Queen of Scots requires Q. Elizabeth's Advice about her Marriage. Who persuades her to marry the Lord Robert Dudley. But this motion was scorn'd by her French Friends.

The Queen of Scots, to make use of her Uncle's fear, and perhaps to bring Q. Elizabeth into an opinion of depending upon her, acquaints her with this motion; and thereupon requires her Advice. Queen Elizabeth, not willing she should marry with any foreign Prince, persuades her to take a Husband out of England, and particularly commended to her the Lord Robert Dudley (whose Wife a little before had with a Fall broke her Neck;) promising withal, that if she would marry him, she should then by Authority of the Parliament be declar'd her Successor, in case she died without Issue. But when her Uncle and the Queen's Mother were inform'd of this motion, they so much disdain'd the Marriage with Dudley, that so she would refuse that Match, and persevere in the Friendship with the French; they offer'd to pay her the Dowry-money that was behind, and to restore the Scots to all their former Liberties in France. And as for the King of Spain, he had indeed a Leiger Ambassador here in England, but rather by way of Complement, and to watch Advantages, than for any sincere Love; which he began to withdraw from the English, as suspecting them to intend a Trade to the West-Indies.

It was now the sixth Year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, a Year fatal for the Death of many great Personages. First died William Lord Gray of Wilton, Governour of Berwick, a Man famous for his great Services in War; then William Lord Paget, a Man of as great Services in Peace, who by his great Deservings had wrought his Advancement to sundry Dignities and honourable Places; and tho' zealous in the Roman Religion, yet held by Queen Elizabeth in great Estimation to his dying-day: Then Henry Manners Earl of Rutland, descended by his Mother from King Edward the Fourth: And lastly, Frances the Dutchess of Suffolk, Daughter to Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, and Mother to Queen Jane.

And now Queen Elizabeth, finding how A Peace made with the King of France, and upon what Conditions. fickle the French Protestants had carried themselves towards her, intended to make a Peace; and to that end sent Sir Thomas Smith into France, joyning Throgmorton in Commission with him. And in conclusion, a Peace was agreed on; whereof, amongst other Articles this was one, That the Hostages in England, should be freed, upon the payment of Six hundred thousand Crowns. And this Peace was ratified by the Oath both of the Queen of England and the King of France.

About this time the English Merchants were hardly used both in Spain and in the Netherlands, upon pretence of Civil Differences, but indeed out of hatred to the Protestant Religion: Whereupon the English remov'd the Seat of their Trading to Emden in Friesland. But Gusman, the Spanish Leiger newly come into England, finding the great Damages that the Netherlands sustain'd by these Differences, endeavour'd by all means to compose them: And thereupon Viscount Montague, Nicholas Wotton, and Walter Haddon Master of the Requests, were sent to Bruges in Flanders; who, after many Interruptions, brought the Matter at last to some indifferent Agreement.

It was now the seventh Year of Queen Elizabeth, when making a Progress, she went to see Cambridge; where after she had view'd the Colleges, and been entertain'd with Comedies and Scholastical Disputations, she made herself a Latin Oration, to the great Encouragement of the Scholars, and then return'd. Presently after her return she made the Lord Robert Dudley Master of her Horse, first, Baron of Denbigh (given him Denbigh and all the Lands belonging to it) and then Earl of Leicester, to him and the Heirs-males of his Body, lawfully begotten: Which Honour was conferr'd upon him with the greatest State and Solemnity that ever was known. And now Leicester, to endear himself to the Queen of Scots, accus'd Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper, for being privy to the Libel of Hales, who affirmed the Right of the Crown to belong to the Family of Suffolk, in case the Queen should die without Issue: And thereupon was Bacon cast into Prison; till afterward, upon his Purgation, and the Mediation of Sir William Cecil, he was set at liberty, and restor'd to his Place.

And now for a while we must cast our Eyes upon Scotland, for that was now the Stage where all great Business of State were acted. Matthew Stuart Earl of Lenox, who had married Margaret Dowglas King Henry the Eighth's Neice by his eldest Sister, had been kept as an Exile in England now twenty Years. Him the Queen of Scots invites to come into Scotland, under pretence of restoring to him his ancient Patrimony; but indeed to confer with him about a Marriage with his Son the Lord Darnley; for he being reputed Heir of the Crown of England, next after herself, she thought, by matching with his Son, to strengthen her own Title, and to prevent the Hope of any other. Queen Elizabeth, upon Suit made by his Wife, gave the Earl leave to go, but soon after, suspecting what the Queen of Scots intent was in sending for him, she, to hinder the Proceeding, sent Sir Thomas Randal to her, to let her know, that if she proceeded in this Match, she would exceedingly wrong her self; for that it was a Match so much disliked by all the English, that she was fain to prorogue the Parliament, lest upon dislike thereof there should something be enacted against her Right of Succession: But if she would marry the Earl of Leicester, she should then by Parliament be declar'd her next Heir. Hereupon, in the Month of November, the Earl of Bedford and Sir Thomas Randal for Queen Elizabeth, the Earl of Murray and Liddington for the Queen of Scots, at Berwick enter'd into a Treaty concerning the Marriage with the Earl of Leicester. The English Commissioners urg'd the great Benefits that by this Match would accrew both to the Queen of Scots her self, and to the whole Kingdom of Scotland: The Scottish, on the other side, urg'd the great Disparagement it would be to the Queen of Scots, if, refusing the Offers made her of divers great Princes, she should match her self with so mean a Person as the Earl of Leicester. This matter held long debate, partly for that the English Commissioners were so appointed by Queen Elizabeth; and partly for that the Scottish Commissioners had a good mind to hinder her from marrying at all: And perhaps not the least, for that the Earl of Leicester being verily perswaded he should at last obtain Queen Elizabeth her self, by secret Letters warn'd the Earl of Bedford not to urge the Marriage with the Queen Scots too far; and was thought for this cause to favour Darnley under-hand. The Matter being in this manner protracted for two whole Years together, the Queen of Scots, impatient of longer delay, and being resolv'd in her Mind what she would do, used means, that the Lord Darnley got leave of Queen Elizabeth to go into Scotland for three Months only, under colour to be put in possession of his Father's Lands. (Tho' it be strange the Queen upon any terms would let him go, if she really intended to hinder the Marriage: But such was the Destiny, if there were not a Plot in it.) And so in February he came to Edinburgh; who being a young Man of not above nineteen Years of Age, of a comely Countenance, and most princely Presence, the Queen of Scots, as soon as she saw him, fell in love with him; yet modestly dissembling it for the present, she thought to get a Dispensation from the Rome, because of their nearness in Consanguinity. And now, her Inclination being grown so apparent, that there was no concealing it, she sent Liddington to Queen Elizabeth, desiring her consent. But she through the Suggestions of the Earl of Murray, being induc'd to believe that the Queen of Scotland's Intention was, by this Marriage to get the Crown of England, and to bring in Popery, enter'd into Consultation with her Privy

Hereupon Commissioners are sent to treat of this Marriage.

But the Commissioners cannot agree.

The Queen of Scots impatient of delay, gets the Lord Darnley to come into Scotland.

At first sight she falls in love with him.

And then sends to Queen Elizabeth for her consent to marry him.

Council, what was fit to be done to hinder the Marriage: Who all concluded that these were the best ways; First to have a Company of Soldiers levied for Terror sake about the Borders towards Scotland; then to commit to Prison the Countess of Lenox, the Lord Darnley's Mother; and to recal from Scotland the Earl of Lenox, and his Son Darnley, upon pain of the loss of all their Goods in England: Then that the Scots, who were known to be averse from the Marriage, should be reliev'd and assisted: And lastly, That Katherine Gray, with the Earl of Hartford, should be receiv'd into some Grace, about whom only (it was thought) the Queen of Scots was most solicitous, as being her Rival to the English Crown. Hereupon Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was sent to the Queen of Scots, to counsel her in the Queen's Name not to proceed in this Marriage; and to shew her the many Inconveniencies that would accrew unto her by it. But she return'd Anger, That the Matter was too far past to be recall'd; and that Queen Elizabeth had no cause to be displeas'd with it, seeing herein she follow'd her Advice, not to match with a Stranger, but with an Englishman born.

Queen Elizabeth, being inform'd of her Answer, calleth home the Earl of Lenox and the Lord Darnley his Son, commanding them upon their Allegiance to return. The Father modestly by Letters excuseth himself: The Son humbly entreateth her not to be a hinderance to his Preferment; which he vows to employ in her Majesty's Service, to the utmost of his Power.

And now, to make him the fitter Match for her, the Queen of Scots honour'd him with Knighthood, then with the Dignities of the Lord Armanack, Earl of Rosse, and the Duke of Rothsay; which Dukedom by Birth pertaineth to the eldest Sons of the Kings of Scotland.

After this, when he had not been above five Months in Scotland, she married him; and, with the Consent of most of the Peers, declar'd him King. At this the Earl of Murray, and others whom he drew to his Party, extremely fretted, and fell to moving of turbulent Questions; whether it were lawful to admit a Papist King: Whether the Queen of Scots might chuse a Husband at her own pleasure: And, whether the Peers of the Kingdom might not out of their own Authority impose one upon her. But however, they rais'd Arms, and had disturb'd the Nuptials, but that the Queen levied an Army to encounter them: With which she pursu'd them so closely, that they were fain to fly into England for Protection. Where Queen Elizabeth made no scruple to receive them, seeing the Queen of Scots had received Yardley, Standon and Walch, that were fled out of England; but the Earl of Murray especially, who had always been found addicted to the English. Queen Elizabeth perhaps was not much troubl'd at the Marriage; partly, as knowing the mild Disposition on the Lord Darnley, and how little access of Strength it brought to the Queen of Scots; but most of all, as plainly seeing there would Troubles arise in Scotland upon it, and the Troubles of Scotland would be the Quietness of England, which, as a good Mother of her Country, was the Mark she aim'd at : Yet she made a shew of being offended with it ; but rather to conceal her Aim, than that she was offended with it indeed.

Queen Elizabeth is mov'd again to marry Charles the Emperor's Brother.

At this time the Emperor Maximilian sent to Queen Elizabeth his Ambassador, Adam Smiricote, renewing the former suit for his Brother Charles of Austria ; for which Marriage the Earl of Sussex was very earnest ; the Earl of Leicester as much against it : So as it grew to a Quarrel between them, and the Court was divided into Factions about it : But the Queen, who never lik'd the Dissention of her Peers (though it be a Rule with some, Divide and Reign) made them Friends, at least in Countenance.

Cecill Sister of the King of Sweden, comes into England on purpose to see the Queen.

We may now leave Scotland a while, and see the Honour done at this time to Queen Elizabeth, not much inferior to the Honour done to Solomon by the Queen of Sheba ; for now Cecill, the Sister of Erick King of Sweden, and Wife of Christopher Marquis of Baden, being great with Child, came from the farthest Part of the North (a long Journey) through Germany, on purpose to see her, for the great Fame she had heard of her Wisdom : At her being here, she was deliver'd of a Child, to whom, in requital of her Kindness, Queen Elizabeth was God-mother, and named him Edwardus Fortunatus ; giving to her and her Husband, besides Royal Entertainment, a yearly Pension. At this time also, for the great Fame of her Wisdom, Donald Mac Carti More, a great Potentate of Ireland, came and deliver'd up into her Hands all his most ample Territories ; and then receiving them again from her, to hold them to him and his Heirs-males lawfully begotten ; and for want of such Issue, to remain to the Crown of England. The Queen in requital invested him with the Honour of Earl of Glukare, and Baron of Valence ; and besides many Presents given him, paid the Charges of his Journey.

The Governours of Ireland, what Titles they had.

It was now the eighth Year of Elizabeth's Reign, when Nicholas Arnold, a Knight of Gloucestershire, governing Ireland under the Title of a Justice, was call'd home, and Sir Henry Sidney plac'd his room. And here by the way it is to be noted, That the Governours of Ireland, after it came under the English, were at first call'd Justices of Ireland ; afterwards Lieutenants, and their Vice-gerents were call'd Deputies. Afterwards at the Prince's pleasure, sometimes Deputies, sometimes Justices, and sometimes Lieutenants ; which last Title, tho' it be of greatest Honour, yet in Power is in a manner but the same. Sir Henry Sidney at his coming into Ireland, found the Province of Munster in much disorder, by reason of Strife between Gyrald Earl of Desmond, and Thomas Earl of Ormond : Whereupon the Queen sending for the Earl of Desmond into England, ordain'd a new Government in that Province, appointed a President to administer Justice, together with an Assistant on the Bench, two Lawers and a Notary : And the first President she made in this Place, was Sir William Sentleger.

Queen Elizabeth makes a Progress to Oxford.

And now Queen Elizabeth in a Progress went to Oxford ; where she took pleasure in viewing the Colleges, in hearing Orations, in seeing of Comedies, till the Comedy of Palemon and Arcturion'd into a Tragedy ; for by the fall of a Wall, thro' the multitude of People that press'd in to see it, three Men were slain. At her coming away she made an Oration in Latin to the Scholars, a sufficient recompence for all the Orations they had made to her. And this Year was a Call of seven new Serjeants at Law, who kept their Feast at Gray's-Inn in Holbourn.

Upon the Queen's return from Oxford the Parliament began, where they presently fell upon the matter of Succession, and moving the Queen to marry ; in which Points some went so far, that they spar'd not to accuse the Queen as one careless of Posterity ; to defame Cecill with Libels and Reproaches, as if he were her Counsellor in this matter ; but above all, to curse Dr. Huic, her Physician, who was thought to dissuade her from Marriage, by reason of I know not what womanish Insufficiency. At least in the Upper House it was agreed, That Sir Nich. Bacon, Lord Keeper, their Orator, should in all their Names beseech the Queen to marry, and withal, to declare a Successor to the Crown, if she should happen to die without Issue ; for which he gave many Reasons, declaring what Mischiefs were likely to befall the Kingdom, if she should declare a Successor were design'd. But in the Lowe-House there were some, amongst whom were Bell and Mounson, (two Lawers of great account) Dutton, Sir Paul Wentworth, and others who grew to far higher Terms, disparaging the Queen's Authority, and saying, That Princes were bound to design a Successor ; and that in not doing it, the Queen should shew her self no better than a Parasite of her Country. The Queen was contented to bear with Words spoken in Parliament, which spoken out of Parliament, she would never have endur'd ; but not willing to expostulate the Matter with the whole Number, she commanded, that Thirty of the Higher-House, and as many of the Lower, should appear before her ; to whom she deliver'd her Mind to this Effect ; That she knew what Danger hangeth over a Prince's Head, when once a Successor is declar'd : She knew that even Children themselves, out of a hasty desire of bearing Rule, had taken up Arms against their own Fathers, and how could better Conditions be expected from Kindred ? She had by reading observ'd, That Successors in a collateral Line have seldom been declar'd ; and that Lewis of Orleance, and Francis of Angoulesme were never declar'd Successors, and yet obtain'd the Crown without any noise.

A call of seven Serjeants at Law.

In a Parliament at this time, the Queen is mov'd again to marry.

And to declare a Successor.

The Queen's Answer to their Motions.

Lastly, she said, Tho' I have been content to let you debate the Matter of Succession, yet I advise you to beware, that you be not injurious to your Prince's Patience. With these and the like Reasons, she gave so great Satisfaction, that they never after troubl'd her with making any such Motion : And tho' she consented not in plain terms to declare a Successor, yet soon after she gave some Intimation of it ; for one Thornton, a Reader of the Civil Law in London, who in his Lectures call'd the Queen of Scots Right in question, was clapt up in Prison for his labour.

Raim.

1567. Rambouillet into England to the Queen, with the Robes and Ornaments of the Order of St. Michael, to bestow upon which two of her Nobility she pleas'd; and she making choice of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Leicester, they were by Rambouillet invested with them; an Honour that had never been conferr'd upon any English, but only King Henry the 8th, King Edward the 6th, and Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, tho' afterward prostituted almost to any, without deference.

The Queen of Scots is deliver'd of a Son. And now to return to the Affairs of Scotland: The nineteenth of June last past, the Queen of Scots, in a happy Hour, was at Edinburgh Castle deliver'd of a Son, that was afterward James the 6th of Scotland, and the first Monarch of Great Britain; whereof she presently sent word to Queen Elizabeth, by James Melvyn; who thereupon sent Sir Henry Killigrew to congratulate her safe Deliverance, and her young Son, with all Demonstration of Love and Amity.

She grows cold in her love to the King. But now the Love of the Queen of Scots to her Husband the Lord Darnley was not so hot at first, but it was now grown to be as cold; and she had not heap'd Honours on him so fast before, but now as fast she taketh them off: For, where before in publick Acts she had us'd to place her Husband's Name first, now she caus'd it to be plac'd last, and in the Coining of Money began to leave it quite out.

David Rizio an Italian, grows a great Favourite to the Queen of Scots. This unkindness between them was fomented by one David Rizio an Italian, whom the Queen had taken into her Service, first as a Musician, and then taking a liking to him, made him her Secretary for the French Tongue; by means whereof, he had oftentimes secret Conference with her, when the King her Husband might not be admitted. This Indignity the King, himself being given to his Pleasures of Hunting and Hawking, resent not so much, as some Lords that were his Friends; who told him plainly, That it stood not with his Honour to suffer this Fellow to live. By whose

The King set on by his Lords, murders him.

Especially by the Animation of the Earl of Murray.

The Earl's Rising and Carriage.

Instigation the King is drawn to plot his Death: One Day taking with him the Earl of Reuvon, and others, he rush'd into the Queen's Chamber at Supper-time, where finding David Rizio at a Cupboard tasting some Meat that had been taken from the Table, he seiz'd upon him, dragg'd him forth into an outer Chamber, and there murder'd him; the Queen at that time being great with Child, and like by that Affright to have miscarried. But the Fact being done, the King came in to her again, assuring her there was no hurt at all intended to her Person. The Man that had animated the King to do this Fact, was especially the Earl of Murray, of whom it is necessary to say something, because his Part will be the greatest of all the Scottish Actions of his time. He was the base Son of King James the Fifth, and so the base Brother of the Queen; made at first Prior of St. Andrews; but not liking that Religious Title, he affected rather some Temporal Honour; which when the Queen (being then in France) deny'd him, then in an angry mood he return'd into Scotland, where, by the Advice of Knox, whom he held for a great Patriarch, he brought the Matter so to pass, that in an Assembly of the States, the Religion was alter'd, and the French were banish'd out of Scotland: Yet afterward, as soon as the Queen was a Widow, he posted into France, and so insinuated with her, that she created him Earl of Murray, and promoted him to an honourable Marriage. Being thus exalted, he return'd into Scotland; where, for the growth of his ambitious Designs, he sow'd Seeds of Sedition, affirming often, What a misery it was to be under the Command of a Woman; and that Royalty was not to be tied to any Stock or Kindred, but to Virtue only, whether the Parties were legitimate or no: By this course, making way to the Kingdom for himself. To this end, he us'd all the Means he could to keep the Queen from marrying again; which when he could not effect, he then sought ways how to make Discord between her and her Husband; for which cause he had caused the King to murder Rizio. Of the Foulness of which Fact, when the King after a while grew sensible, he meant to be reveng'd of Murray, who had counselled him to do it: Which Murray understanding, prevented it with causing the like to be done to him, as will presently be seen. For the Queen having been deliver'd of a Son, and the Day appointed for the Christning being come; where the Godfathers were Charles King of France, and Philibert Duke of Savoy; Queen Elizabeth being requested to be Godmother, sent thither the Earl of Bedford as her Deputy, and a Font of Massie Gold for a Present, in value 1043*l*. but gave him express Command, That he should not honour Darnley with the Title of King. But before a Month or two, after the Christning were pass'd, the King in a stormy and tempestuous Night was strangled in his Bed, and then cast forth into the Garden, and the House immediately blown up with Gunpowder.

The King intends to be reveng'd on him.

But the Earl prevents him, and the King is strangled in his Bed.

The Rumour of this Murther being spread abroad, the common Fame laid it upon Murray and Morton, and their Confederates; Murray laid upon Morton upon the Queen: But we must not here give ear to that which Buchanan writes, who to curry Favour with the Earl of Murray, lays most impudent Scandals upon the Queen, whereof, before his Death, he repented himself extremely. The King thus murder'd, and the Queen left alone to her self, she is counsel'd to marry with some that might be able to assist her against all her Opposites: James Hepburn Earl of Bothwell, being then greatly in her favour, and of great eminency for his Valour; and tho' he were the Man that had acted the Murther, yet is he by Murray and his Confederates commended to the Queen: To which motion, as being destitute of Friends, and not knowing whom to trust, she at last consents, but upon these Conditions, That above all things, Respect might be had to her young Son, and that Bothwell might be legally quitted, both from the bond of his former Marriage, and also of the King's Murther. Hereupon a course is plotted, by which Bothwell is call'd to the Bar; and Morton being his Advocate, by the Sentence of the Judges he is clearly acquitted. Upon this he is created Duke of Orkney, and by consent of many of the Nobility, he is married to the Queen; which bred a suspicion in many, many, that the Queen was conscious of the mur-ther; which was the thing that by Marriage they intended: And the Suspicion once rais'd, they seek by all means to encrease, that they may have the better colour against her; and so, the same Man who had absolv'd Bothwell, and consented to the Marriage, now takes Arms against her, as a Delinquent in both; force him to fly, and then seize upon the Queen, whom (clad in a very homely garment) they thrust into Prison in Lochlewyn, under the custody of Murray's Mother, who had been the Harlot of K. James V. but boasting her self to have been his lawful Wife, and her Son his lawful Issue. Queen Elizabeth having at length notice hereof, sent Sir Nicholas Throgmorton into Scotland to expostulate with the Confederates touching this insolent usage of the Queen, and to consult by what means she might be restor'd to her liberty: But Throgmorton coming into Scotland, found the Confederates in more insolent terms than had been reported; being divided in Opinion what to do with the Queen, some would have her banish'd perpetually into England or France, some would have her questioned before the Judges, committed to perpetual custody, and her Son proclaim'd King; others more inhumane, who would have her at once depriv'd of Princely Authority, of Life and all;

and this Knox, and some other Ministers, thunder'd out of the Pulpits. Throgmorton on the other side alledg'd many passages out of the holy Scriptures touching Obedience to the higher Powers, maintaining, That the Queen was subject to no Tribunal, but that in Heaven; That no Judge on Earth might call her in question;
That there was no Office, nor Jurisdiction in Scotland, which was not deriv'd from her Authority, and revokable at her pleasure. They again oppos'd the peculiar Right of the Kingdom of Scotland; and, that in extraordinary Cases they were to proceed besides order; taking up Buchanan's Arguments, who in those Days, by instigation of Murray, wrote that damn'd Dialogue, De jure Regni apud Scotos, wherein, against the verity of Scottish History, he endeavours to prove, That the People have power both to create and to depose their King. After all their debating, all that Throgmorton could get of 'em was a Writing without any Subscription, wherein they protested, They had shut up the Queen for no other intent, but to keep her apart from Bothwell, whom she lov'd so desperately, that to enjoy him she regarded not all their Ruins; willing him to rest satisfied with this Answer till such time as the rest of the Peers met together. And notwithstanding all he could say, they shut up the Queen daily in more strait custody, tho' with Tears she besought them to deal more mildly with her, and to let her but once have a sight of her Son; which would not be granted her. At last, when fair Persuasions would not serve to make her freely give over the Kingdom, they threatned to question her openly for incontinent living, for the King's Murther, and for Tyranny, so as thro' fear of Death they compel'd her, unheard, to set her Hand to three Instruments; in the first whereof she gave over her Kingdom to her young Son, at that time scarce 13 Months old: In the second, she constituted Murray Viceroy during the minority of her Son: In the third, in case he refus'd the Charge, these Governours were nominated: James Duke of Chastellau-heraut, Giles Spike Earl of Argyle, Matthew Earl of Lenox, John Earl of Athol, James Earl of Morton, Alexander Earl of Glencarn, and John Earl of Marre. And presently she signified to Queen Elizabeth, by Throgmorton, That she had made these Grants by Compulsion; thro' the Counsel of Throgmorton; telling her, That a Grant extorted from one in Prison (which is a just Fear) is actually void, and of no effect.

Five Days after the Queen had made this Resignation, James the Sixth, the Queen's Son, was anointed and crown'd King, John Knox preaching at the same time; but a Protestation was then put in by the Hamiltons, That all this ought to be no prejudice to the Duke of Chas-teau-heraut, in his Right of Succession against the Family of Lenox; but Q. Elizabeth had forbid Throgmorton to be at the Action, that she might not seem, by her Ambassador's presence, to approve their Proceeding in displacing the Queen.

Fifteen Days after this Transaction, Murray himself return'd out of France into Scotland, and within three days went to the Queen, with some other of the Confederates, who charg'd her with many Crimes, and wish'd her, if she tender'd her Life and Honour, to observe these Prescriptions: Not to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom, nor desire to be at Liberty; nor to stir up the Queen of England, or the King of France, to molest Scotland with any War; nor to think any more on Bothwell's Love, or meditate Revenge upon any of Bothwell's Adversaries.

Murray being now proclaim'd Regent of Scotland, bindeth himself under his Hand and Seal to do nothing which shall concern War or Peace, the King's Person, or his Marriage, or the Liberty of the Queen, without the Consent of the Confederates; and then gives Throgmorton warning by Lydington, not to make any further Intercession for the Queen's Liberty, for that he and the rest had rather run any hazard than to suffer it. Soon after he puts to death John Hepburn, Daglas, and others that were Bothwell's Servants, for having a hand in the Murther of the King: But they, (which he little expected) when they were at the Gallows ready to die, protested before God and his holy Angels, that Bothwell had told them, that Morton and Murray were the first Authors of the Murther. They freed the Queen from all suspicion, like as Bothwell himself being Prisoner in Denmark, both living and dying, often protested with deep asseverations, That the Queen was innocent. And Fourteen Years after, Morton going to execution, confess'd, That Bothwell dealt with him to consent to the Murder of the King; which when he refus'd utterly, unless the Queen, under her Hand-writing, would allow of it, Bothwell made answer, That could not be, but the Fact must be done without her knowledge.

A little before this time, upon one and the same Day, died two of the Privy-Council, Sir John Mason Treasurer of the Queen's Chamber, and Sir Richard Sackville Vice-Treasurer of the Exchequer, a Man both prudent and provident, and ally'd to the Queen by her Mother Ann Bullen. In his room succeeded Walter Mildmay, a Man of Wisdom and Integrity: In Mason's Office came Sir Francis Knolles, who married Katherine Carew, the Daughter of Mary Bullen, the Queen's Mother's Sister.

The Marriage of Stolberg came into England from the Emperor of Q. Elizabeth Maximilian, to treat of the Marriage of the Queen with the Archduke Charles, upon which very occasion the Queen a little before had sent the Earl of Suffex to the Emperor with the Order of the Garter: But in the Treaty of Marriage there fell out so many Difficulties about Religion, Maintenance of the Duke, about the Royal Title, and concerning Succession, that after it had been treated of Seven whole Years together, it came at last to nothing, and the Duke not long after married Mary Daughter to Albert the Fifth, Duke of Bavaria; yet both he and the Emperor continued ever after a good Correspondence with the Queen.

Sir Tho. Sackville is created Baron Buckhurst.

The Queen of Scots, after eleven months Imprisonment, escapes, and raiseth an Army, but is defeated by Murray.

Whereupon she gets into England, and requires access to Qu. Elizabeth's presence.

About this time there came from John Basil Emperor of Russia and Moscow, Stephen Twerdico and Theodore Pogorella, with a Present of rich Furs of Otter, Miniver, and the like, tendring all Service and Obsequiousness to the Queen and the English. The Merchants, by vertue of a Grant from Queen Mary, had combined themselves into a Society, which they call'd The Moscovia Company; and having large Privileges granted 'em from the Emperor, went thither with a Navy yearly, making a very gainful Voyage: But then it prov'd most gainful, when for the Queen's sake they obtain'd at the Emperor's hands, in the Year 1569, That none but the English of that Company should traffick in the North parts of Russia. With these Russian Ambassadors there return'd into England, Anthony Jenkinson, who in his Travels had made curious Observations of Russia, set forth a Geographical Description of it, and was the first of the English that sail'd thro the Caspian Sea. And this Year, the 8th of June, Sir Thomas Sackville was created Baron of Buckhurst, at White-hall.

We have seen before the first Act of the Queen of Scots Tragedy; now comes in the second. Having been eleven months kept a Prisoner, at last, by the help of George Douglas, to whose Brother she was committed, she made escape from Locheley to Hamilton's Castle; where, upon the Testimonies of Robert Melvyn, and others, in a meeting of a great part of the Nobility, there was drawn a Sentence declaratory, That the Grant extorted from the Queen in Prison (which is Justus metum) was actually void from the beginning: Upon which Declaration great multitudes flock'd to her, so as within a day or two she had got an Army of at least Six thousand; but when they joyn'd Battel with Murray, being but raw unexpert Soldiers, they were soon defeated. In this case the Queen sought to save her self by flight, journeying in one Day three-score Miles; and coming at Night to the House of Maxwel Lord Heris, from thence she sent John Beton to Queen Elizabeth, with a Diamond Ring, which she had formerly receiv'd from her as a Pledge of mutual Amity; intimating, that she would come into England and implore her Aid, if her Subjects offer'd to prosecute her any further. Queen Elizabeth return'd answer, That she should expect from her, in abundant manner, all loving and friendly Offices.

But before the Messenger was return'd, she, contrary to the Advice of her Friends, enter'd into a small Bark, and with the Lords Heris and Flemming, and a few others, landed at Wickington in Cumberland, near the Mouth of the River of Derwent, the 17th of May; and the same Day wrote Letters to the Queen in French with her own Hand, the import whereof was, That having made an Escape from the hands of her insolent and rebellious Subjects, she was now come into England, upon certain hope of her approv'd Clemency, and therefore humbly desir'd she might forthwith be conducted to her Presence. Queen Elizabeth sending Letters by Sir Francis Knolles, comforted her, and promised her Aid and Defence according to the Equity of her Cause, but denied her Access, for that she was held guilty of many Crimes, giving Command to have her brought to Carlisle, as a place of better safety. The Queen of Scots receiving this Answer, and finding access to the Queen denied her, made request again by Letter, that she might have Leave both to unfold the Injuries she had receiv'd, and to answer the Crimes objected, in her own Presence; humbly entreating her, that either she might be admitted to have Conference and Assistance, or else have free Leave to depart out of England, to gain Supply elsewhere, and not to be held a Prisoner in the Castle at Carlisle, forasmuch as she came voluntarily into England, relying upon her Love, so often profess'd. Upon these Letters Queen Elizabeth exceedingly commiserated her Case, and could have found in her Heart to admit her to her Presence, but that her Councillors conceiv'd it to be matter for Consultation what to do in this Case: To detain her in England had many Mischiefs attending on it; to send her into France, as many; to send her back into Scotland many more; so that, in the conclusion, most were of opinion to have her detain'd, as one taken by right of War, and not to be dismiss'd till she had made satisfaction for assuming the Title of England, and for the Death of Darnley her Husband, who was born one of the Queen's Subjects. In this diversity of Opinions Queen Elizabeth, out of her own Judgment, sent word by Middlemore to the Regent of Scotland, that he should come himself, in Person, or else depute some fit Persons, to answer the Complaints of the Queen of Scots against him and his Confederates, and render sufficient Reasons wherefore they had depriv'd her, otherwise she would forthwith dismiss her, and with all the Forces she could, settle her in her Kingdom.

This Summons Murray obeys, and comes to York, the place appointed for this Treaty, accompanied with seven more of his intimate Friends, who stood Delegates for the Infant-King, namely, James Earl of Morton, Adam Bishop of Orkney, Robert of Dunferm, Patrick Lord of Lindsey, James Macgilly, and Henry Badinary; and with these, Lydington the Secretary, and George Buchanan. And the very same Day came thither Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Ratcliff Earl of Suffex, and Sir Ralph Sadler, a Privy-Councillor, appointed Commissioners for Queen Elizabeth. For the Queen of Scots (who took took it heinously that Queen Elizabeth would not hear the Cause her self, but refer her to Subjects, being an absolute Prince, and not ty'd to their Proceedings) there appear'd John Lesley Bishop of Ross, William Lord Lewington, Robert Lord Boyde, Corwen of Kilwinning, John Gordon, and James Cockburn. Being met, Lydington turning himself to the Scots, in a wondrous liberty of Speech gave them this Advice; maturely to consider what Prejudice they should draw upon themselves by accusing the Queen of Scots, and calling her Reputation in question publicly before the English, profess'd Enemies of the Scottish Nation: Likewise what account they shall be able to give hereof to the King, when he shall grow to riper Years, and shall see what an Injury this was to the Kingdom, his Mother, and his own Person: Wherefore (said he) it seemeth requisite to forbear this Business altogether, unless the Queen of England will enter into a mutual League of Offence and Defence, against all those which under this Pretence shall go about to molest us. Upon this Speech of his, the Delegates of the Queen of Scots made Protestation, That altho' it pleas'd the Queen of Scots to have the Cause between her and her disloyal Subjects debated before the English, yet she being a free Prince, and obnoxious to no earthly Prince whatsoever, did not thereby yield her self subject to the Jurisdiction and Command of any Person. On the contrary the English protested, that they did in no wise admit that Protestation in prejudice to the Right which the Kings of England have anciently challeng'd as superiour Lords of the Kingdom of Scotland. The Day after, the Queen of Scots Delegates set forth at large the injurious dealing of Morton, Murray, Marne, Glencarn, Humes, and others against the Queen; and how they had compell'd her, for fear of Death, to resign her Crown; which therefore (they said) was of no force. Murray and his Confederates make answer, That they had done nothing but by consent of the Peers in Parliament, and that in prosecuting of Bothwell, the Author of the King's Murder, whom the Queen protected: And as for her Resignation, that it was voluntarily and freely done. All this the Queen of Scots Delegates answer'd and confuted, affirming in particular, that where there are one hundred Earls, Bishops, and Barons (more or less) that had Voices in the Parliament of Scotland, there were not in that tumultuous Assembly they speak of, above four Earls, one Bishop, an Abbot or two, and six Barons: Wherefore their earnest Request was, that the Queen of England would be sensible of these Indignities offer'd her, and take some course for a speedy Redress.

The Queen of Scots requires to have the French and Spanish Ambassadors to be added to the Commissioners

After this, some new Commissioners from Queen Elizabeth were added to the former, to some of whom the Qu. of Scots took exception, unless the French and Spanish Ambassadors might be taken in, and herself admitted into the presence of the Queen and them, publicly to defend her own Innocence; and, that Murray might be detain'd and cited, whom she affirm'd she was able to prove to have been the chief Plotter of the Murder of her Husband Darnley. This was held to be a just Demand by the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Arundel, Suffex, Leicester, and the Lord Clinton: But Queen Elizabeth waxing somewhat angry, openly said, that the Queen of Scots should never want an Advocate as long as Norfolk liv'd. 'Twas seen here which is said, that the Heart of the King is inscrutable; for how Queen Elizabeth stood affected in this Case of the Queen of Scots, no Man could well discern; she detested the Insolence of her Subjects in deposing her, and yet gave no Assistance to restore her.

After long agitation of this Business, and nothing concluded, Murray, a little before his return into Scotland, slyly propounded the Marriage of the Queen of Scots to the Duke of Norfolk; which he with a modest Answer rejected, as a thing full of Danger: But withal Murray, the more to alienate Queen Elizabeth's Mind from the Queen of Scots, gave out, that she had passed away to the Duke of Anjou her Right to the Crown of England, and that the Transaction was confirm'd at Rome. He shew'd Letters also which the Queen of Scots had written to some Friends whom she trusted, wherein she accus'd the Queen for not dealing with her according to her Promise, and boasting of Succours she expected from some others. This last Clause something troubled Queen Elizabeth, neither could she conjecture from whence any such Succour should come, seeing both France with the Civil-Wars, and the King of Spain in the Low-Countries, had enough to do at home: But at last it broke out, that one Robert Ridolph, a Florentine, under the habit of a Merchant in London, was suborn'd by Pope Pius the Fifth to make a secret Commotion of the Papists in England against the Queen; which he perform'd indeed with a deal of Secrecy, and much Cunning; whereupon the Queen of Scots was remov'd from Bolton, (a Castle of the Lord Scroop's) where all the neighbouring People were Papists, to Tutbury, more toward the heart of the Country, under the Custody of George Earl of Shrewsbury.

The Protestants persecuted in France by the Guises, flee into England.

About this time the Guises in France, and the Duke d'Alva in the Low-Countries, began to endeavour the utter extirpation of the Protestant Religion: In France the Ministers of the Gospel are commanded within a limited time to depart the Kingdom; when Queen Elizabeth, forgetting the Fickleness of the Protestants at Newhaven, once again takes upon her their protection, supplies 'em with Two hundred thousand Crowns in Money, besides Munition in abundance, and with all humanity receives the French that fled into England; the rather, for that they made solemn protestation they took not up Arms against their Prince, but only stood upon their own defence. In the Low-Countries likewise the Duke d'Alva, breathing nothing but Slaughter and Blood, made the Dutch come flocking into England, as into a Sanctuary, where with all Courtesie they were receiv'd.

rashness of a few, to charge the whole Nation with Rebellion, sent amongst them Ferdinando Alvarez. Duke d'Alva, a bloody and fierce Man, who (contrary to the Ordinances and Customs of the Country) took away all Authority from the ordinary Courts of Justice, erected new Consistories, condemn'd and put to death the Peers without Tryal by their lawful Judges, placed Garrisons of Spaniards throughout all their Cities and Villages, and by force exacted the 20th part of the Fruits of the Earth, and the 10th of the Movables upon every Alienation. At that time a mighty mass of Money borrow'd of the Genoese, and other Italian Merchants, was sent out of Spain into the Low-Countries, there to be imploy'd to Interest, which being brought by Shipping, was pursued by the French, and forced to flee for Succour into Havens of England, whom the Queen commanded to be succour'd, as conceiving the Money to be the King of Spain's, as 'twas given out: But at the same time Cardinal Odet de Chastillon coming out of France into England, and giving notice to the Queen, that the Money was not the King of Spain's, but belong'd to certain Merchants of Genoa, from whence the Duke d'Alva had taken it against their Will, with a purpose to imploy it to the ruin of the Protestants; and Information also being given her by one that had a Property in the Money that it was so; she determin'd to put in Security, and to borrow the Money of the Merchants her self, which is a usual thing with Princes when the Goods are taken in their Ports; and the King of Spain himself had lately done the like. The Duke d'Alva being inform'd of this dealing of the Queen's, by Gerard de Spese, the King of Spain's Ambassador in England, seizeth presently upon all the Goods of the English in the Low-Countries, and kept the Men prisoners: The Queen did the like with the Dutch Merchants in England: Letters of Mart were granted on both sides, and this grew to such a Quarrel between both Nations, that being nourish'd with other Differences afterward, it brought forth in Eighty-eight that Spanish Invasion, which is and will be memorable in all future Ages.

Sir Will. Cecil
accus'd by the
D. of Norfolk and others, is
the Queen.

Upon occasion of this Money detain'd, certain Peers of England, among whom were, the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquis of Winchester, the Earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Pembroke, Leicester, and others, accus'd Sir William Cecil for sending away Money into France, making this their colour, but done indeed out of envying his great Favour with the Queen, and suspecting him to incline to the House of Suffolk in the matter of Succession: Hereupon they consult secretly how to get him imprison'd; and Throgmorton (who envied him as much as they) suggested, that if he were once clapt up, they might soon find out a Way to crush him; but the Queen (by what means 'tis uncertain) coming to have Notice hereof, gave a check to their purpose, and protected Cecil against their combined practices.

The Earl of Murray being return'd into Scotland, makes the Lords believe that he desires a meeting at Edinburgh, to consult about restoring the Queen to her Liberty, but as Hamilton Duke of Chastellau-heraut (appointed Vicegerent of the Kingdom by the Queen) and the Lord Heris were coming thither, he circumvented 'em, and before any of the rest came cast them into Prison, and forthwith in an open War oppresseth all her Favourites. It may be thought Murray could have been content the Queen should have been set at liberty, but that he knew her liberty could not be without his servitude; and Queen Elizabeth perhaps would willingly have had her restor'd to her Kingdom, but that she doubted such restoring would endanger her own security. And thus, while they regarded their own ends in the first place, and hers but in the second, she had the Fortune to be pitied, but not the Happiness to be reliev'd; and all she could do her self, was but to tie the knot of her Bonds the faster; if she could have fate still, they would perhaps have loosen'd of themselves; but now, the more she stirr'd, the more she was entangled.

And now the Destiny of the Duke of Norfolk began to work: It was in every one's Mouth, that the Duke would marry the Queen of Scots; and, 'tis true, there had been Motions made, but the matter not so forward as the Voice of the People, which commonly presageth what will follow. It had been mention'd to the Duke at York, by the Bp of Ross, and afterward (in presence at least) by Murray himself at Hampton-Court; but the Duke, before he would resolve in the matter, deliberated with the Earl of Arundel, Northumberland, Westmoreland, Suffex, Pembroke, Southampton, and Leicester himself, who all judg'd it fit he should acquaint the Queen with it first, and then leave the matter to her liking.

Within a few Days, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton meeting the Duke in the Palace of Westminster, advis'd him to move the Earl of Leicester himself to embrace the Match, seeing he had formerly sued for it, but if he refus'd it, then at least to take him along with him, for that himself alone would hardly be able to procure the Queen's Consent. A day or two after, the Earl of Leicester propounded the matter to the Duke, and then communicateth it to the Earls of Arundel and Pembroke, who thereupon, together with Throgmorton, wrote Letters to the Queen of Scots, commending the Duke of Norfolk to her for a Husband; the Duke himself likewise writeth to her, tending his singular Love and Respect unto her. Upon this Articles were drawn, written with Leicester's own Hand, and sent to the Queen of Scots, to which if she consented, they then promis'd to procure that Queen Elizabeth should give her Assent, and, that forthwith she should be re-invested in her Kingdom, and the Succession of England should be confirm'd upon her. We may easily believe the Queen of Scots was not hardly drawn to give Consent to her own Desire: But in the mean time the Duke had imparted to the Lord Lumley the whole Proceeding, and had much ado to get the Earl of Leicester's Consent that he might advise of it with some other of his Friends; yet, a little after, he open'd the matter to Cecil also.

The rumour of this Marriage was soon come to the Queen's Ears; which the Duke understanding, he dealt earnestly with the Earl of Leicester to have the matter propounded to the Queen out of hand. Leicester makes delays, and pretends Causes to put it off; which Cecil seeing, he advises the Duke to go and acquaint the

But coming at last to her knowledge, she commands the Duke upon his Allegiance to desist; which he promiseth.

He is committed to the Tower.

the Queen with it himself. This Counsel Leicester oppos'd, promising to open it to the Queen as she went in Progress. At length at Farnham, the Duke standing by as the Queen sat at Table, she gave him a tart Admonition, That he had best take heed upon what Pillow he rested his Head. After this, at Titchfield, Leicester fell sick, or at least counterfeited; to whom the Queen coming, and bidding him to be of good cheer, he with Sighs and Tears crav'd pardon for his Fault, and unfolded to her the whole Story from the very Beginning. Whereupon, the Queen call'd the Duke into the Gallery, reproving him sharply for going about the Marriage without acquainting her; & commanding him, upon his Allegiance, to desist. The Duke made her a free and hearty promise of Obedience, and spar'd not to say (as if he little regarded the Queen of Scots) that his Revenues in England were not much less than hers in Scotland; and that when he was at his House at Norwich, he thought himself in a sort not inferior to some Kings; but notwithstanding, finding the Queen's Anger by her Countenance, and perceiving Leicester to be in a manner quite alienated, and most of the Nobility also, as scarcely saluting him when they met him, he grew extremely dejected, and prepar'd presently to leave the Court, meaning to stay at Norwich till, by his Friends Intercession, and his own submissive Letters, the Queen's Heart might be mollified towards him: Mean while the Court was suspiciously fearful lest he should raise Rebellion, and (they say) it was concluded, that if he did so, the Queen of Scots should presently be made away. And now the Duke, who held secret Commerce by Letters with the Bishop of Ross, Throgmorton, and Leicester (for they were sent to and fro in Bottles) being examin'd touching the Marriage of the Qu. of Scots, and certain secret Conferences with the Bishop of Ross, confess'd most of the Objections, and was thereupon committed to the Tower, under the custody of Sir Henry Nevill; within two Days after the Bishop of Ross likewise is examin'd, and together with the Florentine Robert Ridolph is deliver'd to the custody of Sir Francis Walsingham; the Earl of Pembroke is confin'd to his House, and examin'd privately; but his Confession was not committed to writing, it being his Request, because he could not write himself. At this time the rumor of Insurrection in the North began in Autumn before, grew very strong, by reason of some frequent meetings of the Earl of Northumberland, Westmoreland, and others, who thereupon being upon their Allegiance sent for to repair presently to the Queen, make delays; (for they stay'd waiting for Supplies, both from the Scots and from the Duke d'Alva) when the Earl of Northumberland doubting what to do, was frighted on purpose by his Servant telling him, that Men in Arms were near at hand to apprehend him; who thereupon, in a tempestuous Night, riseth out of his Bed, and in great fear gets into his Park at Topcliff, and the Night following to Branspith, to the Earl of Westmoreland's House, where a great many were met that were acquainted with the Enterprize: Here they brake forth in an open Rebellion, being press'd forward by one Nicholas Morton a Romish Priest, sent by the Pope to pronounce Queen Elizabeth a Heretick; and therefore to have utterly lost all Right of Sovereignty: By-and-by they send forth a Writing, wherein they declare, that they had taken Arms for no other end, but that the Religion of their Fore-fathers might be restor'd, wicked Counsellors remov'd from the Queen, the Duke of Norfolk and others of the Loyal Nobility reliev'd who were now in disgrace; but towards the Queen professing themselves most dutiful Subjects: Withal they send Letters to the Papists all the Kingdom over, requiring them to come to their assistance; but they were so far from joyn-ing with them, that many sent both the Letters and the Bearers of them to the Queen, and afforded their Aids and Purse against them, no less than the best Protestants; even the Duke of Norfolk himself was not backward in it.

These Rebels go first to Durham, where they tear in pieces all the Bibles and Books of Common-Prayer they could find in Churches of the English Tongue: When they had been twelve Days in Rebellion, they number'd their Army, and could not reckon above six hundred Horse, and four thousand Foot: Whereupon being certainly inform'd, that the Earl of Sussex with Seven thousand, and the Earl of Warwick with Twelve, were setting out against them, they betook themselves to Rabie, the chief House of the Earl of Westmoreland; going from thence, they besieg'd Bernard's Castle, which for lack of Provision was yielded to them. At which time being proclaim'd Traytors, and hearing afresh of the great Forces that were coming against them, the two Earls with a small Company get presently into Scotland, hard by where the Earl of Northumberland hid himself at Harclow in a poor Cottage, amongst the Grahams (famous Robbers) who afterwards betray'd him to the Earl of Murray: Westmoreland made a shift to get into the Low-Countries, where he had a slender Pension from the King of Spain, and there liv'd even to old Age. Of the Rest, for Terror and Example sake, there was hang'd at Durham threescore and six of the chief; amongst whom Plomtree a noted Priest. At York were executed Simon Digby, John Fulthorp, Thomas Bishop, Robert Penyman; and at London a few Months after, Christpher and Thomas; and some other in other places. After this, the rest of the Rebels being convicted of High-Treason, were proscrib'd; namely, Charles Earl of Westmoreland, Thomas Earl of Northumberland, Ann Countess of Northumberland, Edward Dacres of Morton, John Nevill of Lever-sege, John Swinborn, Thomas Markenfield, Egremont Ratcliff, Brother to the Earl of Sussex, Christopher Nevill, Richard Norton, Christopher Marmaduke, Robert and Michael Tempest, George Stafford, and forty others of good account. Out of the Ashes of this Rebellion a new Fire was kindl'd at Nayworth in Cumberland by Leonard Dacres, second Son to the Lord Dacres of Gillingland: He was a party with the Earl in their Rebellion; but they breaking forth sooner than he expected, and he at that time being at the Court, and there admitted to kiss the Queen's Hand, tendred his service to go against them, and to that purpose was sent home; but in his Journey (branding himself with a double disloyalty) he consulted with the Rebels, and encourag'd them to go on : And by vertue of Letters of Credence from the Queen, he surpriz'd the Castle of Gresstock, and other Houses of the Dacres, and gather'd together an Army of Three thousand Men : But being encounter'd by the Baron of Hunsdon, after a great fight, wherein, tho' he were crook-backt, he behav'd himself valiantly, he was put to flight, and fled into Scotland, from whence soon after he pass'd over to the Low Countries, and in great Misery and Poverty died at Louvain.

But tho' the Queen were thus entangl'd with Rebellions at home, yet she was not careless of the afflicted Protestants in France : For she stirr'd up the Protestant Princes to defend the Common Cause ; supplied them with Money, taking in pawn the Queen of Navarre's Jewels ; and gave leave to Henry Champernon to lead into France a Troop of an hundred Horse, Gentlemen all, and Voluntaries ; amongst whom were Philip Buissed, Francis Barkley, and Walter Raleigh, a very young Man, who now began to look into the World. But as the Queen of England assist-ed the French, so in revenge thereof, the King of France meant to assist the Scots, but that he was taken away by Death.

There was at that time a Rebellion in Ireland also, rais'd by Edmund and Peter, Brothers to Boteler Earl of Ormond ; but after many Outrages by them committed, the Earl of Ormond first by Perswasions, obtain'd of them to submit themselves, and when notwithstanding they were committed to Prison, he then obtain'd of the Queen they should not be call'd to the Bar, being exceedingly griev'd that any of his Blood should be attain'd of Rebellion. The rest of the Rebels were pursu'd by Sir Humphery Gilbert, and soon dispers'd.

The Earl of Murray Regent of Scotland, is murdered riding in the Street.

And now the Earl of Murray, Regent of Scotland, when he had brought all things to his Heart's desire, and thought himself secure, at Lithgo, riding along the Streets, was shot into the Belly with a Bullet, beneath the Navel, and there fell down dead. The Actor was a Hamilton, who did it upon a private Revenge, for that Murray had forced him to part with a piece of Land which he had by his Wife ; who there-upon falling Lunatick, he in a great Rage committed this Slaughter.

After Murray's Death, the Country being without a Regent, was the cause of many Disorders. Thomas Carre and Walter Scot, two principal Men amongst the Scottish Borders, and devoted to the Queen of Scots, made Inrodes into England, wasting all Places with Fire and Sword, till by Forces sent out of England, under the Command of the Earl of Sussex and the Lord Hunsdon, they were defeated : In whose Pursuit were Three hundred Villages fired, and above fifty Holds were overturn'd. For which Service the Earl made many Knights, as Sir William Drury, Sir Thomas Mannors, Sir George Carew, Sir Robert Constable, and others, and then return'd. And now to prevent further Disorders, the Lords of Scotland being ready to assemble about the Election of a new Regent, they ask'd Counsel of Queen Elizabeth in the Matter ; but she making answer, She would not meddle in it, because she would not be thought to work any thing prejudicial to the Queen of Scots, whose Case was not yet tried, they created Matthew Earl of Lenox Regent ; which Queen Elizabeth did the better like, as conceiving he could not chuse out of natural Affection, but have a special care of the young King, being his Grand-child.

But while Qu. Elizabeth favour'd the King's Party in Scotland, the Earl of Huntley, the Duke of Chateau-heraut, and the Earl of Argyle (the Queen of Scots Lieutenants) imploy the Lord Seton to the Duke D'Alva, requiring him for many great Reasons to vindicate the Queen of Scots liberty, alledging how acceptable a Work it would be to all Christian Princes, and to the whole Catholick Church : Whereunto the Duke made answer, They should find him ready to the uttermost of his power to satisfie their Request. At which time also the French King dealt earnestly with Queen Elizabeth to the same purpose ; and the Spanish Embassador in his Master's Name urg'd it no less extremely : But Queen Elizabeth, assaulted with all these Importunities, made answer, That as she would omit nothing that might serve for the Reconciling of the Queen of Scots and her Subjects, so she must have leave to provide for her own and her Subjects safety ; a thing which Nature, Reason, and her own Honour requir'd at her Hands. And now, when these Princes prevail'd not with Queen Elizabeth to set the Queen of Scots at liberty, out comes Pope Pius Quintus with his Bull Declaratory, which he caused to be fastned in the Night-time upon the Gate of the Bishop of London's Palace, wherein all her Subjects are absolv'd from their Oath of Allegiance, or any other Duty ; and all that obey her, accur'd with Anathema. He that fastned up the Bull was one John Felton, who never fled for the Matter, but as affecting Martyrdom, suffer'd himself to be apprehended, confess'd and justify'd the Fact, and thereupon arraign'd, was condemn'd, and hang'd near the Place where he had fastned the Writing.

The same Day that Felton was arraign'd, the Duke of Norfolk seem'd now extreme penitent for his Fault, and utterly to abhor the Marriage, was deliver'd out of the Tower, and suffer'd to go to his own House, but yet to be in the custody of Sir Henry Nevil still. Indeed Cecil being a good Friend to the Duke, had told the Queen, That the Law of 25 of Edward the Third could not take hold upon him : And now being in a kind of liberty, Cecil deals earnestly with him to marry speedily some other, thereby to take away all suspicion in that behalf, yet some again thought that this liberty of the Duke's was granted him on purpose to bring him into greater danger.

At this time died William Herbert Earl of Pembroke, the Grand-child of an Earl of Pembroke, yet the Son but of an Esquire, and Grandfather to Philip Earl of Pembroke, and Montgomery now living, who lieth buried in Paul's under a fair Monument of Marble, with an Inscription testifying his great Deservings while he liv'd.

Many Conspiracies were at this time to set the Qu. of Scots at liberty ; amongst others, there conspir'd Thomas and Edward Stanley, younger Sons of the Earl of Derby, with others ; but the Matter discover'd, they were soon suppress'd, and some of them executed. And now the Lords of the Queen of Scots Party continuing to protect the English Rebels, the Earl of Suffex once again, accompanied with the Lord Scroop, entereth Scotland, burneth the Villages all-along the Valley of Anandale, and compels the Duke of Chateau-heraut, and the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, under a Writing sign'd with their own Hands and Seals, to forsake the English Rebels. Whereupon the Earl of Suffex returning home, the Queen made these Knights, Edward Hastings, Francis Russel, Valentine Brown, William Hilton, Robert Stapylton, Henry Carwen, and Simon Musgrave.

Queen Elizabeth's Mind being now in great suspension, by reason of that Bull from Rome and the late Conspiracy in Norfolk, sent Sir William Cecil and Sir Walter Mildmay to the Queen of Scots, who was then at Chattsworth in Derbyshire, to consult with her by what means the Breach in Scotland might best be made up, she re-invested in her former Dignity, and her Son and Queen Elizabeth might be secur'd. The Queen of Scots did little deplore her own afflicted Condition, putting her self wholly upon the Queen's Clemency; when the Commissioners made unto her certain Propositions of Agreement: First, That the Treaty of Edinburgh should be confirm'd; then, That she should renounce her Right and Title to England during Queen Elizabeth's Life, or any Children of her Body lawfully begotten; then, That she should send her Son for a Hostage into England, with other six Hostages, such as the Queen should nominate; then, That the Castles of Humes and East-castle should be held by the English for Three Years, with some other: To which Propositions the Queen of Scots for the present gave a provident Answer, but refer'd the fuller Answer to the Bishop of Ross, her Ambassador in England, and some other Delegates; who afterwards allowing some of the Propositions, and not allowing others, the Treaty came to nothing, but the matter rested in the state it was before.

But came to nothing.

At this time Philip King of Spain had contracted a Marriage with Ann of Austria, Daughter to the Emperor Maximilian, his own Niece by his Sister, who was now setting sail from Zealand towards Spain; when Queen Elizabeth, to testify her Love and Respect to the House of Austria, sent Sir Charles Howard with the Navy Royal, to conduct her thro' the British Sea.

And now was the twelfth Year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign finish'd, which certain Wizards had made Papists believe should be her last; but contrary, as if 'twere but her first, a new Custom began of celebrating the 17th Day of November (the Anniversary Day of her Reign) with ringing of Bells, Tiltings, and Bonfires; which Custom, as it now began, so 'twas never given over as long as she liv'd, and is not yet forbore so long after her Death.

The 17th of November began to be celebrated in honour of Queen Elizabeth's coming to the Crown.

The Earl of Thomond intending Rebellion, is strangely discovered.

At this time in Ireland, Connagher O-Bryan Earl of Thomond, not brooking the severe Government of Edward Fitton President of Connaught, enter'd into Consultation with some few, to raise a new Rebellion; which, being at the point ready to break forth, was strangely discover'd: For the day before they meant to take up Arms, Fitton knowing not at all of the matter, sent the Earl word in a friendly manner, That the next day he and a few friends with him would be his Guests. The Earl, convinc'd by his own Conscience, imagin'd that his Intendments were reveal'd; that Fitton would come as an Enemy, rather than a Guest; out of which fear he presently set sail into France, where repenting him seriously of his Fault, he confess'd the whole Business to Norris, the Queen's Ambassador in France, and by his Intercession was afterward pardon'd and restor'd.

In January, the Thirteenth Year of her reign, Queen Elizabeth in royal Pomp entering the City of London, went to see the Bourse which Sir Thomas Gresham had lately built for the use of the Merchants; and with sound of Trumpets and the voice of an Herald, solemnly named it The Royal Exchange. A few Days after, for his many great Services, she made Sir William Cecil Baron Burghley.

A guilty Conscience betrays it self.

There were now about the Scottish affairs, in the name of the King of Scots, the Earl of Morton, Pernare Abbot of Dumferlin, and James Mac-Gray, whom when Queen Elizabeth requir'd to shew more clearly for what causes they had depos'd the Queen, they exhibited a long and tedious Commentary, wherein with a certain insolent liberty they endeavour'd to prove, by the ancient Right of that Kingdom, that the People of Scotland were above the King; and urg'd Calvin's Authority also, That Popular Magistrates are constituted for the moderation of the Licentiousness of Princes; and, that 'tis lawful for them both to imprison Kings, and upon just causes to depose 'em. This Writing the Queen could not read without Indignation; but to the Delegates she gave this Answer: She saw no just Cause yet why they should handle the Queen in such manner, and therefore will'd them to think upon some course out of hand how to allay the Dissentions in Scotland. Hereupon in Sir Nicholas Bacon's House, Keeper of the Great-Seal, a Proposition was made to the Bishop of Ross, the Bishop of Galloway, and Baron Lewington, Delegates for the Queen of Scots, That for the security of the Kingdom and the Queen of England 'twere requisite, that before the Queen of Scots should be set at liberty, the Duke of Chateau-heraut, the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, the Lords Humes, Heris, and another of the Barons, should be deliver'd for Hostages, and the Castles of Dumbrition and Humes yielded up into the hands of the English for three Years: But they made answer, That to yield up great Personages, and such Fortifications as were demanded, were nothing else but to leave the miserable Queen utterly destitute of faithful Friends, and naked of all Places fit for guard and defence; yet they offer'd to give two Earls and two Barons for Hostages till two Years were expired: Which not being accepted, they straightway gather'd, and spoke it openly, That now they plainly perceiv'd the English meant to keep the Queen of Scots perpetually Prisoner, and likewise to break off the Treaty, seeing they rigorously demanded such Security as Scotland was not able to make good. And now Queen Elizabeth, seeing that nothing could be done for her own, nor the King and Queen of Scots Safety, unless both Factions in Scotland consented, she held it fit that the Lords of Scotland should themselves appoint

While matters in England proceeded in this sort, the Queen's Party in Scotland was hardly used: Dumbarton Friith, the strongest Castle in Scotland, was taken; and J. Hamilton Archbishop of St. Andrews, the Duke of Chateau-heraut's Brother, as an Accessary to the Murder of Darnley, was hang'd without being arraign'd according to Law. In England the Queen of Scots had all her Servants taken from her, except ten only and a Priest to say Mass; with which Indignities the Q. of Scots provok'd, causeth a large Commentary of her Counsels, with certain Love-letters to the Duke of Norfolk, to be carried to the Pope and the King of Spain by Ridolphus; which being brought first to the Duke, Higford (one that waited on the Duke in his Bedchamber) had copied out; but being commanded to burn 'em, he hid 'em under a Mat in the Duke's Bedchamber, and that (it should seem) purposely. Ridolphus, to draw on the Duke to be Head of the discontented Party in England, aggravated to him the Wrongs he had suffer'd; how against all Law he had been kept a long time in Prison, and now, to his great disgrace, was not summon'd to Parliament: He exhibited to him a Catalogue of such of the Nobility who had vow'd to assist him: He shew'd how the Pope (so the Catholick Religion might be promoted) would himself undergo all the Charge of the War, and had already laid down an Hundred thousand Crowns, whereof himself had distributed Twelve thousand among the English that were fled: He promis'd, that the King of Spain would send Four thousand Horse, and Six thousand Foot, to his assistance: To these Reasons the Bishop of Rosi added, That it was an easie matter for him to surprize the Queen, whom when he had in his hands, he might set the Queen of Scots at liberty, and might easily obtain of Queen Elizabeth a toleration of Religion. The former Reasons took somewhat with the Duke, but this point of surprizing the Queen he abhor'd as an impious Fact, and therefore rejected, as pernicious and dangerous.

In France, a little before this, was the Marriage solemniz'd between Charles the 9th, King of France, and Elizabeth of Austria, Daughter to the Emperor Maximilian; in gratulation whereof Queen Elizabeth sent into France, Thomas Lord Buckhurst, who with great Magnificence was receiv'd, and perhaps the more in regard of a Motion now intended to be made: For the Lord Buckhurst having in his Retinue one Guido Cavalcanti, a Nobleman of Florence, the Queen-Mother of France, as being a Florentine her self, had often conference with him, when she would many times say, What a Happiness it would be to both the Kingdoms, if a Match were made between the Queen of England and her Son Henry Duke of Anjou! and at last desir'd him to recommend the Motion to the Queen of England, both from her, and from her Son the King of France, as a thing they both exceedingly desir'd. The Lord Buckhurst return'd, having for a Present from the King of France a Chain weighing a thousand French Crowns; and Cavalcanti at his return made the Motion to the Queen, who seemed not unwilling to hearken to it, for by this Match there should be added to the Kingdom of England the wealthy Dukedoms of Anjou, Bourbon, and Arvergne, and possibly the Kingdom of France itself. Hereupon a Treaty was held, in which the French propounded three Articles, one concerning the Coronation of the Duke; another concerning the joint Administration of the Kingdom; a third concerning a toleration of his Religion; to which 'twas answer'd, That the two first Articles might in some sort be composed, but the third scarce possibly; for tho' a contrary Religion might be tolerated between Subjects of the same Kingdom, yet between a Wife and her Husband it seem'd very incongruous and inconvenient: Yet the matter at last came to this conclusion, That if the Duke would afford his presence with the Queen at Divine Service, and not refuse to hear and learn the Doctrine of the Church of England, he should not be compell'd to use the English Rites, but at his pleasure use the Roman, not being expressly against the Word of God. But upon these Punctilio's they could not accord, and so the Treaty, after it had continued almost a Year, broke off. 'Twas indeed generally thought the Match was never really intended on either side, but that they both pretended it only for their own Ends; for the Earl of Leicester, who knew more of the Queen's Mind than any Man, wrote at this time to Sir Francis Walsingham, the Queen's Ambassador in France, That he found the Queen's Inclination so cool in the matter, that tho' the Point of Religion were fully accorded, yet she would find some Point or other to break it off.

At this time the Continuance of the Duke of Norfolk's Affection towards the Queen of Scots came to be discover'd, by a Pacquet of Letters sent by Ridolphus to the Bishop of Rosi, and by Bayliff's Confession, (who brought the Letters) being set upon the Rack, so as the Bishop of Rosi was confined to the Isle of Ely; Thomas Stanley, Sir Thomas Gerrard, and Rolston were cast into the Tower; and Henry Howard, who had an aspiring mind to be Archbishop, was committed to the Archbishop of Canterbury's keeping.

At the same time the Queen of Scots sent Money to her Confederates in Scotland, which being by Higford deliver'd to one Brown to carry, and told it was Silver, when he found by the weight 'twas Gold, he began to suspect something, and therefore went and deliver'd both the Money and Letters to the Lords of the Council. Upon this Higford being examin'd, confess'd the whole matter, and withal gave notice of that Commentary of the Queen of Scots, which is mention'd before. Two Days after, the Duke himself being examin'd, and knowing nothing what his Servants had confess'd, denied every particular, and thereupon was brought again to the Tower by Ralph Sadler, Thomas Smith, Henry Newil, and Dr. Wilson; and after him Bannister, who was the Duke's Counsel at Law; the Earls of Arundel and Southampton, the Lord Lumley, the Lord Cobham, Henry Piercy, Lowther, Powel, Goodyer, and others, were committed to Prison, who, upon hope of Pardon, confess'd all they knew concerning the matter; when these things, and especially the Commentary, which the Duke thought had been burnt, were shew'd shew'd him, he then cry'd out, I am betray'd by my own Servants, not having learnt to be distrustful, which is the very Sinew of Wisdom: And then with all Submission he besought the Lords to mediate for him to the Queen, towards whom he protested he never had the least Thought of doing any Hurt.

The Civilians deliver their Opinions what may be done with an Ambassador if he prove a Practicer against the State.

And now, seeing it appear'd that the Bishop of Ross had been the sole Contriver of the Business, 'twas deliberated what to do to him, because he was an Ambassador. Hereupon divers Civilians are call'd, as, David Lewis, Valentine Dale, William Drury, William Aubrey, and Henry Jones, of whom these Questions were ask'd:

First, Whether an Ambassador who raiseth Rebellion against the Prince to whom he is an Ambassador, may enjoy the Privileges of an Ambassador, and is not liable to Punishment?

They answer'd, That such an Ambassador hath forfeited the Privileges of an Ambassador, and is liable to Punishment.

Secondly, Whether a Minister (or Protector) of a Prince who is deposed by publick Authority, and in whose room another is inaugurated, may enjoy the Privileges of an Ambassador?

They answer'd, That if such a Prince be lawfully depos'd, his Protector cannot challenge the Privileges of an Ambassador, forasmuch as none but absolute Princes, and such as have Right of Majesty, can appoint Ambassadors.

Thirdly, Whether a Prince who is come into another Prince's Country, and held in Custody, may have his Protector; and, if he shall be held an Ambassador?

They answer'd, If such a Prince hath not lost his Sovereignty, he may have his Protector; but whether that Protector shall be reputed as an Ambassador, or no, this dependeth on the Authority of his Delegation.

Fourthly, Whether if a Prince gave Warning to such a Protector, and to his Prince who is under Custody, that this Protector shall not from henceforth be accounted for an Ambassador; whether that Protector may by Law challenge the Privilege of an Ambassador?

They answer'd, A Prince may forbid an Ambassador to enter into his Kingdom, and may command him to depart the Kingdom if he contain not himself within his due limits, yet in the mean while he is to enjoy the Privileges of an Ambassador.

What the Bishop of Ross pleadeth for himself.

Upon these Answers the Bishop of Ross is warn'd by the Lords of the Council, that he shall no longer be esteem'd an Ambassador, but be punish'd as his Fault shall deserve. The Bishop alledg'd for himself, That he had not violated the Right of an Ambassador via Juris, but via Facti, (to use his own Words) and therefore advis'd them not to use harder measure to him than was used to the English Ambassadors, Throgmoton in France, Randal and Tamworth in Scotland, who had raised Rebellions there, and were open Abettors of the same, and yet had no greater Punishment than to be gone at a time limited. When they began to urge to him what the English had testified against him, he lovingly requested them to give no credit to it, forasmuch as by a receiv'd Custom, which hath the force of a Law, the Testimony of an Englishman against a Scot, or of a Scot against an Englishman, is not to be admitted: But, after some altercations, the Bishop is led away to the Tower, and kept close Prisoner.

At this very season Matthew Earl of Lenox, Matthew Earl Regent of Scotland, the King's Grandfather, was of Lenox, Regent of Scotland, by the adverse Party set upon unawares, who having yielded himself to David Spense of Warminster, (who was then careful to defend him) together with him was slain by Bell and Caulder, when with great Industry he had govern'd the Kingdom for his Grandchild about fourteen Months; in whose room John Ereskine Earl of Marre, by common consent of the King's Faction, was chosen Regent of Scotland; but he being a Man of a quiet disposition, thro' extreme Grief for the many Troubles he sustain'd in the Place, departed this Life when he had govern'd thirteen Months.

And now a Parliament was held at Westminster, wherein, besides a Law for preventing the treacherous Endeavours of seditious Subjects, another Law was made, That if any one, during the Queen's Life, by Books written or printed, shall expressly affirm that any is, or ought to be the Heir or Successor of the Queen, (besides the natural Offspring of her Body) or shall to that purpose publish, print, or disperse any Book or Schedules, he and his favourers shall for the first Offence suffer a Years Imprisonment, and the loss of one half of his Goods; and if they offend again, they shall be in a Præmunire. A Law also was made, by which to be reconcil'd to the See of Rome was made Treason; and it was pronounc'd against the Queen of Scots, That if she offended again against the Laws of England, it might be lawful to question her, as the Wife of a Peer of the Kingdom of England. But here the Queen interpos'd her Authority, and would not suffer it to be enacted. About this time, in May, a solemn Tilting was perform'd at Westminster, where the Challenggers were Edward Earl of Oxford, Charles Howard, Sir Henry Lee, and Christopher Hatton Esq; who all did very valiantly, but the Earl of Oxford best.

As soon as the Parliament was dissolv'd, a Consultation was held, whether John Story Doctor of the Laws, the Duke d'Alva's Searcher (who some time before was by a Wile brought into England) being an Englishman born, and having in Brabant consulted with a foreign Prince about the invading of England, were to be held guilty of High-Treason? It was resolv'd affirmatively; whereupon he is call'd to the Bar, and indicted of Treason, That he had consulted with one Presball, a Conjuror, to make away the Queen: That he curs'd her daily when he said Grace at Table: That he shew'd a Way to the Secretary of the Duke d'Alva how to invade England, &c. Where he affirming, that the Judges had no Power to meddle with him, for that he belong'd not to the Queen of England, but was the King of Spain's sworn Subject, is nevertheless condemn'd by the Form of Nihil dicit, (forasmuch as no Man can renounce the Country wherein he was born, nor abjure his Prince at his own pleasure) and finally executed after the manner of Traytors.

Ireland at this time was indifferent quiet, for John Perrot, President of Munster, had brought James Fitzmorris to submit himself, and crave Pardon; Sidney Lord-Deputy return'd into England, and Sir William Fitzwilliams, who had married his Sister, succeeded in his room.

1573. 'Twas now the Fifteenth Year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, on the Sixteenth Day of January, was brought to his Tryal at Westminster-hall, where sate as Commissioners, George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, (made High-Steward of England for that Day) Reginald Gray Earl of Kent, Thomas Ratcliff Earl of Sussex, Henry Hastings Earl of Huntingdon, Francis Russel Earl of Bedford, Henry Herbert Earl of Pembroke, Edward Seymour Earl of Hartford, Ambrose Dudley Earl of Warwick, Robert Dudley Earl of Leicester; Walter Devereux Viscount of Hereford, Edward Lord Clinton, Admiral; William Lord Howard of Effingham, Chamberlain; William Cecil Lord Burleigh, Secretary; Arthur Lord Gray of Wilton, James Blount Lord Montjoy, William Lord Sands, Thomas Lord Wentworth, William Lord Borough, Lewis Lord Mordaunt, John Pawlet Lord St. John of Basing, Robert Lord Rich, Roger Lord North, Edmund Bruges Lord Chandos, Oliver Lord St. John of Bletsoe, Thomas Sackville Lord Buckhurst, and William West Lord de la Ware. After Silence bidden, Sir Owen Hopton, Lieutenant of the Tower, was commanded to bring the Duke to the Bar, and then the Clerk of the Crown said, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, late of Keningale in the County of Norfolk, hold up thy Hand; which done, the Clerk with a loud Voice readeth the Crimes laid to his charge: That in the Eleventh Year of the Queen's Reign he had traiterously consulted to make her away, and to bring in foreign Forces for invading the Kingdom; also, That he dealt with the Queen of Scots concerning Marriage, contrary to his Promise made to the Queen under his Hand-writing; also, That he reliev'd with Money the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, that had stirr'd up Rebellion against the Queen; also, That in the Thirteenth Year of the Queen's Reign he implor'd Auxiliary Forces of Pope Pius the Fifth, the Queen's profess'd Enemy, of the King of Spain, and the Duke d'Alva, for the freeing of the Queen of Scots, and restoring of the Popish Religion; and lastly, That he sent Supply to the Lord Heris, and other the Queen's Enemies in Scotland.

No Counsel to be allow'd in Case of Treason.

These Indictments being read, the Clerk demanded of the Duke, if he were guilty of these Crimes, or not. Here the Duke requested he might be allow'd to have Counsel; but Catiline Chief-Justice made answer, That it was not lawful: Yet (said the Duke) I have heard that Humphry Stafford, in the Reign of King Henry the seventh, in a Case of Treason, had one assign'd to plead for him: To which Dyer, Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas made answer, That Stafford had Counsel assign'd him concerning the Right of Sanctuary from whence he was taken by force, but in the Indictment for Treason he pleaded his own Cause. After this, the Duke yielded to be try'd by the Peers; first, Barham Serjeant at Law; then Gerrard the Queen's Attorney; and lastly, Bromley, the Queen's Solicitor, enforced the Crimes objected against him; to all which the Duke made colourable Answers, but most of them being prov'd by sufficient Testimony, he ask'd upon occasion, Whether the Subjects of another Prince, who is confederate and in league with the Queen, are to be accounted Enemies? To which Catiline answer'd, They were; and, that the Queen of England might wage War with any Duke of France, and yet hold firm Peace with the French King. When it grew towards Night, the Lord High-Steward demanded of the Duke, if he had any more to say for himself; who answer'd, I rely upon the Equity of the Laws. After this the Lords withdrawing a while, and then returning, the Lord-Steward beginning at the lowermost, ask'd them, My Lord de la Ware, is Thomas Duke of Norfolk guilty of these Crimes of High-Treason for which he is call'd in question? He rising up, and laying his Hand upon his Breast, answer'd, Guilty: In like manner they answer'd all. After this, the Lord-Steward, with Tears in his Eyes, pronounc'd Sentence in form usual.

A few days after were Barnes and Mather executed, who conspir'd with one Herle to make away certain of the Councillors, and to free the Duke; but Herle reveal'd the business presently, to whom Barnes, (when he saw his Accuser brought forth) smilingly said, Thou wert but one hour before me, else I had been in thy place for the Accuser, and thou in my room to be hang'd. At the same time with them was hang'd also Henry Rolf for counterfeiting the Queen's Hand. But tho' the Duke was now condemn'd, yet the Queen was so tender of his Case, that it was 4 months after e're he was executed: At last, on the second of June, at eight of the Clock in the Morning, he was brought to the Scaffold upon Tower-hill, and there beheaded.

The Duke is beheaded.

At this time, and upon this occasion, a Parliament was assembled, wherein amongst other Laws 'twas enacted, That if any Man should go about to free any Person imprison'd by the Queen's Commandment for Treason, or suspicion of Treason, and not yet arraign'd, he shall lose all his Goods for his lifetime, and be imprison'd during the Queen's pleasure; if the said Person hath been arraign'd, the Rescuer shall forfeit his Life; if condemn'd, he shall be guilty of Rebellion.

In the time of this Parliament the Queen created Walter Devereux Earl of Essex, being before but Viscount Hereford, because he was descended by his Great-Grandmother from the Bourchiers; and made the Lord Clinton (who had large Revenues in Lincolnshire) Earl of Lincoln: Also she call'd forth John Pawlet of Basing, the Marquis of Winchester's Son, Henry Compton, Henry Cheyney, and Henry Norris, for Barons by Summons.

Walter Devereux is created Earl of Essex, and by what Right; the Lord Clinton is made Earl of Lincoln; Henry Compton, Henry Cheyney, and Henry Norris are Barons by Summons.

Within ten Days after the Duke's death, William Lord de la Ware, Sir Ralph Sadler, Thomas Wilson Doctor of the Laws, and Thomas Bromley the

the Queen's Solicitor, were sent to the Queen of Scots to expostulate with her, That she had usurp'd the Title and Arms of the Kingdom of England, and had not renounc'd the same, according to the agreement of the Treaty of Edinburgh: That she had endeavour'd the Marriage of the Duke of Norfolk, without acquainting the Queen, and had used all forcible means to free him out of Prison; had rais'd the Rebellion in the North; had reliev'd the Rebels both in Scotland and in the Low-Countries; had implor'd aids from the Pope, the King of Spain, and others; had conspir'd with certain of the English to free her out of Prison, and declare her Queen of England: Lastly, That she had procur'd the Pope's Bull against the Queen, and suffer'd her self to be publickly named Queen of England in foreign Countries. All which Accusations she either absolutely denied, or else fairly extenuated; and tho' (as she said) she were a free Queen, and not subject to any Creature, yet she was contented, and requested that she might make her personal Answer at the next Parliament.

got possession of their Sea-Towns.

About this time the King of Spain, by his Ambassador here, complain'd to the Queen, that the Rebels of the Netherlands were harbour'd and entertain'd in England, contrary to the Articles of the League; whereupon the Queen set forth a severe Proclamation, That all the Dutch, who could any ways be suspected of Rebellion, should presently depart the Realm, which yet turn'd little to d'Alva's or the King of Spain's benefit; for hereupon Count Vandermark, and other Dutch, going out of England, surpriz'd the Brill first, then Flushing, and afterwards drew other Towns to revolt, and in a short time excluded the Duke d'Alva in a manner from the Sea. And this Error, to suffer the Protestant Party to get possession of the Sea-Towns, hath been the cause they have been able to hold out, even all this long time, against the King of Spain. And now many military Men having little to do at home, got 'em into the Netherlands, some to Duke d'Alva, but the far greater number to the Prince of Orange; the first of whom was Thomas Morgan, who carried Three hundred English to Flushing; then follow'd by his procurement nine Companies more under the conduct of Humphrey Gilbert; and afterwards it became the Nursery of all our English Soldiers.

A League concluded 'twixt
Q. Elizabeth and the King of France.

At this time Charles the French King setting his mind wholly (at least seeming so) upon the Low-Country War, concluding a Peace, enter'd into a League with Queen Elizabeth, which was to remain firm, not only during their two Lives, but between their Successors also, if the Successor signify to the Survivor within a Year that he accepteth it, otherwise to be at liberty. 'Twas likewise agreed what aid by Sea or Land they should each of 'em afford to other upon occasion: And, for ratification of this League, Edward Clinton Earl of Lincoln and Admiral of England, was sent into France, with whom went the Lords Dacres, Rich, Talbot, Sands, and others. The French King likewise sent the Duke of Momorancy and Paul Foix into England, with a great Train, that the Queen, in presence of them and the Ambassador in Ordinary, might swear to the League, which she did at Westminster the 17th of May, in the Year 1572, the Day after she made Momorancy Knight of the Garter.

Momorancy, whilst he tarried in England, made Intercession in his King's name, that what Favour could be without danger might be shew'd to the Queen of Scots; and then made much ado again about the Marriage with the Duke of Anjou; but being hopeless to make conclusion thereof, by reason of the diversity of Religion, he return'd into France, for now was great provision making ready for the Marriage between Henry King of Navarre and the Lady Margaret the French King's Sister, to which Solemnity with notable dissimulation the Queen of Navarre and the chief of all the Protestants were alured, being born in hand that there should be a renovation of Love, and a perpetual Peace establish'd. The Earl of Leicester likewise, and the Lord Burleigh, were invited out of England; and out of Germany, the Sons of the Prince Elector Palatine, under colour of Honour, but indeed that they might be entrap'd, and they, and together with them the Protestant Religion, at one blow, if not clean cut off, yet receive a deadly wound: For the Marriage being celebrated, there presently follow'd that cruel Massacre at Paris, and the terrible slaughter of the Protestants throughout all the Cities of France; but, to set a shew of Equity upon the Fact, Edicts and Proclamations were presently set forth, That the Protestants had plotted a wicked Conspiracy against the King, the Queen-Mother, the Brethren, the King of Navarre, and the Princes of the Blood-Royal; and, to keep the thing in memory, Coin was presently stamp'd, upon one side whereof was the King's Picture with this Inscription, Virtus in Rebelles, and the other side Pietas excitavit justitiam; but the King of France, notwithstanding all the shew he made of Piety, escap'd not the Divine Revenge; for before the Year came about he fell sick of a Bloody-flux, and afterwards with long and grievous Torments ended his Life.

A little before this Motte-Fenelon Ambassador to the K. of France being in England by vertue of an Order from the Queen-Mother of France, propounded to Q. Elizabeth at Kenelworth (two days before the Massacre in that Kingdom) the marriage of her youngest Son Francis Duke of Alanson (for the Queen-Mother had been told by some cunning-men that all her Sons should be Kings, and she knew no Way for it but this) but Queen Elizabeth, by reason of the disparity of age, modestly excus'd her self (for he was scarce 17 Years old, and she was now past 38) yet she promis'd to consider of it, and Alanson did not leave to prosecute the Suit.

At this time Thomas Piercy Duke of Northumberland, who first rebel'd and afterwards fled into Scotland, was for a sum of Money deliver'd by the Earl of Morton to the Lord Hunsdon Governor of Berwick, and a while after was beheaded at York. And now as these two great Personages, the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Northumberland were taken away by violent Death, so three other great Personages were at this time taken away by a natural Death; first William Pawlet, who from a private Man came by Good Acts of Q. Elizabeth. And now Queen Elizabeth having formerly borrow'd Money of her Subjects, she thankfully repaid it, which won her no less Love than if she had given it; and more Love she gain'd also at this time by two Proclamations, by one of which she commanded Noblemen to observe the Law of keeping Retainers; by the other she restrain'd Informers, who under colour of 'spy-ing out Crown-land conceal'd by private Persons, sacrilegiously seiz'd upon the Lands of Parish-Churches and Almshouses, piously endow'd by the Queen's Ancestors: and more Love and Honour also she gain'd at this time by two Acts of Justice; the one, that she satisfied the English Merchants out of the Goods which were detain'd belonging to the Dutch, and restor'd the rest to the Duke d'Alva, and made a full Transaction with the Merchants of Genoa, for the Money intercepted: The other, that she freed England at this time of the Debts which her Father and her Brother had run it into in foreign parts, and were encreas'd by yearly Interest; and caused the Obligations of the City of London, which had so often been renew'd, to be given in, to the great rejoycing of the Citizens.

The Spanish affairs growing now very turbulent in the Netherlands, Flushing lost, the Towns of Holland revolted, and the Spanish Navy vanquish'd by the Zealanders, Duke d'Alva against his Will began to shew more Kindness towards the English, so as in the Month of January the Trade which in Anno 1568 had been forbidden, was now allow'd again between the Dutch and the English for two Years; but those two Years expir'd, the English remov'd their Trading to the Confederate States.

The last Year, in the Month of November, a Daughter was born to the French King, to whom he requested Queen Elizabeth to be God-mother, who thereupon sent William Somerset Earl of Worcester into France, with a Font of massy Gold, to stand as her Deputy at the Christning. Hereupon, and for that the Queen promis'd to observe the League strictly, the French King and Queen-Mother began to affect her more and more; and the Duke d'Alanson wrote sundry Love-letters to her, and the French King and his Mother interceded for the Marriage with all earnestness. 'Tis true, the Queen conceiv'd divers Reasons why 'twas fit for her to marry, but the Courtiers, for their own ends, dissuaded her as much from it: At last the Queen-Mother of France was wonderfully importunate that her Son Alanson might have leave to come to see her; whereupon being wearied with continual Letters and Messages, she gave her Consent, but on condition that he should not take it for any disgrace to him, if he return'd without obtaining his Suit. But as soon as Queen Elizabeth had notice that his Brother Henry was elected King of Poland, and that the King of France was very sick, she gave information to Alanson by Edward Horsey Governor of the Isle of Wight, that he should not make too much haste into England, but should first procure a Peace, by some means or other, in France, and declare by some notable Argument his Goodwill towards the Protestants, thereby to be the more welcome Guest into England. Hereupon a Peace was concluded in France, and in certain places the Protestants were allow'd to exercise their Religion; and then again the French King and the Queen-Mother used all their Endeavour to have the Marriage go forward; for they were very desirous that Alanson (who was of a crooked and perverse disposition, and prone to raise Tumults) might be remov'd out of France; and withal they request-ed of Queen Elizabeth, that if the Duke of Anjou took his Voyage into Poland by Sea, he might have publick caution to sail thro' the British Ocean. To this last Request she not only consented with all alacrity, but also made offer of a Fleet to conduct him thither. Mean while Alanson fell sick of the Measles, which his Mother signified to Queen Elizabeth by Count Retz, excusing him thereupon for not coming into England as he had determin'd. The Count found the Queen at Canterbury, where she gave him Royal Entertainment; and Matth. Parker Archbishop of Canterbury royal Entertainment to them both.

All this while, since the Death of the Earl of Marre, there had been no Regent in Scotland, but now, by the procurement of Queen Elizabeth chiefly, James Douglas Earl of Morton is made Regent, who, when his Authority in a Parliamentary Assembly was establish'd, enacted many profitable Laws for the defence of Religion against Papists and Hereticks, in the name of the King; but the protection and keeping of the King's Person he confirm'd to Alexander Eveskin Earl of Marre, (to whom the custody of the Kings in their tender Years, by special Privilege belongeth) tho' he were himself in his minority, upon these Conditions, That no Papists, nor factious Persons, should be admitted into his presence; an Earl should come with only two Servants attending him; a Baron, with only one; all others single, and every one unarm'd.

The French King in the mean time sent his Ambassador Monsieur Verrier to corrupt the Earls of Atholl and Huntley, with large Promises, to oppose the Regent; Queen Elizabeth as much labour'd to defend him: But tho' by the Ministry of Killigrew she had drawn James Hamilton Duke of Chateauheraut, and George Gordon Earl of Huntley, and the most eminent of that Faction, upon indifferent conditions to acknowledge the Regent, yet William Kircald, Lord Graunge, (whom Murray, when he was Regent, had made Governor of Edinburgh Castle) the Lord Humes, the Lord Lydington, the Bishop of Dunkeld,

In hope of this match the Protestants are better used in France than before.

Dunkeld, and others, would by no means admit of the Regent's Government, but held that Castle, and fortified it in the Queen of Scot's Name, having Lydington for their Counsellor herein, and trusting to the natural strength of the Place, and to the Duke d'Alva's and the French King's Promises, to send them Supplies both of Men and Money. Now when these Persons could by no means be drawn to accept of Conditions of Peace, and to deliver up the Castle to the Regent, Queen Elizabeth (who could in no case endure the French in Scotland) suffer'd herself at length to be entreated by the Regent to send Forces, Guns, and Ammunition for assailing the Castle, upon certain Conditions, whereof one was, That ten Hostages should be sent into England, to be security for returning the Men and Ammunition, unless by the common Hazard of the War they should chance to miscarry. The Conditions being agreed upon, William Drury Marshal of the Garrison at Berwick, with some great Ordnance, and Fifteen hundred Soldiers (amongst whom were some Noble Volunteers, George Carew, Henry Carew, Thomas Cecil, Henry Lee, William Knowls, Sutton, Cutton, Kelway, William Killigrew, and others) enter'd into Scotland, and besieg'd the Castle; which, after three and thirty Days siege, was delivered up to the Regent for the King's use, with all the Persons that were in it, amongst whom Kircald Lord Graunge, and James his Brother, Musman and Cook Goldsmiths (who had counterfeited Coin in the Castle) were hang'd; altho' to redeem Graunge's life, an hundred of the Family of the Kircalds offer'd themselves to be in perpetual Servitude to the Regent, besides an annual Pension of Three thousand Marks, and Twenty thousand Pounds of Scottish Money in present; and to put in caution, that from thenceforth he should continue in duty and homage to the King; but it would not be accepted. Humes and the rest were sav'd, thro' Queen Elizabeth's merciful Intercession: Lydington was sent to Leith, where he died, and was suspected to be poisoned; a Man of the greatest Understanding in the Scottish Nation, and of an excellent Wit, but very variable; for which George Buchanan called him the Chamælion.

And now from this time Scotland began to breathe, after long Civil Wars, and as well the Captains of both Parties, as the Soldiers, betook themselves into Sweedland, France, and the Low-Countries, where they valourously behaved themselves, and won great Commendation. As for John Lesly Bishop of Rosse, he was now set at liberty, but commanded to depart presently out of England; and being beyond the Sea, he continued still to sollicite his Mistress the Queen of Scot's Cause with the Emperor, the Pope, the French King, and the German Princes of the Popish Religion; who all led him on with fair Promises, but performed nothing: For indeed he, in whom he had greatest confidence, which was the Duke d'Alva, was at that time called away, partly out of jealousy of State, as being thought to grow too great, and partly out of opinion that by his Cruelty he made the People to revolt; and therefore in his place was sent Ludovicus Zuniga, a Man of great Nobility in Spain, but of a more peaceable Disposition than d'Alva: And now this Man did all good Offices to win Queen Elizabeth to him, and minding his own Affairs only, would not intermeddle with the Scottish or English Matters.

About this time a frantick Opinion was held by one Peter Bouchet, a Gentleman of the Middle-Temple, That it was Lawful to kill them that opposed the Truth of the Gospel; & so far was he possess'd with this Opinion, that he assaulted the famous Seaman Captain Hawkins, and wounded him with a Dagger, taking him for Horton, who at that time was in great favour with the Queen and of the Privy Council, whom he had been informed to be a great Adversary to Innovations. The Queen grew so angry hereat, that she commanded Martial Law should be executed upon him presently, till her Counsel advised her, that Martial Law was not to be used but in the field, and turbulent times; but at home, and in time of Peace there must be legal proceedings: Hereupon Bouchet was sent to the Tower, where taking a Brand out of the Fire, he struck it into the Brains of one of his Keepers, named Hugh Longworth, and killed him; for which Fact he was condemn'd of murther, had his right-hand cut off and nail'd to the Gallows, and himself hang'd.

After the violent Death of this Varlet, we may speak of the natural death of two great Persons: First William Lord Howard of Effingham, Son of the warlike Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, by his second Wife Agnes Tilney. This William was made a Baron by Queen Mary, and Lord High Admiral of England, and by Queen Elizabeth Lord Chamberlain, till such time that being taken with Age, he yielded up that Place to the Earl of Suffex, and was then made Keeper of the Privy Seal, which is the Fourth Degree of Honour in England. His Son Charles succeeded him in the Dignity of his Barony, who was afterward made Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, and then Lord High Admiral of England. A while after him died Reginald Gray Earl of Kent, whom the Queen a Year before of a private Man had made Earl of Kent, when as that Title, from the Death of Richard Gray Earl of Kent, who had wasted his Patrimony, and was elder Brother to this Man's Grandfather, had lain asleep for fifteen Years together.

At this time many particular Rebellions were in Ireland, the O-Connors and O-Moors took Arms, and committed many Outrages: In Munster James Fitz-Morris, and Fitz-Edmund did the like; but by the Industry of Sir John Perrot President of Munster, were suppressed. In Ulster, Bryan Mac-Philym burnt Knockfergus, and many others joyned in Rebellion with him. Against these Walter Devereux (whom the Queen had lately created Earl of Essex) desired leave to go; which Sir William Fitz-Williams Deputy of Ireland opposed, as fearing that the Glory of so great an Earl would eclipse his Light. But for this the Queen finds a Remedy, by appointing Essex to take a Patent of the Deputy, whereby to be made Governour of Ulster. But this Remedy for Fitz-Williams might have made a sore in the Mind of Essex (to receive his Authority from his inferior) but that the Nobleness of his Mind made him more to regard the Virtue than the Glory. And so, in the End of August, he landed at Knockfergus, having with him the Lords Darcy and Rich, and Sir Henry Knowls and his four Brothers, Michael and John Carnes, Henry, William, and John Norris : At his landing Bryan Mac-Phelym welcom'd him, tendering unto him all manner of Dutifulness and Service ; but presently after falls from him, and joyns with Turlogh Leynigh. After this Revolt, the Earl of Essex finding many Difficulties in the Business, and himself not well provided of skilful Soldiers, makes suit to the Queen for leave to come home, which the Earl of Leicester (who liked his room better than his Company) opposed ; till after expence of a Year's time and much treasure, he at last obtain'd leave, and return'd home.

The Duke
Alanfon continues his suit
Elizabeth.

The next Year, being 1574, and the 17th Year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, the Duke Alanfon grew more importunate in his Suit than at any time before ; so he obtain'd of the Queen to come into England, any time before the 20th of May ; and this she rather did, because she perceiv'd him now to be really bent against the Guises her sworn Enemies. But before this Answer was brought him, Valentine Dale Dr. of the Civil Law, the Queen's Ambassador in France, gave Intimation to the Queen. That Alanfon and Navarre were in restraint, and committed to Keepers : For the Guises had suggested that Alanfon held intimate friendship with the chief Leaders of the Protestants in France ; and indeed, Alanfon being examin'd, freely confessed, that he had now for a good while desir'd the Marriage of the Queen of England, and conceiving that good Correspondence with the Protestants might be useful to him to that end, he had thereupon had conference with them thereabout, and concerning the Low-Country War. In the mean time Thomas Wilkes, Dale's Secretary, got cunningly to Alanfon, and in the Queen's Name made promise both to him and to Navarre, that she would omit no opportunity of procuring their Enlargement. For which the subtil Queen-Mother so complain'd of him to Queen Elizabeth, that he was fain to go into France, and there crave pardon for his Fault. But Navarre, not unmindful of this kindness in Wilkes, when above five and twenty Years after, being King of France, he saw him in Normandy, and Knighted him. Hereupon the Queen sent Thomas Randol into France, to the Queen-Mother, that if it were possible, he might gain Reconciliation for Alanfon her Son, and for the King of Navarre. But before he was landed in France, Charles the then French King died, whose Funeral Rites were solemnly perform'd in St. Paul's Church in London.

King of France
solicites the Queen for Alanfon.

As soon as Henry the Third King of France, was come from Poland, Roger Lord North was sent into France to congratulate his return and happy Inauguration into the Kingdom ; who thereupon together with the Queen-Mother, did forthwith send their joint Letters into England, strongly soliciting the business of Marriage between Alanfon and the Queen. In the mean time notwithstanding, they used all possible Device (and left no means unsought) to get the young King of Scotland to be sent into France, and to deprive Morton, who was the Regent, of his Authority, whereof the Queen of Scots also was desirous ; she being perswaded, that if her Son were once gotten safely into France, she and the Catholics in England should be more mildly used. At which time, an aspersion was cast upon the Queen of Scots, as if she had made the Match between Charles Uncle to the Queen of Scots (who had lately the Earldom of Lenox confirmed to him by Parliament) and Elizabeth Cavendish the Countess of Shrewsbury's Daughter by a former Husband ; upon which ground, both their Mothers, and some others also were kept in Prison for a time, and being doubted whereunto this Marriage should tend, Henry Earl of Huntington, President of the Council in the North, is authoriz'd with secret Instructions to examine it. It will be fit here to say something of this place of Government in the North ; which from small beginnings is now become so eminent as it is at this Day, whereof this was the Original : When as in the Reign of Henry VIII. after that the Rebellion in the northern Parts about the subversion of Abbies was quieted, the Duke of Norfolk tarried in those Quarters, and many Complaints of Injuries done were tender'd unto him, whereof some he compos'd himself, and others he commended under his Seal for Men of Wisdom to determine : Hereof when King Henry heard he sent down a peculiar Seal to be used in these cases, and calling home the Duke, committed the same to Tonstall Bishop of Durham, and constituted Assistants with Authority to hear and determine the Complaints of the Poor, and was the first that was called President ; and from that time the Authority of his Successors grew in credit.

It was now the Year 1575, and the 18th Year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when Henry the Third King of France being return'd from Poland, and crown'd at Rhemes, was careful to have the League of Blois confirm'd : Which in the Year 1572. had been concluded between his Brother Charles and the most Illustrious Queen Elizabeth : Now therefore he confirm'd it with his own Subscription, and deliver'd it to Dale the Queen's Leiger, as the Queen likewise ratified it at St. James's near Westminster : But a little after he demanded by Letters, Whether the mutual defence against all the Persons mentioned in the League was intended to comprehend the Case of Religion also ? Whereunto she answer'd, That it did comprehend it : He thereupon hearing this from the Queen, began presently to prepare War against the Protestants, and Alanfon being drawn to the adverse Party, there was no Speech of the Marriage for a long time.

In the Netherlands at this time, Lodowick Zuniga, who was Successor unto Duke d'Alva, was wholly bent to recover the Command of the Seas, which d'Alva had neglected ; but not being sufficiently provided of a Navy, he sent Boischoit into England, that with the Queen's leave he might take up Ships and Mariners to go against the Hollanders and Zelanders ; but this she would not grant : Then he made suit that the Queen would please not to take it in evil part, if the banished Persons of the English in the Low-Countries served the King of Spain in a Sea-fight against the Hollanders ; and that they might have free access to the Ports of England, to buy Provision for ready Money ; but this she would not grant neither : Then he made request, That the Dutch, who were Rebels against the King of Spain, might be put out of England ; but neither would she grant this, as being an Action void of of Humanity, and against the Laws of Hospitality; yet because she would not be thought to violate the old Burgundian Law, she commanded by Proclamation, That the Ships of the Dutch, which were made ready, should not go forth of the Haven; nor yet the Dutch, who had taken up Arms against the King of Spain, enter into the Ports of England, and by Name the Prince of Orange, and fifty other the prime of that Faction. And this she did the more willingly, because Zuniga, at the Intercession of Wilson the English Ambassador, had remov'd the Earl of Westmoreland, and other English Fugitives out of the Dominion of the K. of Spain, and had also dissolv'd the English Seminary at Doway; tho' instead thereof, the Guises, thro' the Procurement of Pope Gregory the Thirteenth, set up another Seminary at Rhemes.

The States of the Low-Countries makes Queen Elizabeth to be their Protector, and why.

And at this time the Prince of Orange perceiving his Forces but small, and thinking himself too weak for the King of Spain, and little hope of aid from England, he enter'd into Consultation with the Confederate States, to whose Protection they were best and in most security to betake themselves. The Princes of Germany they knew were not all of one mind, parted from Money very hardly, and did not every way, nor would not by any means possible accord and concur with them in their Religion; and there they were not so fit. Then the French, they say, were entangled in a Civil War, and so had enough of their own to do; besides the old Grudges and Heart-burnings that were between the French and Dutch; and therefore neither were they so fit. There remain'd then the English, as fittest of any (if it might be obtain'd) seeing they were Neighbours of the same Religion, and of a Language not much different, strong in Shipping, and rich in Merchandize. Hereupon (considering the Commodiousness of the English Nation) they sent into England, Philip Marnize of Saint Aldegond, Janus Dousa, William Nyvell, and Dr. Melsen; who in an honourable Embassage offer'd the Countries of Holland and Zealand to be possess'd and protected by the Queen, for as much as she was descended from the Princes of Holland, by Philippa Wife of Edward the Third, Daughter of William of Barbaria, Count of Hainault and Holland; by whose other Sister the hereditary Right of those Provinces came to the King of Spain. To this offer, the Queen takes time to answer, and at last, having maturely advis'd of the Matter, her Answer was this; That as yet she conceiv'd not how, with the safety of her Honour, and an upright Conscience, she could receive those Provinces into her Protection, much less assume them into her possession; but promised she would deal earnestly with the King of Spain, that a well-conditioned Peace might be concluded. Presently upon this Zuniga Governour of the Low-Countries died; after whose death, the States of Brabant, Flanders, and the other Provinces, took upon them the ancient Administration & Authority in the Commonwealth; which the King of Spain was fain to confirm to them, till such time as John of Austria were come, whom he determin'd to make Governour there. In the mean time, Q. Elizabeth, in behalf of the K. of Spain, sent William Davison in Embassage to those Princes, to exhort them to be peaceable and quiet, which yet, by reason of the Spanish

Zuniga dying, John of Austria is sent Governour into the Netherlands.

Soldiers were so outrageous, little prevailed.

In England all was calm and quiet for all this Year, only a difference fell out between Sir John Foster Governour of Berwick, and John Carmichael Keeper of Liddisdale in Scotland: In composing whereof, the Regent of Scotland, having given Queen Elizabeth some Discontentment, was fain to come unarm'd before the Earl of Huntington, appointed the Legate for England at Bonderod, and so the Matter was taken up, and the Regent ever after continued constant in observing the Queen, and to his great Commendation, restrain'd the Free-booters of the Borders, to the great Good of both Kingdoms.

This Year there died in Scotland, James Hamilton Duke of Chastell-heraut, and Earl of Arran, who was great Grand-child of James the Second K. of Scots, by his Daughter appointed Tutor to Mary Queen of Scots, and designed Heir and Governor of the Kingdom, during her Minority.

At this time the Earl of Essex is come into Ireland again, where having done good Services, and being in the midst of Victory, he was on a sudden commanded to resign his Authority in Ulster: And as tho' he were an ordinary Commander, is set over 300 Soldiers, which Disgrace was wrought by his Adversaries at Court, to the continual perplexing of his mild Spirit. And now is Sir Henry Sidney the third time sent Deputy into Ireland; who going into Ulster, there came to him and submitted themselves, Mac Mahon, Mac Guyre, Torlogh Leynegh, the O'Connors and O'Moors, the Earl of Desmond, and the rebellious Sons of the Earl of Clauricard, all whom he receiv'd into Favour, and with great Commendation administered the Province.

At this time the Spaniard in the Low-Countries began to deal roughly with the People, and harried the Inhabitants with all manner of Spoil and Injury: Antwerp, the most famous Town of Traffick in all Europe, was miserably pillaged, the English Merchants Houses rifled, insomuch that the States were enforced to take up Arms, and Messengers were sent to all neighbouring Princes; and to Q. Elizabeth was sent Monsieur Aubigny, both to shew her upon how necessary and just Causes they had taken up Arms, and also to borrow of her a Sum of Money, the better to enable them to resist the Spaniard. But she being certainly informed, that they first sued to the French K. for help, denied the Request, yet promised to intercede earnestly with the K. of Spain for Peace. And in that employment, she address'd into Spain, John Smith, Cousin-german to King Edward the Sixth, a Man of Spanish Behaviour, and well known to the K. of Spain, who was liberally received by the King, and with such Wisdom retorted the contumelious Speech of Gasper Quirago Archbishop of Toledo, and the Spanish Inquisitors, who would not admit in the Queen's Title the Attribute of Defender of the Faith; that he gained great Thanks from the King of Spain himself, who requested him not to speak of it to the Queen, and gave severe command, that the Title should be admitted.

And now by this time was John of Austria come into the Low-Countries with a large Commission; for he was the Natural Son of the Emperor Charles the Fifth, to whom the Queen sent Edward Horsey, Governour of the Isle of Wight, to congratulate his coming thither, and to offer help if the States called the French into the Netherlands; yet at the same time, Swevingham being exceeding importunate on the States behalf, she sent them twenty thousand Pounds of English Money, (so well she could play her Game on both hands) upon condition they should neither change their Prince nor their Religion, nor take the French into the Low-Countries, nor refuse a Peace, if John of Austria should condescend to indifferent Conditions; but if he embraced a Peace, then the Money should be paid back to the Spanish Soldiers, who were ready to Mutiny for lack of Pay. So careful she was to retain these declining Provinces in obedience to the King of Spain.

At this time a Voyage was undertaken, to try if there could be found any Sea upon the North part of America, leading to the wealthy Coast of Cathaya, whereby in one Commerce might be joyn'd the Riches of both the East and West parts of the World; in which Voyage was employ'd Martin Forbisher, who set Sail from Harwich the 18th of June, and the 9th of August entred into that Bay, or Sea, but could pass no further for Snow and Ice. The like expedition was taken in hand two Years after with no better success.

About this time died the Emperor Maximilian, a Prince that deserved well of Queen Elizabeth, and the English, who thereupon sent Sir William Sidney to his Son Rodolphus King of the Romans to condole his Father's death, and congratulate his Succession: As likewise to do the like for the decease of the Count Electo Palatine, named Frederick the Third, with his surviving Son.

Walter Devereux Earl of Essex out of discontentment dieth in Ireland.

And now Walter Devereux Earl of Essex, who out of Leicester's Envy had been recall'd out of Ireland, was out of Leicester's fear, (as being threatned by him) sent back again into Ireland, but with the empty Title of Earl Marshal of Ireland; with the Grief whereof he fell into a bloody Flux, and in most grievous Torments ended his Life: When he had first desired the standers-by to admonish his Son (scarce ten Years old at that time) to have always before his Eyes the 36th Year of his Age, as the utmost term of his Life, which neither himself, nor his Father before him could outgo, and the Son indeed attain'd not to it, as shall hereafter be declar'd. He was suspected to be poysoned; but Sir Henry Sidney Deputy of Ireland, after diligent search made, wrote to the Lords of the Council, that the Earl often said, It was familiar to him upon any great Discontentment to fall into a Flux, and for his part he had no suspicion of his being poyson'd: Yet was this suspicion increased, for that presently after his Death the Earl of Leicester, with a great Sum of Money, and large Promises, putting away Douglas Sheffield, by whom he had a Son, openly married Essex's Widdow. For altho' it was given out, that he was privately married to her, yet Sir Francis Knolles her Father, who was well acquainted with Leicester's roving Loves, would not believe it, unless he himself were present at the Marriage, and had it testified by a publick Notary. At this time also died Sir Anthony Cook of Gyddy-hall in Essex, who had been Schoolmaster to King Edward the 6th, and was no less Schoolmaster to his own Daughters, whom he made skilful in the Greek and Latin Tongues; married all to Men of great Honour; one to Sir William Cecil, Lord Treasurer of England; a second to Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal; a third to Sir Thomas Hobby, who died Ambassador in France; a fourth to Sir Ralph Rowlet; and the fifth to Sir Henry Killigrew.

At this time, the Sons of the Earl of Clanriccard, who scarce two Month before had obtained pardon for their Rebellion, fell into Rebellion again, but were by the Deputy soon suppress'd; and William Drury newly made President of Munster, reduc'd the whole Province to good Order, except only the County of Kerry, whither a number of Vagabonds were gotten, trusting to the Immunities of the Place. For King Edward the 3d made Kerry a County Palatine, and granted to the Earls of Desmond all the Royal Liberties which the K. of England had in that County, excepting four Pleas, viz. Of Burning, Rape, Fire-stall, and Treasure Trove. The Governor, notwithstanding wisely judging, that these Liberties were granted for the better preservation of Justice, and not for maintenance of outrageous Malefactors, enter'd into it, and violently put to flight and vanquish'd the mischievous Crew which the Earl of Desmond had placed there in ambush. The Earl in the mean while made great Complaints of Drury to the Deputy; and particularly of the Tax which they call Ceasse, which is an exaction of Provision of Victuals at a certain rate for the Deputy's Family, and the Soldiers in Garrison. This Tax not he only, but in Leinster also many Lords refused to pay, alledging, that it was not to be enacted but by Parliament; but the Matter being examin'd in England, it appear'd by the Records of the Kingdom, That this Tax was anciently impos'd; and that by a certain right of Majesty, a Prerogative Royal, which is not subjected to Laws, yet not contrary to them neither, as the wise Civilians have observed. Yet the Queen commanded to use a moderation in exactions of this nature, saying, She would have her Subjects shorn, but not devour'd.

The Tax in Ireland called the Ceasse.

It was now the Year 1577, and the 20th of Qu. Elizabeth's Reign, when John of Austria, pretending to Qu. Elizabeth nothing but Peace, yet is found to deal secretly with the Pope, to derive her of her Kingdom, and himself to marry the Queen of Scots, and invade England: Of which his Practices the Prince of Orange gives Qu. Elizabeth the first Intelligence. Whereupon (finding his deep dissembling) she enters into a League with the States, for mutual defence both at Sea and Land, upon certain Conditions; but having concluded it (because she would not have it wrongfully interpreted, as tho' she meant to foster a Rebellion in the Netherlands) she sent Thomas Wilkes to the King of Spain with these Informations, That she had always endeavour'd to keep the Low-Countries in Obedience to the King of Spain; had perswaded (even with Threatnings) the Prince of Orange to accept of Peace; but withal, if the King of Spain would have his Subjects obedient to him, she then requests him to restore their Privileges, and to remove John of Austria from the Government, who not only was her deadly Enemy, but labour'd by all means to bring the Netherlands into utter Servitude. If this be granted by the King of Spain, she then faithfully promiseth, That if the States perform not their Allegiance to him, as by their Promise to her they are engag'd to do, she will utterly forsake 'em, and bend her self with all her Forces to compel them. While Wilkes in Spain unfoldeth these matters, John of Austria sends to Queen Elizabeth, in most grievous manner accusing the States for Disobedience, and making a large Declaration of the Causes for which he had taken up Arms again. Thus Queen Elizabeth (like a fortunate Princess) sate as an honourable Arbitress between the Spanish, the French, and the States; inasmuch that it was not untrue which one wrote, That France and Spain were Ballances in the Scale of Europe, and England the Beam to turn them either way; for they still got the better to whom she adhered.

An. Reg. 9.
a sudden Mortality at the Assizes at Oxford.

About this time, when the Judges sate at the Assizes in Oxford, and one Rowland Jenks a Bookseller was question'd for speaking opprobrious Words against the Queen, suddenly they were surpriz'd with a pestilent Savour, whether rising from the noisome Smell of the Prisoners, or from the damp of the Ground, is uncertain; but all that were there present, almost every one, within Forty Hours died, except Women and Children; and the Contagion went no farther. There died Robert Bell Lord Chief-Baron, Robert d'Oily, Sir William Babington, d'Oily Sheriff of Oxfordshire, Harcourt, Weyman, Pettiplace, most of 'em Men in this Tract; Barham the famous Lawyer, almost all the Jurors, and Three hundred other, more or less.

The Lord Latimer's Family in Issue-male extinct; and how his four Daughters were bestow'd.

This Year the Title of the Lord Latimer (which had flourish'd in the Family of the Nevils even since the Days of K. Henry VI.) was extinct in John Nevil, who died without Issue-male, and left a fair Estate to four Daughters, whereof the eldest married Henry Earl of Northumberland; the second Thomas Cecill, who was afterward Earl of Exeter; the third Sir William Cornwallis; and the fourth Sir John Davers.

In Ireland the O-Moors and O-Connors, and others, whose Ancestors the Earl of Suffex, in Queen Mary's day, had for their Rebellion depriv'd of their Patrimony in Leyse and Ophalie, did now break forth into a new Rebellion, under the Conduct of Rorie Oge, that is, Roderick the younger, set on fire the Village of Naasse, assault Lochlin; from whence being driven back by the Valour of George Carew the Governor, he was afterward slain.

Out of England at this time there went into the Low Countries, John North, the Lord North's eldest Son; John Norris, second Son to the Lord Norris, Henry Cavendish, and Thomas Morgan, Colonels, with many Volunteers to learn military Experience. Thither also came Casmire the Eleâor-Palatine's Son, with an Army of German Horse and Foot, at the Queen's charges. Upon these Don John, assisted by the Prince of Parma, Mondragon, and other the best Commanders of Spain, confident of Victory, flieth furiously before they expected him, yet after a long Fight was forced to retreat; but then turning again, and thinking to break thro' the Hedges and Brakes where the English and Scottish Volunteers had placed themselves, was again repuls'd; for the English and Scottish were so hot upon the matter, that casting away their Garments, by reason of the hot Weather, they fought in their Shirts, which they made fast about 'em. In this Battel Norris fought most valiantly, and had three Horses slain under him; as also Steward the Scot, Bingham, and William Markham.

Now, for comfort to the afflicted Provinces, there came at that time into the Netherlands the Count Swarzenburg from the Emperor, Monsieur Bellevue from the French King, and from the Queen of England the Lord Colham and Walsingham, with commission to procure Conditions of Peace, but return'd without doing any thing, for that Don John refus'd to admit the Protestant Religion, and the Prince of Orange refus'd to return into Holland.

About this time Egremond Ratcliffe, Son to Henry Earl of Suffex by his second Wife, who had been a prime Man in the Rebellion in the North, and serv'd now under Don John, was accus'd by the English Fugitives, That he was sent underhand to kill Don John, which whether true or false, he was thereupon taken and put to death. The Spaniards had affirm'd, That Ratcliffe at his last End confess'd voluntarily, that he was freed out of the Tower of London, and mov'd by Walsingham's large Promises to do this Fact; but the English that were present at his death deny that he confess'd any such thing, tho' the English Rebels did all they could to wrest this Confession from him.

Egremond Ratcliffe's put to death in Flanders, and why.

At this very time Don John, in the flower of his age, died of the Pestilence, or (as some say) of Grief, as being neglected by the King of Spain his Brother, a Man of an insatiable Ambition, who aim'd first at the Kingdom of Tunis, and after of England; and who, without the privacy of the French King, or King of Spain, had made a League with the Guises for the defence of both Crowns.

Alanson, altho' very busie about the Belgick War, yet now began again to pursue the Marriage with Queen Elizabeth; for renewing of which Suit, first was Bacherville sent to the Queen, and soon after Rambouillet, from the French King, and within a Month after that, Simier, a neat Courtier, and exquisitely learn'd in the Art of Love, accompanied with a great number of the French Nobility, whom the Queen at Richmond entertain'd in such loving manner, that Leicester began to rage, as if his Hopes were now quite blasted. Certainly, a little before, when Ashley, a Lady of the Queen's Bedchamber, mention'd the Earl of Leicester to her for a Husband, she with an angry Countenance reply'd, Dost thou think me so unlike my self, and so forgetful of Majesty, as to prefer my Servant, whom I my self have advanc'd, before the Greatest of Princes of the Christian World?

Alanson solicits his Suit with the Queen afresh.

But it is now time to return to the Scottish affairs. The Earl of Morton, Regent of Scotland, tho' a Man of great Wisdom and Valour, yet was now so overcome of Covetousness, that he grew universally hated; and thereupon with the joint consent of the Nobility, the Administration of the Commonwealth was translated to the King, tho' he was yet but twelve years old, and twelve of the chief Lords were appointed to attend him in Council, three of 'em by course for three Months; amongst whom the Earl of Morton for one, that they might not seem to cast him quite off. The King having taken upon him the Administration, sent presently the Earl of Dumferlin to Queen Elizabeth, acknowledging her great Deserts towards him, and requesting to have the Treaty of Edinburgh, agreed upon in the Year 1559, to be confirm'd, for the more happy restraining the Robbers about the Borders; and withal, that his ancient Patrimony in England, namely, the Lands granted to his Grandfather Matthew Earl of Lenox, and the Countess his Grandmother, might be deliver'd into his hands, who was the next Heir. The Queen really promis'd the former Demand, but stuck a little at the last concerning the Patrimony; for she would not grant that Arabella, the Daughter of Charles the King of Scots Uncle, born in England, was next Heir to the Lands in England; neither would she grant the Ambassador's Proof out of History, That the King of Scots, born in Scotland, did anciently (without question) hold the Earldom of Huntington by Right of Inheritance; yet she commanded a Sequestration to be made of the Revenues of those Lands, by Burleigh Master of the Wards; and willeth the King, That out of the Goods of the E. of Lenox in Scotland Satisfaction might be made to his Grandmother's Creditors here: For she took it in ill part, that the King had recall'd the Enfeoffment of the Earldom of Lenox (made to his Uncle Charles and his Heirs) after the death of Charles, to the prejudice (as was suggested to her) of Arabella, altho' indeed it be a Privilege of the Kings of Scotland, that they may recall Donations made in their minority.

The Earl of Morton in the mean while, not enduring the Disgrace to be outed of his Regency, regarded not the prescript Form of Government lately set down, but drew the Administration of all matters to himself, and kept the King in his own power at the Castle of Sterling, admitting none to his presence but whom he pleas'd. At this Presumption the Lords growing angry, made the Earl of Arboll their Captain, and in the King's name levied a great Army, and were ready to encounter Morton, but by the Intercession of Robert Bowes the English Ambassador they were stay'd from fighting; so Morton presently betook himself home, and the Earl of Arboll soon after died, not without suspicion of being poyson'd.

The King of Spain and the Pope Gregory XIII. held secret consultation to invade at once both England and Ireland, and to work the absolute Ruin of Queen Elizabeth; the Pope, to gain the Kingdom of Ireland for his Son James Buoncompagno, whom he made Marquis of Vignola; the King of Spain, secretly to relieve the Irish Rebels, as Queen Elizabeth did the Dutch, while Friendship in Words was held on both sides: And it being known that the greatest Strength of England consisted in the Navy-royal and Merchants Ships, 'twas advis'd, that the Italian and Dutch Merchants should hire these Ships for long Voyages, to the end that while they were absent the Queen's Navy might be surpriz'd with a greater Fleet: And at that time Thomas Stukely, an English Fugitive, should join himself to the Irish Rebels with new Forces; for he making great boast, and promising the Kingdom of Ireland to the Pope's bastard Son, had so insinuated himself into grace with the ambitious old Man, that he adorn'd him with the Titles of Marquis of Lemster, Earl of Wexford and Catterlogh, Viscount Morogh, and Baron of Ross, (the principal Dignities of Ireland) and made him Commander over Eight hundred Italian Soldiers, to be employ'd in the Irish War. With which Forces Stukely setting sail from Civita Vecchia, arriv'd at length in Portugal, where he and his Forces were by Divine Providence diverted another way: For Sebastian King of Portugal (to whom the chief Command in this Expedition against England was assign'd) being first to dispatch a War in Africa, in aid of Mahomet Abdalla, Son to the King of Fesse, perswaded Stukely to go along with him into Mauritania, together with his Italian Soldiers, and then afterwards they would go together into Ireland. To this motion Stukely soon agreed, and therein agreed with his Destiny; for in that memorable Battel where three Kings were slain, both he and Sebastian lost their Lives.

At this time Sir Henry Sidney (who had been Deputy of Ireland at several times eleven years) deliver'd up his Deputyship to Sir William Drury President of Munster: Such a Deputy for good Government, that if any have equal'd him, none have excel'd him.

'Twas now the Year 1579, and the 22d Year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when John Casimire Son of Frederick the Third, Count Palatine of the Rhine, came into England; where, after he had been entertain'd with Tiltings and Jufts, made Knight of the Garter, (the Queen tying the Garter about his Leg) and rewarded with a yearly Pension, he return'd.

And now was Alexander Farnese Prince of Parma made Governor of the Netherlands by the King of Spain, and Queen Elizabeth supplies the States with a great Sum of Money, for which William Davison brought into England the ancient precious Habiliments of the Family of Burgundy, and their costly Vessels, laid to pawn by Matthew of Austria and the States.

Simier in the mean time here in England ceaseth not by all amorous Devices to persuade the Queen to marry Alanfon; wherein he drew her so far, that the Earl of Leicester gave out, he crept into the Queen's Affection by Love-potions and unlawful Arts; and Simier on the other side endeavour'd by all means to cast down Leicester, discovering his marriage with the Earl of Essex's Widow; whereat the Queen grew so angry, that she confin'd him to the Castle at Greenwich, and meant to have him committed to the Tower, but that the Earl of Suffex (tho' his greatest Adversary) dissuaded her, telling her, that none ought to be molested for contracting lawful Matrimony: But Leicester notwithstanding was so provoked for his confining, that he was bent to revenge it; and if it be true as some said, he had suborn'd one Tinder, a Yeoman of the Guard, to murder Simier. Sure it is, the Queen by Proclamation commanded, That no Person should offer Injury to the Ambassador, or any of his Servants. At this time it fell out, that as the Queen, together with Simier, the Earl of Lincoln, and Hat- ton Vice-Chamberlain, were row'd in a Barge to Greenwich, a young Man shooting off a Harquebus out of a Boat, shot one of the Rowers in the Queen's Barge thro' the Arm with a Bullet, who was presently taken and led to the Gallows, but, upon solemn protestation that he did it unwittingly, and not with a malicious Intent, he was let go, and pardon'd. Some would have perswaded the Queen that he was purposely fuborn'd to shoot either her or the French Ambassador; but she was so far from suspecting her Subjects that she would often say, She would not believe any thing against them, which a Mother would not believe against her Children.

Alanfon comes privately into England, and hath secret Conference with the Queen.

Burleigh and others enjoin'd to consult the Marriage-Covenants,

After a few days Alanfon himself came privately into England with only one or two attendants, and came to the Queen at Greenwich at a time when she thought not of it: They had secret Conference together, all Parties being sent away, after which, being seen of very few, he return'd home; but, within a month or two after, the Queen enjoin'd the Lord Burleigh Treasurer, the Earls of Suffex, Leicester, Hatton, and Walsingham, seriously to weigh both the dangers and the commodities like to arise from the Marriage with him, and to consult with Simier concerning the Marriage-Covenants.

The Title of Ld d'Aubigny, from whence it came.

As in England there was some Fear of this French-man, so in Scotland at this time of another French-man, call'd Esme Steward, Lord of Aubigny, who came now into Scotland to visit the King, his Cousin: He was the Son of John Steward, Brother to Matthew Steward Earl of Lenox, the King's Grandfather, and had denomination from Aubigny in France, which Title Charles the seventh King of France had anciently confer'd upon John Steward of the Family of Lenox, who being Constable of the Scottish Army in France, vanquish'd the English in one Battel, and slain by them in another; and from that time the Title belong'd to the younger descendant of that House. This Esme Steward the King embraced with exceeding great Love, made him Lord-Chamberlain of Scotland, and Captain of the Castle of Dumbrition, and created him first Earl, and then Duke of Lenox. The Fear from this Man was, because he was devoted to the Guises and the Popish Religion; and that which encreas'd the Fear from this Man was, because he applied himself to Morton's Adversaries, and meditated to have Thomas Carre Lord Fernihurst call'd home, who of all Men was most addicted to the Queen of Scots.

Esme Steward made first Duke of Lenox.

The Turkey Merchants, when set up.

About this time Queen Elizabeth, at the request of William Harbourn an English-man, procur'd a Grant from the Turkish Emperor for the English Merchants to exercise free Traffick in all places of his Dominions, as well as Venetians, Polanders, and other neighbouring Nations: Whereupon they set up first the Company of Turkey Merchants, managing a most gainful Trade at Constantinople, Alexandria, Egypt, Aleppo, Cyprus, and other parts of Asia, bringing home Spices, Perfumes, unwrought Silks, Tapestry, Indigo, Currans, and the like.

This Year died Sir Nicholas Bacon Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal, but who by vertue of an Act of Parliament always exercis'd the Jurisdiction of Lord-Chancellor; a very fat Man, but singularly wise, and a chief Prop of the Queen's Privy-Council; in whose Place succeeded Sir William Bromley, the Queen's Solicitor, with the Title of Lord-Chancellor of England.

In Ireland at this time, in the Province of Munster, James Fitz-Morris kindled a new Fire of Rebellion; for after his former submission upon his Knees, vowing all obedience to the Queen, he stole away into France, and promis'd the French King, if he would lend him assistance, to make him King of Ireland: But being by him slighted, he went into Spain, and made the like Offer to the King there. The King of Spain sent him to the Pope, from whom by means of Nicholas Sanders, an English Priest, and Alan an Irish-man, (both Doctors in Divinity) he obtain'd a little Money, a Legate's Authority for Sanders, a consecrated Banner, and Letters of Commendation to the Catholick King. And returning from Spain with those Divines, three Ships, and a few Men, he landed at Smerwick Kerry, a demi-Island in the West part of Ireland, about the first Day of July, where (the place being first consecrated by the Priests) he built a Fort, and brought the Ships close under it, but these were presently set upon and carried away by Thomas Courtney, and thereby the Spaniards depriv'd of their opportunity of coming thither by Sea. But now John and James, Brothers to the Earl of Desmond, gathering together a small number of Irish, joyn themselves presently with their Kinsman Fitz-Morris: Yet the Spaniards, seeing but a very few Irish, and those unarm'd, came unto them, began to distrust the state they were in, and to cry out, They were undone; whom Fitz-Morris hearten'd the best he could, telling them Supplies were speedily to come: And going himself to get more company, he pass'd thro' the Land of his Cousin William a Burgh, who tho' he had been a Rebel before, yet was now grown loyal, so as there fell out a Skirmish between them, wherein Fitz-Morris being struck thro' with a Pike, and shot into the Head with a leaden Bullet, died in the place, and most of his Company with him; but withal two of William Burgh's Sons were in that Skirmish slain also; when the Queen, to comfort him for the loss of his Sons, adorn'd him with the Dignity of Baron of Castle-Conell, and rewarded him with a yearly Pension besides; which favour so overwhelm'd him with Joy that he liv'd but a short while after. And now Sir William Drury the Deputy growing very sick, appointed Sir Nicholas Malby, then Governor of Connaught, to be President of Munster, and General of the Army; at which time the Earl of Desmond, who had all this while made a shew of Loyalty, breaks openly out into Rebellion; when now Drury the Deputy dying at Waterford, by his Death Malby's Authority ceasing, Sir William Pelham is by the Council chosen Justice of Ireland, with the Authority of Viceroy, until such time as a Deputy were appointed, and the Earl of Ormond is made President of Munster. Pelham goes into Munster, and sends for the Earl of Desmond, who refusing to come, is thereupon proclaim'd Traytor, and an Enemy to the State; and this being publish'd, the Justice committed the following War to the Earl of Ormond, who slaying most of the Spaniards and Adherents to Desmond, compelleth him to send his Wife to the Justice, to beg his Pardon.

The Lord-Justice Pelham now certified, That Arthur Lord Gray was landed with Authority to be Deputy of Ireland, at Munster he delivers the Army to George Bouchier the Son of John, second Earl of Bath of that Name, and himself returneth to Dublin, to deliver up the Province to his Successor. The Lord Gray at his landing, before he receiv'd the Sword, hearing where the Rebels had their Rendezvous, march'd towards them, who presently betake themselves to Grandilough, a grassy Valley beset thick with Trees, where they who dwell near scarce know the winding out, yet the Deputy (taking one Cosby an old man well acquainted with the place, to be his Guide) enter'd into it, where he lost divers of his Men, namely, Peter Carew the younger, George Moore, Audely, and Cosby himself, that was his Leader.

A short time after, there landed at Smerwick in Kerry, under the command of San Joseph an Italian, about 700 Italian Soldiers, who fortified the place, and named it Fort del Oro: Whereupon the Deputy sent a Trumpeter to the Fort, to demand who they were, what they had to do in Ireland, and who sent 'em, withal commanding them to depart immediately: But they reply'd, That some of 'em were sent from his Holiness; others, from the Catholick King, upon whom the Pope had bestow'd the Kingdom of Ireland, for that Queen Elizabeth (by reason of Heresie) had forfeited the Right due unto her, and therefore what they had gotten they would maintain. Upon this the Deputy prepares for battery, lets fly his Ordnance four days together, in which time the Italians once or twice made Sallies out, to their own loss much, but not an English-man slain, but one John Cheek, a courageous young Gentleman, Son to Sir John Cheek, a learned Knight. And now San Joseph, who commanded the Fort, a white-liver'd Soldier, terrified with a continual battery, and having no hope of relief, either from the King of Spain or Desmond, (contrary to the will of all his Soldiers) set up a white Flag, and desir'd a Parley; but Parley was deny'd, because he had combined with Rebels, with whom 'tis not lawful to hold Parley. Then he demanded, that his Company might pass away with their Baggage; but neither would this be granted. Then he requir'd that some of the chieftest sort might have Leave to depart; but neither could this be obtain'd.

At last, when they could prevail in nothing, they hung out the white Flag again, and submitted themselves absolutely, without any Condition, to the Deputy's Mercy, who presently consulted how to deal with them; and this was the Case: Their number was well near as great as the English, there was present fear of Danger from the Rebels; and the English were so destitute of Meat and Apparel that they were ready to mutiny, unless they might have the Spoil granted 'em; and besides, there were no Ships to send them away if they were spared: For these Reasons 'twas concluded (the Deputy gain-saying, and letting Tears fall) That only the Leaders should be sav'd, the rest slain, and all the Irish hang'd up; which was presently put in execution, to the great disliking of the Queen, who detested the slaughter of such as yield themselves, and would not accept of any Excuses or Allegations.

And yet more Cruelty than this was at that time committed in the Netherlands; for John Norris and Oliver Temple, English Commanders, together with some Companies of Dutch, setting out early one Morning, took Mechlin, a wealthy Town of Brabant, at an assault with Ladders, where they promiscuously murder'd both Citizens and religious Persons, offering violence even upon the Dead, taking away Grave-stones, which were sent into England to be sold.

About this time certain English Priests, who were fled into the Netherlands in the Year 1568, by the procurement of William Allen, an Oxford Scholar, joyn'd themselves to Study at Dorway, where they enter'd into a Collegiate Form of Government, to whom the Pope allow'd a yearly Pension: But Tumults arising in the Low-Countries, and the English Fugitives being commanded by the King of Spain's Deputy to depart from thence, other the like Colleges for the training up of the English Youth were erected, one at Rhemes by the Guises, and another at Rome by Pope Gregory the Thirteenth, which always afforded new Supplies of Priests for England when the old fail'd, who should spread abroad the Seeds of the Romish Religion here amongst us; from whence those Colleges had the Name of Seminaries, and they call'd Seminary Priests who were train'd up in them.

In these Seminaries, among other Disputations, 'twas concluded, That the Pope hath such fullness of Power, by Divine Right, over the whole Christian World, both in Ecclesiastical and Secular matters, that by vertue thereof 'tis lawful for him to excommunicate Kings, absolve their Subjects from their Oath of Allegiance, and deprive them of their Kingdoms. From these Seminaries, at this time, there came two into England, Robert Parsons and Edmund Campion, both of 'em English-men and Jesuites: Parsons was born in Somersetshire, a fierce and rough-condition'd Fellow: Campion was a Londoner, of a milder disposition: They had been both brought up in Oxford; Campion, a Fellow of St. John's College, and had been Proctor in the Year 1569, and when he was made Deacon counterfeited himself to be a Protestant, till such time as he slipped out of England: Parsons was of Baliol College, where he made open profession of the Protestant Religion, till for dishonest carriage he was expel'd the House, and then fled to the Popish Party. Both these came privately into England, in the disguise one while of Soldiers, another while of Noblemen; sometimes like English Ministers, and sometimes in the Habit of Apparators. Parsons, who was made the superior, broke forth in such open Words amongst the Papists, about deposing the Queen, that some of themselves had a Purpose to complain of them to the Magistrates: Campion, tho' something more moderate, yet in a Writing provoked the English Ministers to a Dispute, and publish'd in Latin an elegant Book of his Ten Reasons in maintenance of the Doctrine of the Romish Church; as Parsons in like manner set forth another violent Pamphlet against Clark, who had written modestly against Campion's Provocation; but Dr. Whitacre soundly confuted Campion, who being a Year after apprehended, and put upon the Rack, was afterward brought brought out to a Disputation; where he scarcely made good the great Fame that went of him.

In this Year was the return of Captain Drake from his incredible Voyage round about the World (which Magellan had before attempted, but died in the Voyage) whereof to relate all particular Accidents, would require a large Volume: It may suffice in this place to relate some special Passages. He was born of mean Parentage in Devonshire, yet had a great Man (Francis Russel, after Earl of Bedford) to be his God-father. His Father, in King Henry the Eighth's time, being persecuted for a Protestant, chang'd his Soil, and liv'd close in Kent. King Henry being dead, he got a place among the Mariners of the Queen's Navy to read Prayer; and afterwards bound his Son Francis to a Ship-master, who in a Ship which went to and fro upon the Coast with Commodities, one while to Zealand, another while to France, training him up to pains and skill at Sea, took such a liking to him, that afterwards dying, he bequeath'd his Barque to him by his Will: This Barque Drake sold, and then in the Year 1567. went with Sir John Hawkins into America, in which Voyage he unfortunately lost all he had. Five Years after having gotten again a good sum of Money by Trading and Piracy, (which the Preacher of his Ship told him was Lawful) he bought a Ship of War and two small Vessels, with which he set sail again for America, where his first Prize was great store of Gold and Silver, carried over the Mountains upon Mules; whereof the Gold he brought to his Ships, but left the Silver, hiding it under ground: After this he fir'd a great place of Traffick, call'd, The Cross, at the River Chiruge, when roaming to and fro upon the Mountains, he espy'd the South Sea; where falling upon his Knees, he crav'd assistance of Almighty God to find out that Passage, which he reserveth for another Voyage; and for the present having got much Riches, he return'd home. Afterwards in the Year 1577. the 13th Day of November, with five Ships, and Seamen to the number of 163, he set sail from Plymouth for the Southern Sea, and within five and twenty Days came to Cantyne, a Cape in Barbary, and then sailed along the Isle of Fogo, which sends forth Flames of Sulphur; and being now under the Line, he let every one in his Ship blood. The 16th of April, entring into the Mouth of the Plate, they espied a world of Sea-Calves; in which place John Doughty, the next to Drake in Authority, was called in question for raising Sedition in the Navy, who being found guilty, was beheaded. Some report, That Drake had charge given him from the Earl of Leicester, to make away Doughty upon some pretence or other, for that he said, That the Earl of Essex was craftily made away by Leicester. The 20th of August two of his Ships he turneth off, and with the other three came to the Sea which they call the Strait of Magellan. The 6th of September, entring into the wide Southern Ocean, which they call, The Pacificque Sea, he found it out of measure troublous, so that his Ships were here by Tempests dispersed; in one of which John Winter was Master, who return'd back into England; Drake himself with only one Ship coasted along the Shore, till he came to the Isle Mocha, from whence loosing, he lighted upon a Fellow fishing in a little Boat, who shewed him where a Spanish Ship laden with Treasure lay; Drake making towards it, the Spaniards thought him to be their own Countryman, and thereupon invited him to come on; but he getting aboard presently shut the Spaniards (being not above eight Persons) under Hatches, and took the Ship, in which was four hundred Pound weight of Gold. At Taurapsa, going again to shore, he found a Spaniard sleeping by the Sea-side, who had lying by him twenty Bars of Massy Silver, to the value of four thousand Ducats, which he bid his Followers take amongst them, the Spaniard still sleeping. After this, going into the Port of Africa, he found three Vessels without any Mariners in them; wherein, besides other Wares, were seven and fifty silver Bricks, each of which weigh'd twenty Pound: From whence tyding it to Lime, he found twelve Ships in one Road, and in them great store of Silks, and a Chest full of Money coin'd, but not so much as a Ship-Boy aboard; (such security there was in that Coast:) Then putting to Sea with those Ships, he follow'd the rich Ship called the Cacofogo, and by the way met with a small Ship without Ordnance or other Arms, out of which he took fourscore pound weight of Gold, a golden Crucifix, and some Emeralds of a Finger's length. The first Day of March he overtook the Cacofogo, set upon her and took her; and in her, besides Jewels, fourscore pound weight of Gold, thirteen Chests of Silver ready coined, and as much Silver as would ballast a Ship. And now thinking he had gain'd Wealth enough, he resolv'd to return home; and so on the third of November, 1580. he landed at Plymouth, having sailed round about the World, in the space of three Years; to the great Admiration of all that know what compass the World is of.

The Queen welcom'd him home, but made a Sequestration of the Goods, that they might be ready, if the King of Spain requir'd them; and commanded the Ship to be drawn on shore near Deptford for a Monument (where the Carcase of it is yet to be seen) and herself feasted in it; at which time she knighted Captain Drake. But Barnardine Mendoza, the King of Spain's Ambassador in England began to rage, and earnestly demanded restitution of the Goods, and complain'd, that the English sail'd upon the Indian Sea. To whom it was answer'd, That the Goods were sequestred, and ready to make the King of Spain satisfaction, altho' the Queen had expended against the Rebels, whom the Spaniards had excited in England and Ireland, more Money than that which Drake brought home. And as for sailing on the Indian Sea, That it was as lawful for the Queen's Subjects as his, seeing the Sea and the Air are common for all to use. Notwithstanding, to Pedro Seburu, the King of Spain's Agent in this business, a great sum of Money was repaid, which was not restor'd to them to whom it belong'd, but employ'd to the Spaniards Wars in the Low-Countries, as was known after when it was too late.

But at this time, when Jackman and Pet, two skilful Pilots, were sent forth with two Ships by the Londoners, to find out a shorter cut to the East-Indies, by the North-East passage, they had not the like success; for a few Leagues within the Streights of Vaygats, they meet with such uncertain Tides, so many Shallows, and such Mountains of Ice, that they could go no farther, and had much ado to return home.

About this time, Henry Fitz-Allen, Earl of Arundel died, in whom the Sir-name of a most Noble Family ended, which had flourish'd in this Honour for above three hundred Years, from Richard Fitz-Allen; who being descended from the d'Albanys (ancient Earl of Arundel and Sussex, in the Reign of King Edward the First) obtain'd the Title of Earl, by reason of the possession of Arundel-Castle, without Creation. He had three Children by his Wife Katherine, Daughter to Thomas Gray, Marquess of Dorset, all whom he outliv'd: Henry, a young Man of great hope, who died at Brussels; Joan, Wife to the Lord Lumley; and Mary, who being married to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, brought forth Philip, in her Right, Earl of Arundel.

In Ireland, Arthur Lord Gray the Deputy, going against the O-Connors, who raised stirrs in Ophalie, putteth to death Hugh O-Moley, quieteth all that Quarter, even the Families of the Mogobigans and O-Charles, and in the very beginning suppresseth a Conspiracy which was breaking forth, by putting to death the Lord Nogent; who being confident in his own Innocency, when the Deputy promised to save his Life, if he would but confess himself guilty, chose rather to die and be held guiltless, than to live in Infamy, by betraying his own Innocency. With whose death, the Qu. was extremely displeased, as by which she was made a Patroness of Cruelty to her great dishonour. But the Deputy knew with what kind of People he dealt, and by this example of Severity brought Turlough Leyneigh to accept Conditions of Peace, and the O-Brians, and Cavenaghs (rebellious Families in Lemster) humbly to crave leave also, and to offer Hostages.

The Earl of Morton is beheaded as accessory to the Murder of the King's Father.

General Norris raised the Siege at Stenwick; but is afterward vanquish'd, wounded, and a great number of his Men slain.

In Scotland, at this time great jealousy was had of Lenox Lord of Aubigny, lest, being in so great favour with the King, he should allure him to marry into France, and bring into Scotland the Popish Religion. Whereupon (although he purged himself by Letters to Queen Elizabeth, and proffered himself to be a Protestant) yet many courses were taken to sequester him from the King; but so far from taking effect, that on the contrary, the Earl of Morton, (who among all other was most addicted to the English) was soon after accused of Treason by the Earl of Arran, and cast into Prison; and not long after (notwithstanding all the means the Queen could use to save him) was beheaded, as convicted to be accessory to the Murder of the King's Father. Whereupon the Earl of Angus, and others who labour'd for Morton, fled straightway into England.

In the Low-Countries about this time, the Count Rheinberg proceeded victoriously for the King of Spain, and beleagu'd Stenwick in Friesland; against whom the States sent Norris General of the Field, who put the Rheinberg's Company to the worst, and raised the Siege; but afterward joyning Battel with Verdugo the Spaniard at Norrbone, even when the Victory was almost gotten, (Roger Williams having put the Enemies to flight) the Fortune of the War turn'd, Norris is vanquish'd, wounded, and a great number of his Men slain; amongst whom were Cotton, Fitz-Williams and Bishop, stout Commanders. Here it must not be omitted, That the English (who of all the dwellers in the Northern parts of the World, were hitherto the least Drinkers, and deserved praise for their Sobriety) in these Dutch Wars learned to be Drunkards, and brought the Vice so far to overspread the Kingdom, that Laws were fain to be enacted for repressing it.

But now whilst the States and the King of Spain contend about a few Towns in the Low-Countries, he seizeth upon the whole Kingdom of Portugal; for the last Year Henry King of Portugal dying, many Competitors challenge the Kingdom; as, the Duke of Savoy, the Prince of Parma's Son; Katherine of Braganza, and the Queen of France. But Philip King of Spain, the Son of Henry's eldest Sister, putting the Case to his Divines and Lawyers, and adjuring them to pronounce to whom of Right it belong'd, they pronounc'd for him; whereupon he sent Duke d'Alva, who put to flight Antonio, whom the People had elected King, and within seventy Days subdu'd all Portugal. The Qu. of France angry hereat, and enviously beholding the King of Spain's Dominions thus enlarged (being now Master of Portugal, the East Indies, and many Islands besides) adviseth amongst other Princes Qu. Elizabeth to bethink themselves in time of restraining his so excessive Dominions: Whereupon the Qu. receiv'd Don Antonio, and lovingly reliev'd him, which she thought might be done without any breach of the League with Spain, seeing Don Antonio was descended of English Blood, and of the House of Lancaster, and that no Caution was in the League, that the Portuguese should not be admitted into England.

And now the Queen-Mother of France, and the King her Son, more eagerly than ever, pursue the Match with Alanson now Duke of Anjou, for the transacting whereof, they sent in Embassage into England Francis Bourbon, Prince of Dauphiny, Arthur Cesse, Marshal of France, and many other honourable Personages, who were entertain'd with great respect (a House being purposely built at Westminster for that use, Royally furnish'd;) Tilting and Jufts proclaim'd, by Philip Earl of Arundel, Frederick Baron of Windsor, Sir Philip Sidney, and Sir Fulk Grevil, against all Comers. The Delegates that were to confer with the French concerning the Marriage, were Sir William Cecil Lord Treasurer, Edward Earl of Lincoln Lord Admiral, Robert Dudley Earl of Leicester, Sir Christopher Hatton, and Sir Francis Walsingham Secretaries; by whom Covenants of Marriage were at length agreed on; First, That the Duke of Anjou and the Queen of England, within six Weeks after the Ratification of the Articles, should contract Matrimony, and the rest, most of them such as were before agreed on in the Marriage between Queen Mary and King Philip, chiefly consisting in conferring Honour upon the Duke, but Power upon the Queen. It was also agreed, That all particulars should be ratified within two Months, by the faithful Promise and Oath of the French King, for him and his Heirs, and a Reservation was also added apart, with the Hands and Seals of every one of his Delegates, That Queen Elizabeth is not bound to finish the Marriage, until she and the Duke had given each other satisfaction in some particulars, and have certified the French King of the same within six Weeks. Before those six Weeks were expir'd, Simier, Secretary to the Council, is sent into France to require the King of France's confirmation: The King will not hear him, but presseth to have the Marriage accomplish'd as 'twas contracted, and that nothing else was to be done. Simier on the other side sheweth by the Articles, that a League offensive and defensive must be first concluded. This the French King disclaimeth; whereupon Walsingham is presently sent to compose this Difference, who jointly with Henry Cobham, the Ambassador in Ordinary, and Simier, alledgeth to the French King these Particulars, That Queen Elizabeth, for no other reason, was willing to marry, but for the satisfaction of her People, and seeing many Impediments were come in the way since the first Treaty, namely, the Civil-War in France, and the Duke's Engagement in a War with Spain, which makes the wisest of her Subjects now to be against the Match, this hath made her to defer the accomplishment of it, altho' her Affection be still constant toward the Duke: For this cause the Queen would have no further Treaty to be held, till the French Duke be freed from the Spanish War, and a League of mutual Offence and Defence be agreed on: The French King willingly accepted the League defensive, but of the offensive he would hear no Speech till the Marriage were finish'd.

himself into England, and in a private Conference with the

The English Nobility imagining the Marriage con-firm'd, fret exceedingly.

The next Day
she calleth the French Duke to her, and after a long Discourse made him exclaim on the Inconstancy of Women.

Not long after, the French Duke himself came into England, having with good Success rais'd the Siege of Cambray: He was here receiv'd with as great Humanity as he could wish, and nothing omitted whereby he might judge himself to be truly welcome; insomuch that in November, when the Anniversary of the Queen's Inauguration came to be solemniz'd, the Queen (while they were in Love-conference) drew a Ring off her Finger, and put it upon his, upon some private Conditions. The standers-by imagin'd that by this Ceremony the Marriage was confirm'd between them; and Aldegond Governor of Antwerp being there, presently dispatch'd Messengers into the Low-Countries, to give notice of it; and thereupon Bonfires were made, and all shews of rejoicing: But the Earl of Leicester (who privately plotted to cross the Match) Hatton the Vice-Chamberlain, and Secretary Walsingham, fret, and are enrag'd, as if the Kingdom, the Queen, and Religion were now utterly overthrown: The Maids of Honour and Ladies that were familiar with the Queen made grievous lamentation, and so terrified and daunted her, that she could take no Rest that Night. The next Day she call'd to her the French Duke, and causing all company to go aside, they privately entertain a long Discourse: At length the Duke returning to his Lodging, cast the Ring away from him, and after a while takes it up again, terribly exclaiming against the Levity and Inconstancy of Women.

The Queen at this time was much troubled at a Book lately put forth with this Title, The Gulph wherein England will be swallow'd by the French Marriage; whereof conceiving that some Puritan was the Author, it made her highly displeas'd with the Puritans: Whereupon within a few days John Stubbs of Lincolns-Inn, a zealous

Professor, and the Author of this Book, (whose Sister Thomas Cartwright, the Father of the Puritans, had married) William Page, that dispers'd the Copies, and Singleton the Printer, were apprehended, against whom Sentence was pronounc'd, That their right Hand should be cut off, by vertue of a Law made in the Reign of Philip and Mary against the Authors and Dispersers of seditious Writings, (tho' the chief Lawyers and Judges of the Kingdom could not agree concerning the Force of that Statute:) Hereupon Stubbs and Page were brought to the Scaffold, made on purpose in the Market-place at Westminster, and their right Hands with a Butcher's Knife and a Mallet cut off by the Wrist; the Printer was pardon'd. At that time Stubbs, when his right Hand was cut off, uncover'd his Head with the left, and cry'd out, GOD save the Queen, to the great amazement of all the beholders.

At this time the Queen, upon importunate suit of her Council, gave way that Edmund Campion, Ralph Sherwin, and Alexander Bryant, Priests, should be call'd to the Bar, who being accus'd by vertue of a Law made in the 25th Year of King Edward the Third, to have plotted the Ruin of the Queen and Kingdom; to be adhering to the Pope, the Queen's Enemy, and coming into England to raise Forces against the State, were then condemn'd of High Treason, and accordingly executed. Campion, after his being convicted, being demanded, first, whether Queen Elizabeth were a lawful Queen, would make no answer; afterward, whether he would stand for the Queen, or the Pope, if he should send an Army against the Queen; he plainly profess'd, That he would be on the Pope's side; and witness'd so much under his Hand.

After this, some other Papists, upon the like occasion, were also put to Death, which the Queen rather necessarily than willingly assented to, as being unwilling to force the Conscience of any. These and the like Exorbitances of Papists were cause that new and strict Laws were enacted against them the Parliament following, which began the next January.

The French Duke, after three months abode in England, took his Journey in February into the Low-Countries, whom the Queen her self brought on his Way as far as Canterbury, and then commanded the Earl of Leicester, the Lords Charles Howard, Hunsdon, Willoughby, Windsor, Sheffield, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Fra. Russel, Sir George Bourchier, and some other prime Knights, to accompany him to Antwerp, where he is made Duke of Brabant, Limburg, and Lorrain; for the Dutch had long before remov'd the King of Spain's Government, and quitted the People from their Oath of Allegiance, that it might be in their own power to chuse any other Prince. Here the Duke of Anjou gave free leave to exercise the Roman Religion, to as many as would swear Fealty to him, and abjure the King of Spain's Authority; but after all, having sent a great mass of Money, with which he was supplied from England, and observing that only bare and empty Titles were confer'd upon him, while the States held all the Dominion in their own hands, he rashly enterpris'd an Assault upon Antwerp and

Bertie made Lord Willoughby of Eresby.

At this time Queen Elizabeth, as well to get some Friends, as she had procur'd her self many Enemies, receiv'd into the Order of the Garter Frederick the Second, King of Denmark, when she imploy'd to invest him therewith Peregrine Lord Willoughby of Eresby, to whom (being Heir to the Dutchess of Suffolk, his Mother) the ancient Barony of Willoughby of Eresby descended of Right, which has been misrepresented in all the former Editions of this Chronicle.

Earl Gowry and other Lords take the King and keep him
a Prisoner.

But now, to prevent the Duke of Guise's Design in Scotland, which was to make use of the Duke of Lenox's Favour with the King, to withdraw his Affection from the English; William Ruthen, whom the King had lately made Earl of Gowry, endeavour'd with others by all means to remove Lenox and the Earl of Arran from the King; and so, while Lenox was gone from Perth (where the King at this time was) to Edinburgh, and Arran was also absent on a Journey, the Earls Gowry, Marre, Lindsey, and others, taking the Opportunity, invited the King to the Castle of Ruthen, and there detain'd him, not permitting him to walk abroad: All his trusty Servants they remov'd from about him; Arran they cast in Prison, enforced the King to call home the Earl of Angus, and to send away Lenox into France, who being a Man of a soft and gentle Disposition, for the King's safety readily consented: And not content with all this, they compell'd the King, by his Letters to Queen Elizabeth, to approve and allow of this his Thralldom. The Queen of Scots, in the mean while bewailing her own hard Fortune, and the Distress of the King her Son, layeth open the same in a large Letter written to Queen Elizabeth in French; with which Letter the Queen being somewhat affected, sent her to Robert Beal Clerk of the Council, to expostulate with her concerning the querulous Writing, and jointly with the Earl of Shrewsbury to treat of the setting her at liberty: And indeed serious Consultations were held at the Council-Table about it, and the most were of opinion, that upon certain Conditions she should have her liberty, but the Scottish of the English Faction opposing it, nothing was effected.

The King of Scots frees himself from those that had surpriz'd him.

Soon after this, the King sent Colonel William Steward and John Colvill to Queen Elizabeth, proffering all manner of Respect and Observance, and requesting her Advice for quieting the Tumults in Scotland, and also for his contracting of Marriage; at which time News was brought, the Duke of Lenox was dead in France, who departing this Life at Paris, when at the very point of Death, and oftentimes before, made open profession of the Protestant Religion, thereby confuting those who had maliciously traduced him for a Papist. After this, when the Surprizers of the K. of Scots were lift up in their own conceits, as thinking they had him safe enough, he on a sudden, (tho' scarce eighteen years of age) with some few others, convey'd himself to the Castle of St. Andrews, to whom the Nobility presently repair'd, bringing arm'd Bands with 'em, as fearing some Danger might befall him: Afterwards, in fair Words, he advis'd some of his Surprizers to go from the Court for avoiding of Tumults, and promising them Pardon, if they would ask it; but Gowry only ask'd it, and submitted himself, using this distinction, That he had not offended in Matter, but in Form only: Then the King sent for the Earl of Arran to Court, and respected him as his intimate Friend, employing him to compose the Differences amongst the Nobility, and to purge the Kingdom and his Court from civil Dissentions.

While he is sedulous in these Cares, comes Sir Francis Walsingham from Queen Elizabeth, to advise him not to be led away by evil Counsellors to the destruction of both Kingdoms. He finds the King accompanied with the flower of the Nobility, and beholdeth another manner of Majesty than he expected in Scotland. Having Audience given him, he put the King in mind of what the Queen, out of Isocrates, in private Letters had formerly admonish'd him, That a Prince must be such a lover of Truth, that more Credit may be given to his bare Word, than to another's Oath; and in many Words advis'd him to beware now in his Youth of evil Counsellors, and always to be like himself: The King answer'd, That he was an absolute Prince, and would not that Others should appoint him Counsellors whom he liked not; but, that he had long since devoted the First-fruits of his Amity to the Queen of England his dear Sister, and doth now willingly make proffer of the same.

Walsingham
is sent to the King of Scots, to advise him
to take heed of evil Counsellors.

The King's Answer.

Walsingham now dealt with him further, not to lay to the Queen's charge what Broils had lately fallen out in Scotland; sheweth how beneficial to him, and to both Kingdoms, Amity had been hitherto, and would be in time to come also, if 'twere not neglected; and, that the same might the better be confirm'd if the Variance among the Nobility were laid asleep by a Law of Oblivion enacted in Parliament, and the Peers that were now remov'd from Court call'd back again, Religion look'd into, and a firm League concluded between both Kingdoms. The King made answer, That he gladly embraced Amity with England, and would constantly defend the Religion already establish'd. Afterward he lovingly dismiss'd Walsingham, tho' he held him no good friend to him and his Mother; and carefully looking matters with Understanding even above his years, proffer'd Reconciliation to those that had surpriz'd him, if within a limited time they ask'd Pardon; which they were so far from doing, that they enter'd into new Consultations to surprize him again; whereupon they are commanded within a set time to leave the Kingdom, of which number Marre, Glames, Pasley, and some others, betook themselves into Ireland; Boyde, Zester, Weems, Lochlevin, into the Low-Countries; Dumfermlin, into France; the Earl of Angus is confined to his Earldom; Gowry only, to his own ruin, stayeth behind after the limited time hatching new Devices.

About this time happen'd a Difference, and thereupon a War between the Emperor of Moscow and the King of Sweden; when John King of Sweden, doubting himself to be no fit Match for the Emperor, sent a Royal Embassage to Queen Elizabeth, requesting her to intercede for him to the Emperor; which she did without delay, and by her Ambassador drew the Moscovite to a Peace upon reasonable Conditions: But the Moscovite shortly after dying, and Theodorus his his Successor granting free Traffick to Merchants of all Nations that would come thither, the Queen importun'd him to admit of none but English Merchants, requiring him to confirm the Privileges which his Father had granted them: Whereupon, by way of answer, he commanded free Trading for all the English, saying, It was not fit that a small Company should exercise a Monopoly, and all others be restrain'd: But as for Customs, he promis'd to take less by half of that Company than of any other, because they first open'd the Way thither.

The next Summer Albertus Alasco, a Palatine of Poland, of a comely Personage and great Learning, came into England to see the Queen, who was nobly entertain'd both by her and the Nobility, as also by the Scholars of Oxford with learned Orations, and other Recreations; but having tarried here four Months, and ran into much Debt, he secretly withdrew himself and departed. This Man I saw my self afterward in Cracow, very bare, tho' it was reported of him that he had in a Dowry with a Wife 50 Castles of great value; but, What Mine can bear the Charges of Prodigality?

A Year fatal to many great Men.
This Year prov'd fatal to divers Great Men; for there died, first, Thomas Ratcliff, the third Earl of Sussex of this Family; a Man of a great Spirit, and great Faithfulness to his Country: There died also Henry Wriothesley Earl of Southampton, one exceedingly devoted to the Romish Religion, and a great Favourer of the Queen of Scots, which cost him Queen Elizabeth's Displeasure, and Imprisonment besides. There died also Sir Humphry Gilbert, who was cast away at Sea in his return from the Northern Parts of America, whither he lately sail'd with five Ships, having sold his Patrimony in hope to plant a Colony there. Then died also Edm. Grindall Archbishop of Canterbury, being blind thro' age, a grave and pious Prelate, who stood highly in the Queen's Favour for a long time, till he lost it at last by favouring (as was said) the Puritans Conventicles; but the true cause indeed was, for the disallowing the Marriage of Julio an Italian Physician with another Man's Wife, against the Earl of Leicester's pleasure. Grindall dying, John Whitgift succeeded in the See of Canterbury, being translated thither from the See of Worcester.

Somerville and Arden are condemn'd, and why.
At this time certain Popish Books written against the Queen and Princes excommunicate withdrew divers from their Allegiance, and particularly so intoxicated one Somerville, an English Gentleman, that he went privately to Court, and breathing out nothing but Blood and Death against all Protestants, set upon one or two by the way with his drawn Sword: Being apprehended, he stuck not to say, that he would murder the Queen with his own Hands. Hereupon he and (upon his intimation) Edward Arden his Father-in-law (a Man of an ancient House in Warwickshire) Arden's Wife, their Daughter, Somerville's Wife, and Hall a Priest, were brought to the Bar, and all condemn'd; Somerville as Principal, the rest as Accessories. Three Days after Somerville was found strangled in the Prison, Arden was executed and quarter'd, the Women and Priest were spared. Many pitied the old Gentleman Arden, as misled by the Priest, and (as it was generally believ'd) brought to his Ehd thro' the Envy of Leicester, whom he used to call Whoremaster, Upstart, and many such opprobrious Names.

In the Netherlands the English Garrison at Alost in Flanders being neglected, the Governor Pigor, and the other Captains, for want of Pay, upon Composition yielded up the Town to the Spaniard; and then, fearing Disgrace at home, joyn'd themselves to the Prince of Parma; at whose hands finding themselves slighted, by degrees they all stole away, and came all to unholy Ends.

In Ireland the fam'd Rebel Gyralt Fitz-Gyralt, Gyralt Fitz-Gyralt, the eleventh Earl of Desmond of this Family, having a long time in lurking places escap'd the English, was now by a common Soldier found out in a poor Cottage, and slain. His Head was sent into England, and set upon London Bridge. This End had this great Lord, descended from Maurice the Son of Gyralt of Windsor, an English man, famous among those who first set upon Ireland, in the Year 1170. He possess'd whole Countries, together with the County-Palatine of Kerry, and had of his own Name and Race at least Five hundred Gentlemen at his command; all whom, and his own Life also, he lost within the space of three Years, very few of the House being left alive. And this Disaster he fell into by proving trayterous to his Prince at the instigation of certain Popish Priests, of whom the chief was one Nicholas daunders an English man, who at the same time died miserably of Famine, being starv'd to death, whenas being forsaken, and running mad upon his ill success, he roam'd up and down the Mountains and Groves, finding nothing to sustain him. In his Scrip were found certain Orations and Letters written to hearten the Rebels, and promising large Rewards from the Pope and King of Spain. Upon the Rebels ill success James Fitz-Eustace, Viscount Balinglas, fled into Spain, where he pined away with Grief. He, out of Zeal to the Roman Religion, a little before he had taken up Arms with the Rebels, and exhorting the Earl of Ormond, his Neighbour, to do the like, (who drew his Lineage from St. Thomas of Canterbury) used these Words to persuade him, If St. Thomas of Canterbury had not died for the Church of Rome, thou hadst never been Earl of Ormond: For King Henry the Second, to expiate the Murder of Thomas a Becket, gave large Lands in Ormond to his Predecessors.

The beginning of the next Spring, certain Scots, together with Gowry, plotted again to surprize the King, pretending only a Care of Religion, and to remove ill Counsellors from him; but the King having Intelligence of their Practice, used means by Colonel Steward to have Gowry taken and cast into Prison; whereupon Marre, Glames, Angus, and other of the Confederates, fled into England, and beseech the Queen to commiserate their state, who had incur'd the King's Displeasure to do her and the Kingdom of England Service. The King on the other side accuseth them to the Queen of heinous Crimes, and requires to have them deliver'd up into his hands; but Secretary Walsingham, who bore great Good-will to these Men, sent Letters with a Command, that they should be safely 1583. admitted into Lindisferne, otherwise call'd The Holy Island; where Hunsdon being Governor, and greatly addicted to the King of Scots, resisted Walsingham's Command, alledging, He could not satisfie the Secretary in this point unless the Queen gave expresse Command. Hereupon grew a Dispute, Whether a Secretary of State might not transact Business of State without special Commission from the Prince. How this Case was determin'd is uncertain, but sure it is the Scots came not thither, tho' some favour they had shewn 'em here in England. In the mean time Gowry was try'd by his Peers at Sterlin, where being accus'd of many Treasons, tho' he gave colourable Answers to them all, yet was found guilty, condemn'd, and beheaded, whose Head his Servants sewing to his Body, committed to the Grave.

Whether a Secretary of State may not transact without a special Commission from the Prince.

Earl Gowry is arraign'd, condemn'd, and executed.

Many Practices plotted against Q. Elizabeth in behalf of the Q. of Scots.

About this time were Practices plotted against Queen Elizabeth in behalf of the Queen of Scots, chiefly by Francis Throgmorton, eldest Son of John Throgmorton Justice of Chester, who came to be suspected by reason of Letters sent to the Queen of Scots, which were intercepted. Upon his apprehension Thomas Lord Paget and Charles Arundel privately stole away into France, grievously complaining against Leicester and Walsingham, for alienating the Queen from them, and using such Wiles as scarce any Man was able to live in safety. Henry Earl of Northumberland, and Philip Earl of Arundel were confined to their Houses, his Wife committed to the custody of Sir Thomas Shirley, William Howard; the Earl's Brother, and Henry Howard their Uncle, Brother to the Duke of Norfolk, were examin'd about Letters from the Queen of Scots, and many Stratagems were set on foot, dangerous to some particular Persons, but necessary (as should seem) for the Queen's security. Certain 'tis, that now the Malice of the Papists against the Queen brake forth more violently than ever before; for in printed Books they stirr'd up the Queen's own Servants to attempt the like upon her that Judith did upon Holofernes. The Author of these Books could not be found, but the Suspicion lay upon one Gregory Martin, some time of Oxford; and Carter a Stationer, who printed the Books, suffer'd for it. And whereas the Papists every where traduced the Queen for Cruelty, she desirous always to leave a blessed Remembrance behind her, grew extreemly offended with the Commissioners for Popish Causes, taxing them of too much Cruelty, insomuch that they were fain, in a printed Declaration, to clear themselves, protesting that they question'd no Man for his Religion, but only for dangerous attempts against the Queen and State; and, that Campion himself was never so rack'd, but that he could presently walk up and down. Yet all this gave not the Queen satisfaction, but she commanded the Commissioners to forbear Tortures, and the Judges other Punishments; and not long after, when seventy Priests were taken, and some of them condemn'd, and the rest in danger of the Law, she caused them all to be ship'd away, and sent out of England; the chief of whom were Jasper Heywood the great Epigrammatist's Son, the first Jesuite that ever set Foot in England; James Busgrave, John Hart, and Edmund Rish-ton.

At this time Mendoza the Spanish Ambassador was thrust out of England, for joyning with Throgmorton in this Treason against the Queen; whereupon Sir William Wade was sent to the King of Spain, to satisfie him how ill Mendoza had discharg'd the Office of an Ambassador here in England; who, when the King admitted him not to his presence, but in a slighting manner putting him off to his Councillors, Wade taking it in great disdain, boldly said, That it was a declared Custom among Princes (tho' in heat of War) to give Ambassadors Audience; and thereupon stoutly refus'd to declare his Embassage, and so return'd into England unheard.

The greatest matters laid to Mendoza's charge were gotten out of Throgmorton's Confession; for when he was in danger to be apprehended, he sent to Mendoza a Box of Writings; and when his Chests were search'd, there were found two Scrolls, one with the Names of the Ports of England, and in the other the Names of the Nobility and Gentry in England that favour'd the Romish Religion: These when Throgmorton saw brought forth, he said they were Counterfeits, and flood to it upon the very Rack; but being brought to the Rack a second time, he then confess'd all; That Morgan, by Letters out of France, had given him Information, that the Catholick Princes had agreed to invade England, and with the help of the Duke of Guise to free the Queen of Scots; and, that nothing was now wanting but Money and Aid in England; and, that for procuring of this, Charles Paget, under the counterfeit Name of Mope, was sent into Sussex, where the Duke of Guise intended to land; and, that he had imparted all this matter to Mendoza, and intimated the Names of the Ports, and of the Noblemen that should assist. But being arraign'd at the Guild-hall, he denied all this again, saying, He had spoken so because he would not be rack'd again: Yet being condemn'd to die, he flying to the Queen's Mercy, confess'd in a manner all he had before related, and at the Gallows went about to deny it again; so false to it self is the Mind of Man when 'tis divided between Hope and Fear, and lies under the burthen of a guilty Conscience.

Sir William Wade being return'd from Spain, was employ'd to the Queen of Scots about the Treaty begun Two Years before; to whom the distressed Queen sincerely profess'd, That she devoted her Service and her self to the Queen of England; and made solemn Promise, that if the former Treaty might go on, she would mediate with the King her Son to receive into favour the Earl of Angus, and the other Scottish Lords, and would charge the Bishops of Ross and Glasco, her Agents in France, to have no further to do with the English Fugitives. These things Queen Elizabeth heard gladly, and thereupon sent Beal to the Queen of Scots, who jointly with the Earl of Shrewsbury should signifie unto her, That if she continued still in the same mind as she had deliver'd to Wade, Sir Walter Mildmay should come out of hand to her, and treat concerning her Liberty; but withal, she commanded Mildmay and Beal to dive into her as well as they could, to know what Practices the Duke of Guise had on foot. To that which she had spoken to Sir William Wade the Queen of Scots made a wary wary Answer, but to that concerning the Duke of Guise, she plainly confesseth, That being sickly her self, and weak of Body, she had committed her self and her Son to the protection of the Duke of Guise, her dear Cousin, of whose Intentions she knows nothing; nor, if she did, would she disclose 'em, unless she might be sure of her own Liberty: Lastly she requesteth, That being a free and absolute Prince, she may not be worse handled than Queen Elizabeth her self was when she was a Subject and kept in Prison by her Sister. These things had a hearing, but no feeling, and the rather by a strange Accident; for Creighton, a Scottish Jesuit, sailing from the Low-Countries, and taken by Dutch Pyrates, had certain Papers, which he tore and threw away, which thrown overboard, and by the Wind blown back unto the Ship, miraculously (as Creighton himself said) they were brought to Sir William Wade, who patching them together, with much labour and cunning discover'd by them some new Intendments of the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Duke of Guise, about the invading of England: Whereupon, and upon divers other Rumors, the better to provide for the Safety of the Queen, a number of her Subjects, (the Earl of Leicester being the foremost) Men of all Ranks and Conditions, bound themselves mutually to each other by their Oaths and Subscriptions, to persecute all those to the very Death that should attempt any thing against the Queen: Which League of theirs they call'd the Association.

An Association of Lords and others in defence of Queen Elizabeth.

The Queen of Scots, who presently apprehended that this Association was enter'd into for her destruction, making this Proposition by Nave, her Secretary, to the Queen and the Council, That if she might have her Liberty granted, and be assur'd of the Queen's Love, she would enter a strict League and Amity with her, and passing by all matters of offence, esteem and honour her above all the Princes of the Christian World; yea, and (saving the ancient League betwixt France and Scotland) she would herself be comprehended in the Association, and a League defensive against all that should go about to injure the Queen. Herewith Queen Elizabeth was wonderfully pleas'd, and at that time certainly had an Inclination to grant her Freedom: But see what Malice can do; for many in England, and especially the Scots of the adverse Party, endeavour'd by all means to hinder it, exclaiming, That the Queen should be no longer in safety, if the Queen of Scots were set at liberty; That both Kingdoms were utterly undone if she were admitted into the joint Government of the Kingdom of Scotland; and, That the Reform'd Religion lay a bleeding if Papists were admitted within the Court-walls: Nor was this all, but the Scottish Ministers in their Pulpits loaded the Queen of Scots with all manner of Contumelies, slandering the King himself, and his Council, in the most bitter manner; and being cited to appear before him, refus'd, saying, That the Pulpits were exempted from all Regal Authority; and, that Ecclesiastical Persons were not to be censur'd by the Prince, but by their own Consistory; directly against the Law made the Year before in Parliament, whereby the King's Authority over all Persons, whether Ecclesiastical or Secular, was confirm'd, namely, That the

To which Queen Elizabeth is inclining, but is made averse to it by Scots and English of the adverse Party, especially Scottish Ministers.

King and his Council were Supreme Judges in all Causes; and, That whosoever refus'd to be try'd by them, should be deem'd guilty of High-Treason; all Presbyters and Lay-Conventicles forbid, Parity of the Clergy taken away, and the Authority of Bishops restor'd, whose Calling the Presbyteries had condemn'd as wicked and anti-christian; and lastly, all scurrilous Libels against the King and his Mother prohibited, namely, the Scottish History of George Buchanan, and his Dialogue De Jure Regni apud Scotos.

At this time, upon her Adversaries suggestion, the Queen of Scots is taken from the Earl of Shrewsbury, and committed to the custody of Sir Amias Pawlet and Sir Drew Drury, and that on set purpose (as some were persuaded) to drive her into abrupt and desperate Attempts; and indeed upon this she grew more importunate with the Pope and King of Spain, to hasten their Intendment whatsoever became of her, as ill indeed was like to become of her, if it be true (as some said) that Leicester sent out Assassins to make her away, but that Drury detested the Villany, and would grant them no access.

And now to alienate Queen Elizabeth utterly from her, 'tis suggested to her, that Allen for the Catholics of the Clergy, Inglefield for the Laity, and the Bishop of Ross for the Queen of Scots, with consent of the Pope and K. of Spain, had jointly combined to depose her, and to bar the King of Scotland from his hereditary Right to the Crown of England, and to marry the Queen of Scots to an English Nobleman of the Romish Religion, and him the English Catholics should chuse King of England, and the Pope confirm the Election; and all this upon the credit of Hunt the Priest: But who this English Nobleman should be that should marry the Queen of Scots could not be found, tho' Walsingham were busie to search it out: The Fame went upon Henry Howard the Duke of Norfolk's Brother, who was a single Man, a great Papist, and of high estimation among the Catholics.

This Year dy'd in Exile and Misery Charles Nevil, who was in the Rebellion in the North, the last Earl of Westmoreland of his Family, a House from whence descended many noble Personages, six Earls of Westmoreland, two Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, an Earl of Kent, a Marquis of Montacute, a Duke of Bedford, Baron Ferrers of Ousley, the Lord Latimer, the Lord Abergavenny, one Queen, and five Dutcheses, (to let pass Countesses and Baronesses) an Archbishop of York, and a numerous company of other Lords. In England dy'd none of reckoning this Year, but only Plowden the famous Lawyer; but in France the Duke of Anjou died of Grief; and in Holland William Prince of Orange, shot into the Body with three Bullets, by Baltasar Gerrard a Burgundian.

'Twas now the Year 1585, and the 28th of Qu. Elizabeth's Reign, when to tie the French King more nearly to her, whom the Year before she had receiv'd into the number of the Knights of the Garter, she sent the Earl of Derby into France, to invest him with the Robes and Ornaments, according to the due Solemnity, which he kindly accepted, and at Evening Prayer was invested with them.

At this time a Parliament was assembled at Westminster, wherein William Parry, a Welshman, a Doctor a Doctor of the Laws, when in the Lower-house a Bill was read against the Jesuites, he alone stood up and exclaim'd, that it was a cruel and bloody Law; and being ask'd his Reason, he stoutly refus'd unless he were requir'd by the Lords of the Council. Hereupon he was sent to the Gatehouse, but upon submission was receiv'd into the House again. Soon after he was accus'd by Edw. Nevil for holding secret Consultations about making the Queen away; who thereupon apprehended, upon his examination confess'd in effect thus much; That thro' Discontent he went beyond the Sea, where, by the encouragement of Campegio the Pope's Nuncio at Venice, and grant of a plenary Indulgence from the Pope, he undertook to kill the Queen; but coming into England with that Intent, he alter'd his Mind, and disclos'd to the Queen the whole matter. After this, he receiv'd a Letter from the Cardinal of Como, persuading him to go forward with the Enterprize; and this Letter also he shew'd the Queen. After this, he chanc'd to see a Book of Dr. Allen's written Contra Justitiam Britannicam, wherein was declar'd, That Princes who were for Heresie communicated might lawfully be depriv'd of their Life and Kingdom. This Book wonderfully confirm'd him, and he read it to Nevil; who, tho' he took an Oath of Secrecy, yet now upon a hope of the Earldom of Westmoreland, betrays him. This was his Confession before Baron Hunsdon, Sir Christopher Hatton, and Sir Francis Walsingham; as likewise in his Letters to the Queen, to the Lord Burleigh, and the Earl of Leicester, acknowledging his Fault, and craving Mercy. A few days after, he was call'd to the Bar in Westminster-hall, where he confess'd himself guilty, and thereupon was condemn'd. After Sentence of Death pronounc'd, he furiously cited the Queen to God's Tribunal. Five days after, he was laid upon a Hurdle and dragg'd thro' the City to Westminster, whereat the Gibbet he made a vain-glorious boasting of his Faithfulness to the Queen, but not so much as in a Word commended himself to God; and so in the great Palace at Westminster was executed as a Traytor, the Nobility and Commons sitting then in Parliament.

William Parry condemn'd and executed; and why.

Laws made for safeguard of the Queen.

The Earl of Arundel committed to the Tower, and for what.

In this Parliament the Association before spoken of was universally approv'd, and enacted in this Form; That 24, or more, of the Queen's Privy-Council, and Peers of the Realm, should be selected and authoriz'd under the Great Seal of England, To make enquiry of all such Persons as shall attempt to invade the Kingdom, or raise Rebellion, or shall attempt any Evil against the Queen's Person, for whomsoever, and by whomsoever that layeth any Claim to the Crown of England; and that Person for whom or by whom they shall attempt any such thing, shall be altogether incapable of the Crown; and more to this purpose: Laws also for the Queen's Safety were enacted against Jesuites and Popish Priests, and against all that shall receive or relieve 'em. These Laws terrified many, particularly out of fear of 'em Philip Earl of Arundel, the Duke of Norfolk's eldest Son, purpos'd with himself to travel beyond Sea; for having been once or twice cited before the Lords of the Council, and confined to his House, and after six months set at liberty, he thereupon wrote a Letter to the Queen, That for the Service of God, and his Soul's health, he purpos'd to leave his Country, but not his Loyal Affection towards her; but as he was taking Ship, by his own Servants treachery he was discover'd, apprehended, and put in the Tower.

At the same time Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland lay in the Tower, a Man of a lofty Spirit, being suspected by reason of secret consultation with Throgmorton, the Lord Paget, and the Guises, about invading of England, and freeing of the Queen of Scots, (whose Cause he ever highly favour'd) but in the Month of June he was found dead in his Bed, shot into his Body with three Bullets under his right Pap, and the Door bolted on the inside. The Coroner's Inquest examining the matter, found and pronounc'd that he had kill'd himself. Three days after, the Lords meeting in the Star-chamber, Bromley Lord-Chancellor declar'd this Fact of the Earls, and then commanded the Attorney-General to shew the cause of his Imprisonment, and the manner of Death: Whereupon Popham first, and then Egerton the Queen's Solicitor, in long Orations, laid open all his Treasons, and how for fear of the Law he had laid violent hands on himself.

And now the Queen knowing that the Seeds of these Treasons proceeded from the Duke of Guise and his adherents, she sought for the strengthening of her self, to enter into a League with the Princes of Germany; and to this end she sent Sir Thomas Bodley to the King of Denmark, to the Count Elector-Palatine of the Rhine, to the Duke of Saxony, Wittenburg, Brunswick-Lunenburgh, the Marquis of Brandenburgh, and the Landgrave of Hesse; and into Scotland she sent Sir Edward Wotton, to let the King understand how sincerely she was affected towards him, and withal to draw the King (if he could) into a League of mutual defence and offence, and to commend to him the Match of the K. of Denmark's Daughter. The King was very inclinable to the matter of the League, but for the present the business was interrupted by the death of Francis Russel, Son to the Earl of Bedford, slain at a meeting to compound a Difference between the Borderers by a sudden tumult of the Scots; but who 'twas that slew him was not known: The English laid it upon the Earl of Arran and the Lord Fernihurst Governor of the middle Borders; whereupon at the Queen's complaint the Earl of Arran was confined, and Fernihurst committed to Prison at Dundee, where he died; a Man of great Valour and Resolution, and one that was always firm for the Qu. of Scots. But Qu. Elizabeth not thus satisfied, gave leave by way of connivance to the Scottish Lords that were fled into England, namely, the Earl of Angus, the Hamiltons, and John Gladius, the E. of Marre, Glames, and other, that they should steal away into Scotland, (she supplying 'em with Money) there to master and subdue the E. of Arran; for Maxwel, who was lately made Earl of Bothwell, Baron Humes, Goldingnolls, and others in Scotland, had already promis'd 'em their assistance; even in the very Court Sir Patrick Gray (Arran's great Rival for the King's favour) Belden, and Secretary Maitland (by Wotton's Craft) were made against Arran. These Men, on their first entry into Scotland, commanded all Persons in the King's name to aid them for conserving the Truth of the Gospel, for freeing the King from corrupt Counsellors, and for maintaining of Amity with the English, so as there presently joyn'd joyned with them about Eight thousand Men. The Earl of Arran hearing thereof, makes haste to the King, and accuseth Patrick Gray as Author of this Commotion; but whiles Arran was making provision for defence of the Town, the Enemies were ready to scale the Walls: Whereupon Arran being advised, that only his Life was sought, get secretly away with only one Servant, the rest betook themselves to the King in the Castle. The Rebels get into the Market-place, and display their Banners against the Castle: The King sends Gray to know the Reason of their coming; they answer, To submit themselves, and in humble manner to kiss the King's Hand: The King offereth restitution of all their Goods if they would depart: They desire to be admitted to his Presence, which upon these Conditions the King granted; That they should not attempt any thing against his Life, or those whom he should nominate, nor make any innovation in the Government. They protest, they are ready to sacrifice their Lives for the King's safety; and of any Innovation they had not so much as a thought; only they request to have their Adversaries, and the Fortifications of Scotland delivered up into their Hands. Hereupon after a Day's Consultation, they are admitted into the King's Presence, and forthwith the Earls of Mount-Rosse, Crawford and Rothsay; Colonel Steward, Downs, Arran's Brothers, and others were delivered to them: The Earl of Arran, who was fled into the Western Islands, is called home: The Assaulters were pardon'd, and pronounced good Subjects. Hamilton is set over Dumbrition Castle; Goldingknolls over Edinburgh; the Earl of Angus over Tantallon; the Earl of Marre over Sterlin; and Glames is made Captain of the Guard. Upon this, all Proscriptions and Outlawries against all Persons, since the King's Inauguration (saving some few proscrib'd for the Murther of the King's Father) are called in, and with an unanimous consent of all Parties, the Treaty of a League with the Queen of England is agreed upon, and Delegates nominated to that purpose.

A Combustion in Ireland, how caused, and how pacified.

In Ireland likewise was a Combustion this Year; first, the Burks (descended of the ancient Family of the Burroughs in England) provoked by the severe Government of Richard Bingham Governour of Connaught, raise Rebellion; but this was soon suppress'd, for Thomas Burk died fighting; Meyler and Theobald Burk were taken and hang'd. After this the Clan Gibbons, Clan Donells and Joyes, combined together in great Numbers, and say plainly, They will have a Mac-William of their own, one of the Burks to rule over them, or some other Lord out of Spain; they will admit of no Sheriff into their Country, nor appear before the English Courts of Justice; and thereupon harried all the Country with Fire and Sword, and neither by the persuasions of the Archbishop Tuam, nor by the Intreaties of the Earl of Clanriccard (the chief of the House of the Burks) would be quieted, till John Bingham the President's Brother, following them into the Woods, drove away five thousand Head of their Cattel, so after forty Days, half starved, they came forth and submitted themselves. But this was not yet at an end; for now the President understood, That two thousand Scottish Islanders were landed, and ready to break into Connaught; whereupon he musters his Men to give them Battel, but they flying to Bogs and Woods, he retires back, as tho' in fear, thereby to draw them from the Bogs to firm Ground, and then with his whole Forces set upon them, slew three thousand of them (indeed all but fourscore) amongst whom were Donell Garmy and Alexander Garmy, the Sons of James Mac-Conel, who had long disquieted this part, and those Burks who were the first Author of this Rebellion. This was a famous Victory, for the good of the present and future times; for hereby the Name of the Mac-Williams in Connaught was utterly extinct, and the insolent attempts of the Scottish Islanders absolutely crushed.

In the Low Countries at this time the States were very hard beset, so as they held a Consultation whither to fly for Protection, whether to the French King, or the Queen of England. Monsieur Pruine the French Ambassador shew'd many Advantages, and gave many Reasons why they should fly rather to the French King: the English on the other side, alledged many Reasons why they should fly rather to the Queen of England; but in conclusion, they have first recourse to the King of France, and afterward, being by him neglected, to the Queen of England. But then in England it was consulted, Whether it were meet to protect them; wherein the Council was divided; some were of opinion, That it were good to receive and aid them, lest the Spaniard first conquering them, might have the better way to annoy England; others again thought, They were to be held no better than Rebels to their lawful Sovereign, and therefore unworthy of Assistance. After long debating the Matter, the Queen refuseth to take them into Protection, much less to exercise Sovereignty over them. Nevertheless to raise the Siege of Antwerp, which was beleagu'd by the Prince of Parma, she was content to supply them with 4000 Soldiers, so as the Town of Sluce, and the Ordnance belonging to it, were given up into their Hands; but while this matter was discussing, the Town of Antwerp was fain to yield it self.

But the Queen better bethinking her self, partly as fearing the growth of the King of Spain's Power, and partly as commiserating the afflicted of her own Religion, at last resolves to undertake their Protection, upon condition of her part, to supply them with 5000 Foot, and 1000 Horse, under a sufficient General, paying them during the War; and afterward the Expences to be paid back, upon condition on their part, by way of Pledge, to deliver Flushing and the Fort of Ramekin, the Town of Brill, with the two neighbouring Forts; and for the justifying of this her Action, she set forth a large Declaration. And knowing that herein she incensed the King of Spain, she thought best to turn his Anger further from home, and thereupon sent out Sir Francis Drake and Christopher Carlile, with a Navy of one and twenty Ships (wherein were 2000 Volunteers and Mariners) toward the West-Indies; who first surpriz'd the Town of St. Jago, afterward St. Domingo (where 25000 Crowns were given them to spare the Town from burning) afterward Carthagena, which they

After this the Calenture waxing hot, and diminishing their Forces, they returned homewards, passing by Virgina, a Colony which Sir Walter Rawleigh had there planted, from whence Drake brings home with him Walter Lane, who was the first that brought Tobacco into England, which the Indians take against crudities of the Stomach. At this expedition were lost above seven hundred Men, who for the most part died of Calentures: Their Booty amounted to the value of threecore thousand Pounds Sterling, besides two hundred and forty Brass and Iron Pieces. These things were done under the Torrid Zone in America; when in the mean while Captain John Davis with two Ships (at the charges of William Sanderson, and other Citizens of London) sought to find a way to the East-Indies, by the higher part of America, under the Frigid Zone; but in vain.

The States commit to him the absolute Command over the United Provinces, which the Queen is angry at.

And the States excuse it.

What was done by the Earl of Leicester at his being in Holland.

At the End of this Year the Earl of Leicester is sent General of the Queen's Forces into Holland, accompanied with the Earl of Essex, the Lords Audley and North, Sir William Russel, Sir Thomas Shirly, Sir Arthur Bassett, Sir Walter Waller, Sir Jervase Clifton, and divers other Knights, besides five hundred Gentlemen, landing at Flushing; he was first by Sir Philip Sidney the Governor his Nephew, after by the Towns of Zealand and Holland, entertain'd in most magnificent manner; and coming to the Hague in January, the States by Patent committed to him the Command and absolute Authority over the united Provinces, with the Titles of Governor and Captain General of Holland, Zealand, and the Confederate Provinces: So as being now faulted with the Title of his Excellency, he began to assume unto him princely Spirits. But the Q. took him soon off from further aspiring, writing unto him in most peremptory manner, That she wondred how a Man whom she had raised out of the Dust, could so contemptuously violate her Commands, and therefore charged him upon his Allegiance to put in execution the Injunctions she had sent him by Heneage her Vice-Chamberlain, withal, in Letters apart, she expostulateth with the States, that to her great disparagement they had cast upon the Earl of Leicester her Subject the absolute Command over the united Provinces without her privity, which she herself had utterly refused, and therefore willeth them to divest him of that absolute Authority, to whom she had set bounds which he should not pass. The States return answer, That they are heartily sorry they should incur her displeasure by conferring upon the E. that absolute Authority, not having first made her acquainted; but they beseeched her to consider the necessity of it, seeing that for avoiding of Confusion, that Authority must needs be cast upon some one or other; neither was there any great matter in the Word absolute, seeing the Rule & Dominion resided still in the People. By these Letters and Leicester's own submissive writing, the Queen was soon satisfied: Leicester all this while receiveth Contributions and Rewards from all Provinces, maketh martial Laws, and endeavouring likewise to raise new Customs upon Merchandizes, incurred great dislike amongst the common People. His first service was to relieve Grave

a Town in Brabant, which the Prince of Parma by Count Mansfield had besieged; hither he sent the Count Hohenlo a German, and Norris General of the Eng. Foot, but notwithstanding all the great Service they did there, the Town in the End was taken; but Hemart the Governour, for his cowardly yielding it up, lost his Head. From hence the Prince of Parma march'd into Gelderland, and pitch'd his Tents before Venlo, where Skenkie a Frieslander, and Roger Williams a Welchman perform'd great Service, yet the Town in a short time was taken also. But in the mean while the L. Willoughby Governor of Bergen op Zoom, cut off the Enemies Convoys, and took away their Victuals, and Sir Philip Sidney and Maurice the Prince of Orange's Son, upon a sudden onset, took Axale, a Town in Flanders. From Venlo the Prince of Parma goes to Berke, where there were 12000 English under the Command of Colonel Morgan; he notwithstanding laid Siege to the Town, which the E. of Leicester came to raise, but finding his Forces too weak to raise it, he seeks to divert it by beleaguering Duisburgh; which before the Prince of Parma could come to relieve, he took. And now the Prince of Parma, fearing lest Zutphen should come in danger, commandeth Victuals to be carried thither, which the Spaniards carrying along in a Fog, the English by chance lighted on them, vanquish'd a Troop of their Horse, slew Hannibal Gonzaga, and divers others; but then on the English side was one slain more worth than all the English and Spaniards put together, Sir Philip Sidney, who having his Horse slain under him, and getting upon another, was shot in the Thigh, and 25 days after, in the flower of his Age, died: A Man of so many excellent parts of Art and Nature, of Valour and Learning, of Wit and Magnanimity; that as he had equalled all those of former Ages, so future Ages will hardly be able to equal Him. His Funeral was in sumptuous manner solemniz'd at St. Paul's Church in London. James K. of Scots made his Epitaph, and both Universities celebrated his Death with Funeral Verfes.

After this, Leicester assaulted Zutphen, where setting upon a Fort he takes it in this manner; Edw. Stanley (of the Stanlies of Elford) catching hold of a Spaniard's Launce, which was brandish'd at him, held it so fast, that by it he was drawn into the very Fort; whereupon the Spaniards being affrighted (as thinking all the Enemies were coming up) forsook the place; Leicester knighted Stanley for this Act, gave him forty Pounds in present Money, and a yearly Pension of an hundred Marks during his Life. And now tho' in this forwardness to win the Town, yet Winter being already come on, he thought it unseasonable to besiege it any longer (especially so many English Garisons lying round about it, which were in the nature of a Siege) but return'd to the Hague, where the States entertain'd him with complaints, that their Money was not carefully husbanded, that the number of the English Supplies were not full, that foreign Soldiers were levied without their consent, that the Privileges of the united Provinces were set at nought, and new devices for Contribution invented; for all which Evils they entreated him to provide some present Remedy. To which Complaints (having a purpose to go to England) he gave a friendly An-

Answer; but on the very Day in which he was to depart, he committed the Government of the Province to the deliberation of the States, and the same day made another private Instrument of Writing, where he reserved to himself the whole Authority over the Governours of the several Provinces, Cities, and Ports; and more than this, taketh away the wonted Jurisdiction from the States Council, and Presidents of the Provinces; and came into England the third day of December. And thus passed the affairs of the Netherlands for this Year.

Philip Earl of Arundel is fined, and why. But in England, Philip Earl of Arundel, who had lain in prison a whole Year, was at last brought to the Star-chamber; and being charged with fostering of Priests, and having correspondence with Allen and Parsons the Jesuit, and offering to depart the Kingdom without license, was fined ten thousand Pounds, and imprisonment during the Queens pleasure.

A league of strict Amity is concluded with the King of Scots. At this time the Queen, by Sir Horatio Palavicini, supplied with a large sum of Money the King of Navarre; through whose side the Guises opposed the Reform'd Religion in Scotland, but her most intente care was how to unite England and Scotland in a solid friendship: To which end she sent Thomas Randall into Scotland, who making Propositions to the King, touching a League offensive and defensive, though the King at first required some Additions, and though the French Ambassador infinitely opposed it, yet at last he consented to it; and in July following there met at Berwick, Edward Earl of Rutland, William Lord Ewer, and Thomas Randal for the Queen of England: Francis Earl of Bothwell, Robert Lord Boyle, and Humes for the King of Scots, and there the League (which was called the League of strict amity, for that the word Offensive, liked not the Scots) was upon certain points concluded; First, for the maintenance of the Reformed Religion, and then other such Articles, as commonly in Leagues are usual.

A dangerous Conspiracy is at this time discovered, begun by F. Savage, but prosecuted by Anthony Babington and divers others. The very same Month that this League was agreed on, a most dangerous Conspiracy against the Queen was discovered. For first, one John Savage was by the perswasion of Gifford, Doctor of Divinity, induced to believe, that it was a meritorious work to take away the lives of Princes Excommunicate, who thereupon vowed to kill Queen Elizabeth: but to make the Queen and her Council secure, at the same time they wrote a Book, exhorting the Papists in England to attempt nothing against their Prince, and to use only the Christian weapons of Tears, Prayers, Watching, and Fasting. About Whitfuntide one Ballard a Seminary Priest of Rheims, acquainted with the row of Savage, (having dealt in France with Mendoza and Charles Paget about invading of England) arrived here in a Solders habit, and by a counterfeit name called Captain Foscu; with these matters he acquainted one Anthony Babington a Gentleman of Derbyshire, who by the Bishop of Glasco, the Queen of Scots Ambassador in France, had been commended to her as one worthy of her love; so as between them there passed often Letters in unknown Characters. In short time, Babington had drawn into the Plot other Gentlemen as zealous of the Romish Religion as himself; namely, Edward Windsor Brother to the Lord Windsor, Thomas Salisbury of a good Family in Devonshire, Charles Tilney one of the Queens Pensioners, Chydieck Tichburn of Hampshire, Edward Abington (whose Father was Cofferer to the Queen) Robert Gage of Surry, John Travers, and John Charnock of Lancashire, John Jones, Savage, formerly spoken of, Barnwell of a noble Family in Ireland, and Henry Dunne a Clerk in the Office of First-Fruits and Tenths; one Pollie also scrved himself into their Company, a fellow thoroughly acquainted with the affairs of the Queen of Scots, who was thought to have revealed all their Consultations to Walsingham day by day. To these Gentlemen Babington communicateth his affairs, but not every particular to every one, but to Ballard, Tichburn, and Dunne, he sheweth the Letters which passed between him and the Queen of Scots: with Tilney and the rest, he dealeth to be assistants; of whom, some at first loth, at last consented, and in a foolish vain-gloriousness, a Picture of the Assassins was made to the life, and Babington in the midst, with these words, Quorsum hæc alio properantibus? This Picture (they say) was gotten and privately shewed to the Queen, who knew none of them by face, but onely Barnwell (who had oftentimes come to her in the causes of the Earle of Kildare, whose servant he was.) Certain it is, that the Queen one day walking abroad, spied this Barnwell, and turning to Hatton, said, Am not I well guarded, that have not so much as one man in the Company with a Sword by his side? Thus much Barnwell himself told the rest of his Confederacy, and how easie a matter it had been to have dispatched her at that time, if the rest had been present. The chief discoverer of the Plot, was the aforesaid Gifford: This was a Gentleman of a good House at Chellington in Staffordshire, not far from Chartley, where the Queen of Scots was kept prisoner, and was now sent by the English Fugitives in France under the counterfeit name of Luson, to put Savage in mind of the Vow he had made, and to convey Letters between them and the Queen of Scots. But he, whether pricked in Conscience, or dismayed in mind, came to Walsingham privately, revealing whom he was, and for what end, and by whom sent into England. Walsingham courteously entertained him, and sent him down into Staffordshire, to do the work he had undertaken. Here Gifford bribed the Brewer of the House where the Queen of Scots lay, contrived the matter in such sort with him, that by a hole in the Wall, in which a loose stone was put, he should give in, and receive forth Letters, the which by messengers purposely laid by the way, came evermore to Walsingham hands; who broke them open, copied them out, and by the rare cunning of one Thomas Philips, found out the meaning of the private Characters, and by the singular Art of Arthur Gregory, sealed them again so curiously, that no man would imagine them to have been opened, and ever sent them to the parties to whom the subscription directed them. In like manner were the former Letters from the Queen of Scots to Babington intercepted; as also other Letters written at the same time to Mendoza the Spanish Ambassador, Charles Paget, the Lord Paget, the Archbishop of Glasco, and Francis Englefield. The Queen as soon as she understood by these Letters of the storm hanging over her her head, both at home and abroad, commanded Ballard to be apprehended, who on a sudden is taken in Babingtons house. Babington hereupon goeth to Walsingham, with whom he had long been a suitor for license to go into France, promising to do great matters in discovering the practices of the Fugitives. Walsingham with fair promises drives him off from day to day; and now persuades him, that for a small space till he could get his license sealed, he would lodge at his house in London, where they might have secret Conference without suspicion. This Walsingham himself had spun hitherto, and no other of the Queen's Counsel were made acquainted; and longer yet he would have drawn the thread out, but that the Queen was unwilling; lest (as she said) by not avoiding danger when she might, she should seem rather to tempt God, than to trust in him. Whereupon Walsingham sent a Note to his man Scudamore from the Court, to look carefully to Babington; This Note was delivered in such manner, that Babington sitting by a Table when Scudamore read it, overlooked him, and read it likewise: Hereupon suspecting that all was discovered, the next Night he and Scudamore and one or two more of Walsingham servants supping at a Tavern, and being very merry, he made an excuse that he must needs step aside, and rose up, leaving his Cloak and his Sword, and so made haste thro' the dark to Westminster, where Gage and he changed apparel, and then together withdrew themselves into St. Johns Wood near the City, whither Barnwell and Dun betook themselves. In the mean space they were proclaimed Traytors all England over. Hereupon they lay lurking in Woods and by places; they shave Babingtons face, disfigure the beauty of his Countenance (for he was of an extraordinary beauty) with the husks of green Walnuts; and when they were all half starved, went to the Houses of the Bellamies, near Harrow on the Hill, who were great Papists; There they were hid in Barns, and put into a Country habit: But notwithstanding all their shifting, within ten days after they were discovered and brought to London. The other accomplices were soon after taken, most of them in the Suburbs of the City, Salisbury and Traverse in Cheshire, and Jones in Wales, who harboured them in his house, after he knew they were proclaimed Traytors; Windsor only was never heard of. Many days were spent in the examination of them, who cut one the others Throat with their own Confession. All this while the Queen of Scots and her servants are so narrowly looked to by Pawlet, that she knew nothing of all these Passages; As soon as they were apprehended, Thomas George was sent to acquaint her with the whole matter, which yet he did not do till she was got on Horseback to ride a Hunting, and was not then suffered to return, but in shew of Courtesie was carried up and down to see the houses of the Gentry thereabouts. In which mean while John Manners, Edward Aston, Richard Bagot, and Sir William Wade, took Nave and Curle the Queen of Scots Secretaries, and the rest of her servants, and delivered them to Keepers apart, that they might have no speech between themselves, nor with their Lady the Queen of Scots. Then they broke open all doors, and such Desks and Boxes as they found with any Papers in them, they set their seals upon, and sent them to the Court, in which being broken open before the Queen, were found a number of Letters from Foreign parts, the Copies likewise of Letters sent to several persons, and threescore Alphabets at least of private Characters, as also, Letters to her from some of the English Nobility, containing preat proffers of love and service, which the Queen notwithstanding took no Notice of, but passed over in silence, according to her Motto, Video & Taceo, I see and say nothing. Gifford now, who had all this while now served their turn, is sent into France; but ere he went hence, left an Indenture with the French Ambassadour here in England, with Instructions that he should deliver no Letters to the Queen of Scots, or the Fugitives in France, but to him that exhibited an Indenture matching with that, the which he sent under-hand to Sir Francis Walsingham.

The 20th of September, seven of the fore-named Conspirators were arraigned, and pleading guilty, were condemn'd of High-Treason. Two days after, seven other were called to the Bar, who pleaded not guilty, but notwithstanding were found guilty by their own confessions, and condemned; Pollicie only, though he were privy to all passages, yet because he had disclosed many things to Walsingham, was not called in question. The 20th day of the month, the first seven in St. Giles Fields, where they were wont to meet, were hanged, cut down instantly, their privy members cut off, and themselves yet living and beholding it, were in cruel manner bowell'd and quarter'd; namely, Ballard, Babington, Savage, (who, the rope breaking, fell down from the Gibbet, and was presently taken by the hangman, his privy members cut off, and bowell'd while he was perfect ly living) Barnwell, Tichburn, and Abington. The next day, the other seven were drawn to the same place, and executed in the same fashion, but in a more gentle manner, by the Queens special charge, who detested the former cruelty, for they were to hang till they were quite dead, Salisbury first, then Dun, then Jones, Charnock, Traverse, Gage, and with them Hierome Bellamy, who had concealed Babington after he was proclaimed Traytor (whose Brother being guilty of the same fact, had strangled himself in Prison.)

When these men were executed, Nave a French-man, and Curle a Scotch-man, Secretaries to the Queen of Scots, were examined concerning the Letters, the Copies of Letters, and private Characters found in the Queen of Scots Closet; who under their own voluntary subscriptions acknowledged, that they were their own handwritings, dictated in French by the Queen herself, taken by Nave, turned into English by Curle, and copied out in secret Characters. Hereupon Sir Edward Wotton was sent out of hand into France, to make known to the King the order of the Treason, and to shew him the Copies of the Queen of Scots Letters, confirmed by the testimony of sundry of the English Nobility, that the French King might see what dangerous Plots were by Charles Paget and the English Fugitives contrived against the Queen of England.

And now, what should be done with the Queen of Scots, was a great consultation; wherein the Coun-

1586. Counsellors were not all of one mind: some conceived that it were not good to take any rigorous course against her, but only to hold her in fast Custody; both for that she was not Author of the Treason, but only Conscious to it, and because she was crazie, and not likely to live long. Others out of a care of Religion, were of opinion, to have her forthwith arraign'd and put to Death according to Law; Leicester thought it better to have her poisoned, and sent a Divine to Walsingham to prove it lawful, but Walsingham protested against that course. A difference then arose amongst them, by what law to proceed against her; Whether by the Law of the 25 of Edward the Third; (in which they are pronounced guilty of Treason who Plot the destruction of the King or Queen, raise War in his Dominions or adhere to his Adversaries) Or else by the 27 of the Queen, enacted a year since: Their opinion at last prevail'd who thought best to proceed against her by this latter Law, as being indeed in this case provided. Whereupon divers of the Lords of the Privy Council, and others of the Nobility, are authoriz'd by the Queens Letters, to enquire by vertue of that Law, and pass sentence against all such as raised Rebellion, invade the Kingdom, or attempted any violence against the Queen. These Commissioners therefore upon the eleventh day of October repaired to Fotheringay Castle in Northamptonshire, where the Queen of Scots was then held prisoner; and the next day sent unto her Walter Mildmay, Pawlet, and Edward Barker, publick Notary; who deliver'd her the Queens Letters; which having with a settled countenance read, she said, it seems to me strange that the Queen should lay her Command upon me to hold up my hand at the Bar, as though I were a Subject, seeing I am an absolute Queen no less than her self; but howsoever, I will never do any thing prejudicial to Princes of my degree, nor to my Son the King of Scotland. After many meetings, she standing still upon her Innocency, and upon her exemption from answering, as being an absolute Prince, and especially for yielding to be tryed by the English Laws, of which, One (she said) had lately been made on purpose for her destruction: It was at last told her plainly, by the Chancellor and Treasurer, that if she refused to answer to such Crimes as should be objected, they would then proceed against her, though she were absent. Being brought at last with much ado to consent, the Commissioners came together in the Presence Chamber; a Chair of State was set for the Queen of England, in the upper end of the Chamber under a Canopy, beneath over against which was placed a Chair for the Queen of Scots; on both sides of the Cloth of State stools were set, upon which on the one side sate the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Earls of Oxford, Kent, Derby, Worcester, Rutland, Cumberland, Warwick, Pembroke, Lincoln, and Viscount Montacute: On the other side sate the Lords Abergavenny, Zouch, Morley, St. John of Bletso, Compton, and Cheyney; Next to these sate the Knights that were Privy-Councillors, Sir James Crofts, Sir Christopher Hatton, Sir Francis Walsingham, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Walter Mildmay, and Sir Amias Pawlet; Forward before the Earls, sate the two Chief Justices, and the Lord Chief Baron; on the other side, the two Barons, and the other Justices; Dale and Roord, Doctors of the Civil Law, at a Table in the midst, Popham the Queens Attorney General, Eerton her Solicitor, Gawdy her Serjeant at Law, the Clerk of the Crown, and two Notaries. When the Queen of Scots was come, and had placed herself, silence being made, Bromley Lord Chancellor turning towards her, said, That the Queen had appointed these Commissioners, to hear what she could answer to Crimes laid to her charge, assuring her, That nothing would be cause of more joy to the Queen, then to hear that she had proved her self innocent. Upon this, she rising up said, That although, being an absolute Prince she could not be compelled to appear before the Delegates, yet to manifest her innocency, she was now content to appear. Then Gawdy opened every speciality of the Law lately made (against which she had taken Exception) shewing by Babingtons Confession, by Letters passed between them, by the Confessions of Ballard and Savage, by the Confessions of her Secretaries Narve and Curle, that she was privy to their Treasons, and consented to the Invasion of England, and destruction of the Queen. To which she answered, That Letters might be counterfeited, her Secretaries might be corrupted; the rest in hope of life might be drawn to confess that which was not true: In this she stood peremptorily, That she never consented to any attempt against the Queens Person; though for her own delivery she confessed she did. After many other charges by the Commissioners, and replies by the Queen of Scots; at last she requested, that she might be heard in a full Parliament, or before the Queen her self, and her Council. But this request prevailed not; for on the 25th day of October following, at the Star-Chamber in Westminster, the Commissioners met again, and there pronounced sentence against her; ratifying by their Seals and Subscriptions, that after the first day of June, in the 27th Year of our Sovereign Lady Queen Elizabeth, divers matters were compassed and imagined in this Kingdom, by Anthony Babington and others, with the Privy of Mary Queen of Scots, pretending Title to the Crown of England, tending to the hurt, death, and destruction of the Royal Person of our said Sovereign Lady the Queen.

Consultations is held what should be done with the Queen of Scots, and the resolution.

Commissioners are sent to the Queen of Scots to acquaint her with the resolution.

And the Queens Council open the Crimes with which she was charged.

Upon which afterward, in the Star-chamber, Sentence was pronounced against her,

After a few days, a Parliament was holden at Westminster the which was begun by Authority from the Queen, derived to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Treasurer, and the Earl of Derby; and the same, not without some Presidents. At this Parliament, the Proscription of the Lord Paget, Charles Paget, Francis Inglefield, Francis Throgmorton, Anthony Babington, Thomas Salisbury, Edward Jones, Chydiock Tichburn, Charles Tilney, and other the Complices was confirmed, and their goods and Possessions adjudged confiscate. Also the Peers of the Kingdom with an unanimous consent exhibit a Petition to the Queen by the Lord Chancellor, That for the preservation of the true Religion, and safety of the Queen, of themselves, and their Posterity, the sentence passed against Mary Queen of Scots, might according to Law be presently promulg'd: They put the Queen in mind of the fearful Examples of Gods Judgments extant in Scripture upon King Saul, for sparing of Agag, and upon Ahab, for not putting Benbadad to death. But the Queen answer'd them to this effect: First, acknowledging God's miraculous preservation of her, and then their constant Affection towards her, for whose sakes only she desires to live: Otherwise, when she calls to mind things past, beholds the present, and expects what may happen in time to come, that she accounts them most happy who go soonest hence. That the Law lately made, by which the Queen of Scots was condemn'd, was not made (as some maliciously have imagin'd) to ensnare her, but contrarywise, to forewarn and deter her from attempting any thing against it, which tho' it had not been made, yet were there other ancient Laws enough to condemn her. Nothing could have been more grievous to me, than that Prince, and one so near allied unto me, should deserve the Sentence pronounced against her; and seeing the Matter is of rare Example, and of a very weighty Consequence, I hope you will not expect, that I should at this present determine any thing; yet that there may be no danger in delay, I will in due time signify my Mind unto you; and in the mean time would have you expect from me whatsoever good Subjects look for from a Gracious Prince.

the Queen en-treats the Lords to think of some way
by which the
Qu. of Scots Life may be saved, and her own not endangered.
The Lords return answer,
That there can be no way of her safety but by the Queen of Scots's death.

Twelve Days after, having deeply weighed the matter in her Mind, she sent the Lord Chancellor to the Peers, and Puckering to the Lower-House, entreating them to advise more diligently concerning so weighty a matter, and to bethink themselves of some wholesome remedy, by which the Life of the Queen of Scots might be spared, and their security also provided for. They, when they had a long time in a most serious manner deliberated hereof, return at last this Verdict, That the Queen's Life could not be in safety, while the Qu. of Scots liv'd, unless she either repented and acknowledg'd her Crimes, or were kept in strait custody, or bound by her Oath and Obligations, or gave Hostages; or lastly, departed the Kingdom. And seeing none of these were likely to be Remedies, it remain'd, that only her Death would be a Remedy. Repentance in her they could little hope for, who would not so much as acknowledge her self faulty: Close Imprisonment, Obligations, Oaths, Hostages, they accounted as nothing, which all vanish'd if the Queen's Life were once taken away; and if she departed the Kingdom, they fear'd she would straightway go about to invade it again. These things the Lord Chancellor, and Puckering the Speaker of the Lower-House, declar'd to the Queen at large, and urged her in their Names, to have the Sentence put in execution. Hereupon the Queen after a short pause spake at last to this effect: I protest, my chief desire hath been, that for your Security and my own Safety, some other way might be devis'd than that which is now propounded; but seeing it now evident and certain, that my Safety, without her Destruction, is in a more deplorable estate, I am most grievously affected with inward sorrow; that I, who have pardon'd so many Rebels, have neglected so many Treasons (either by connivance, or silence) should now at last exercise cruelty upon a Prince so nearly related to me. As for your Petition, I beseech you to rest in an Answer, without an Answer: If I say, I will not grant your Petition I shall happily say what I mean not: If I should say, I will grant it, then cast I myself into Destruction headlong, whose safety you so earnestly desire, & that I know you in your wisdoms would not I should do.

After this the Parliament was prorogued, and then were the Lord Buckhurst and Beal sent to the Queen of Scots, to let her understand that Sentence was pronounced against her, and confirm'd by Parliament, and that the execution of it was earnestly desir'd by the Nobility and Commons; and therefore persuade her, that before her death she would make acknowledgment of her Offences against God and the Queen; intimating, that if she liv'd, the Religion receiv'd in England could not subsist. Hereupon she was taken with an unwonted alacrity, and seemed to triumph for joy, giving God thanks, and gratulating her own Felicity, That she should be accounted an Instrument for establishing Religion in this Island; and therewith requested she might have some Catholick Priest to administer the Sacrament unto her; but was denied, which some deem'd, not inhumane only, but tyrannical and heathenish. The Bishop and the Dean, whom for this cause they commended to her, she utterly rejected, and jeer'd at the English Nation, saying, The English were ever and anon wont to murder their own Kings, and therefore no marvel they should now thirst after her destruction. In December following the Sentence against her was proclaim'd at London first, and after over all the Kingdom, wherein Qu. Elizabeth seriously protested, that this promulgation of the Sentence was extorted from her, to her grief, by the importunity of the whole body of the Kingdom. The Queen of Scots being told hereof, seem'd not a whit dejected with it; but writing to the Queen, never maketh intercession for her self, nor expostulateth her death, but only makes three small Requests; one, That she might be buried in France by her Mother; another, That she might be put to death privately, but her Servants to be present; the third, That her Servants might freely depart, and enjoy such Legacies as she had given them. Of which Requests she desireth the Qu. to vouchsafe her Answer; but whether this Letter ever came to Qu. Elizabeth, is uncertain.

This Condemnation of the Queen of Scots, as a thing strange, and scarce credible, was soon spread far and near; so as Intercessions came thick in her behalf to Queen Elizabeth, but especially from the King of Scots and the King of France, who sent their several Ambassadors, using all the Reasons that natural Affection in the one, and likeness of Condition in the other could urge, for sparing of her Life; but when the necessity of the State seem'd to obstruct all ways of Clemency, the French Ambassador L'Aubespine, falleth from Reasons to Actions, and thinketh no way so effectual for saving the Qu. of Scots Life, as to take away Qu. Elizabeth's Life; and thereupon first he dealeth covertly with William Stafford, a young Gentleman, and prone to embrace hopes (whose Mother was of the Bed-chamber to Qu. Elizabeth, and his Brother at that time Ambassador Leiger in France) and afterward more openly by Trappe his Secretary, to murder the Queen. Stafford, tho' not daring to act such a Villany him-himself, yet commended one Moody to him, a resolute Fellow, and one that for Money would be sure to do it. Upon this Stafford brings Trappe to Moody, being then in the common Goal, who upon Trappe's offer, undertakes it: But then the consultation was, by what way it should be done. Moody propounded Poison, or else to lay a Bag of Gunpowder under the Queen's Bed, and suddenly fire it. But Trappe liked neither of these ways, but would rather have it done as was done to the Prince of Orange. But while they are thus consulting about the way of doing it, Stafford discovers all to the Lords of the Council: Whereupon Trappe, who was now bound for France, was apprehended, and being examin'd, confess'd the whole matter. Upon this, the Ambassador himself was sent for to Cecil's House, the 12th of January; where met him by the Queen's appointment, Cecil Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Leicester, Sir Christopher Hatton Vice-Chamberlain, and Davyson one of her Secretaries; who declare to the Ambassador every particular which Stafford, Moody and Trappe his Secretary had confess'd. As soon as Stafford was brought forth, and began to speak, the Ambassador interrupted him, and reviling him, made asseveration, that Stafford first propounded it; when Stafford falling on his Knees, made fearful Imprecations, that the Ambassador first propounded it himself. But whosoever propounded it (saith Burleigh) it appears that you are made acquainted with the Matter. To which he presently replied; that if he had known of any such thing, yet being he was an Ambassador, he ought not to give notice of it, but to his own King. After much reasoning in this manner, the Lord Burleigh admonished him to beware how he offended hereafter in this kind; and let him know, that he is not quitted from the Offence, tho' for this time the Queen be pleas'd to forbear him.

But upon this Treason, the Queen of Scots's Adversaries put many Terrors into Queen Elizabeth's Mind, giving out, that the Spanish Navy was come to Milford Haven: That the Scots were broken into England: That the Duke of Guise with a great Army landed in Sussex: That the Queen of Scots was escaped out of Prison, and had gotten a Company up in Arms, and many other such feigned Suggestions; through which, at length they drew the Queen to this: That she sealed Letters for executing the Sentence against the Queen of Scots; and one of the greatest perswaders to it (as the Scots reported it) was one whom the King of Scots had sent to disswade her from it; namely, Patrick Gray, who founded often in her Ears, Mortua non mordet, when she is dead she cannot bite.

But being long in suspense about it, at last she commanded Secretary Davyson to get the Commission

The Queen notwithstanding began to weigh with her self, whether it were better to rid her out of the way, or else to spare her; and many great reasons offer'd themselves on both sides, but were only speculative reasons represented themselves for sparing her, many practical reasons, and those pressed both by Courtiers and Preachers, were presented to her; so as long holden in suspense, she would oftentimes sit speechless, and her Countenance cast down; at last, her fear prevailing, she deliver'd to Secretary Davyson Letters under her Hand and Seal, to get the Commission made under the Great Seal of England, for the Execution of the Queen of Scots, which might be in a readiness upon any fear of danger; charging him not to disclose the matter to any whomsoever. But the next Day her Mind was alter'd, and sent Sir William Killigrew to Davyson, to countermand the making of the Commission. Whereupon Davyson goes to her, and lets her know, That the Commission was already made, and the Seal put to it: Whereat the Queen extremely angry, rebuketh him sharply for his hastiness; yet Davyson imparteth the matter to Privy-Councillors, and persuades them, That the Queen commanded the Commission should be put in execution. Hereupon Beal Clerk of the Council is sent down with Letters, wherein authority is deputed to the Earls of Shrewsbury, Kent, Derby, Cumberland, and others, that she should be put to death according to the Law, with which proceeding the Queen was not once made acquainted; and more than this, altho' she had intimated to Davyson, That she would take some other order concerning the Queen of Scots, yet did not he stay Beal from going.

And now comes in the last Act of the Qu. of Scots Tragedy; for as soon as the Earls were come to Fotheringay, they together with Sir Amias Pawlet, and Sir Drew Drury, with whom she was then in custody, go unto her, and reading the Commission, signifie the cause of their coming; and in a few Words admonish her to prepare herself for Death, for that she must die the next day: whereto without any change of Countenance or passion of Mind, she made answer; I had not thought that my Sister the Queen would have consented to my death, who am not subject to your Laws; but since it is her pleasure, death shall be to me most welcome. Then she requesteth, that she might confer with her Confessor, and Melvyn her Steward, which would not be granted: The Bishop or Dean of Peterborough they offer'd her, but them she refus'd. The Earls being departed, she gave order that Supper should be hastened, where she eat (as she used to do) soberly, and sparingly; and perceiving her Men and Women Servants to lament and weep, she comforteth them, and bids them rather rejoyce, that she was now to depart out of a World of Misery. After Supper she look'd over her Will, read the Inventory of her Goods and Jewels, and writ their Names severally by them, to whom she gave any of them; at her wonted Hour she went to Bed, and after a few Hours Sleep, awaking, spent the rest of the Night in her Devotion. And now the fatal Day being come, which was the 8th of February, she getteth up, and makes her ready in her best Apparel, and then betook her self in her Closet to Almighty God, imploring his assistance with deep sighs and groans; until Thomas Andrews Sheriff of the County gave notice that it was time to come forth, and then with a princely Majesty and cheerful Countenance she came out, her Head cover'd with a Linnen Veil, and carrying an Ivory Crucifix in her Hand: In the Gallery the Earls met her, and the other Gentlemen, where Melvyn her Servant upon his bended Knees, deplor'd his own fortune that he should be the Messenger to carry this sad News into Scotland; whom she comforted, saying, Do not lament, Melvyn, thou shalt by-and-by see Mary Steward free from all cares. turning her self to the Earls, she requested that her Servants might stand by her at her death, which the Earl of Kent was very loth to grant, for fear of Superstition, to whom she said, Fear nothing, these poor Wretches desire only to give me my last farewell. I know the Queen my Sister would not deny me so small a Request. After this the two Earls and the Sheriff of the County leading the way, she came to the Scaffold, which was set up at the upper-end of the Hall, where was a Chair, a Cushion, and a Block, all covered with Mourning. Then the Dean of Peterborough going to Prayers, she falling upon her Knees, and holding up the Crucifix in both Hands, pray'd with her Servants in Latin, out of the Office of the Blessed Virgin. Prayers being ended, she kissed the Crucifix, and signing her self with the sign of the Cross, said, As thy Arms, O Christ, were spread forth upon the Cross, so embrace me with the open Arms of thy Mercy, and forgive me my Sins. Then the Executioner asking her pardon, she forgave him. And now her Women helping off her outer Garments, and breaking forth into shrieks and cries, she kiss'd them, sign'd them with the Cross, and willed them to leave lamenting, for now an end of her Sorrows was at hand; and then shadowing her Face with a Linnen Cloth, and lying down on the Block, she repeated the Psalm, In te Domine speravi, ne confundar in aeternum; at which words she stretching forth her Body, her Head at two blows was taken off. Her Body was afterward royally buried in the Cathedral Church at Peterborough; but since that, her Noble Son James, King of Great Britain, erected a Royal Monument for her, in King Henry the Seventh's Chapel at Westminster. This end had Mary Queen of Scots, in the 46th Year of her Age, and of her Imprisonment in England the 18th; a Lady so compleat in all excellent Parts of Body and Mind, that it must needs have made her a happy Woman, if she had not been a Queen; and perhaps a happy Queen too, if she had not been Heir to the Crown of England: For why did all her Endeavours want success, but only from the fear of that Succession? And no Innocency of hers could be a defence, where the fury of Jealousie made the Assault.

Her Age when she died.

Queen Elizabeth hearing of her death is infinitely dejected.

And soon after writes to the King of Scots to satisfy him in it, that it was done against her meaning.

Davison is indicted in the Star-Chamber, and charg'd with violating her Majesty's trust,

As soon as it came to the Queen's knowledge that the Queen of Scots was put to death, her Countenance grew dejected, and her Speech failed her, insomuch that all in Mourning Weeds she gave her self over to Sorrow, commanded her Counsellors from her presence, and caused Davison to be cited to the Star-Chamber. And as soon as Grief would suffer, she wrote a Letter with her own Hand to the K. of Scots, and sent it by Sir Robert Carew, to this effect; That her Mind was infinitely disquieted, in regard of this lamentable event, against her meaning and intent; entreating him to believe, That if she had commanded it, she would never have deny'd it, and withal protesting her true affection towards him, and her assiduous watchfulness for the prospering of his Affairs.

While Carew was on his Journey Davison is cited to the Star Chamber before these Delegates, Sir Christopher Wray Chief Justice of the King's Bench, for that time made Lord Privy-Seal, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Earls of Worcester, Cumberland and Lincoln, the Lords Gray and Lumley, Sir James Croft Comptroler of the Queen's House, Sir Walter Mildmay Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Eamund Anderson Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and Sir Roger Manwood Lord Chief Baron (where note, that Bromly Lord Chancellor, Burleigh Lord Treasurer, Leicester and Hutton, who were indeed more guilty of the Fact than Davison, were none of the number.) Before these Delegates Popham the Queen's Attorney layeth to Davison's charge Contempt of the Queen's Majesty, violating of his Trust, and neglect of his Duty, laying open all particulars of his Fact; which after Egerton the Queen's Solicitor, Gawdy and Puckering Sergeants at Law, urg'd also against him with great aggravation: To which Davison mildly answered, That he would not contest with the Queen; only protests, that if he had done any thing otherwise than he ought, it was out of ignorance and mistaking, and not out of any purpose to disobey her Majesty. It seems the Queen had carried her self as one that would have it done, and yet was loth to do it, scarce knowing her own Mind, and yet would have another know it; meaning to make it the work of mistaking, rather than of purpose, that so at least she might leave some place of satisfaction to her self, that it was not absolutely of her doing.

The Pleadings ended, the Commissioners went to Censure; Manwood began, and gave his opinion, That Davison for the Inconsiderateness of his Fact should be fin'd ten thousand Pounds, and imprison'd during the Queen's pleasure; the rest went on in that Sentence, only the Lord Gray excused Davison so far, That he thought him worthy of Reward rather than of Punishment: The conclusion was, the first Sentence for his Fine and Imprisonment, was by Wray Keeper of the Privy Seal confirm'd; and Davison never after recover'd the Queen's favour, tho' she reliev'd him sometimes in his necessity. A Man ingenious indeed, but not thoroughly acquainted with the Ways of the Court; and thought to be rais'd to this Place on purpose to act this Part, and for nothing else.

By this time Sir Robert Carew, Son to the Lord Hunsdon, who was sent to excuse the Queen, was come to the Borders; but being come thither, was not suffer'd to set foot in Scotland: The King would scarce hear him by another, and with much ado receiv'd his Letter. He called home his Ambassador out of England, and thought of nothing but Revenge.

But the Queen still laying the fault upon Davison, and the unadvised credulity of her Councilors, so little and little allayeth his passion; and expecting till time had somewhat allwaged his Grief, that it would indure to be toucht, at length by her Agents in Scotland, and soon after by the Lord Hunsdon Governour of Berwick, she admonished him, how dangerous it would be for him to break out into War against England, and what little help he could justly expect from either Spain or France; but if he persisted in amity with England, he might be sure the Queen of England would most lovingly account him for her Son: And to the end that he should assure himself, that the Queen his Mother was put to death without her privity, she sent him the Sentence against Davison.

son, under the Seals of all the Delegates, and attested under the Great Seal of England; and another Instrument likewise, sign'd with the Hands of the Judges of England; in which they aver, That the Sentence against the Queen of Scots could in no wise be prejudice to his Right in the Succession.

Drake is sent to the Coast of Spain, and what Mischief he did that King.

Having now, by these and the like courses, somewhat asswaged the King of Scots Indignation; to prevent the War which they foresaw was imminent from the King of Spain, they sent forth Drake with four of the Queen's Ships and others to the Coast of Spain, to set upon their Ships in the Havens, and to intercept their Munition. Drake entering into the Port of Cadiz, sunk, took, and fired about 100 Ships, wherein was great store of Munition and Victuals; then returning to the Cape of St. Vincent, he set upon three Forts, and compell'd them to yield; thence setting sail to the Western Islands, call'd Azores, under the great Meridian, by great good fortune he hapned upon a huge and wealthy Carrack, call'd St. Philip, returning from the East-Indies, and easily vanquish'd it; whereupon the Mariners on both sides, from the Name of Philip, portended no good luck to Philip K. of Spain.

And the like also did Thomas Cavendish of Suffolk.

At the same time Thomas Cavendish of Suffolk, in the other part of the World, who two Years before had set sail from England with three Ships, passing thro' the Streights of Magellan, in the Coasts of Chili, Peru, and Nova Hispania, fired a great number of Spanish Towns, took and pillag'd 19 great Ships, and among 'em a wealthy Ship of the King's, nigh to California in North America; and so by the Philippine Isles, the Moluccos, the Cape de bonne Esperance, and the Island of St. Helena, return'd home the next Year, being the third after Magellan that sailed about the World.

York and Stanley in the Low Countries perfidiously deliver up Towns to the Spaniards, and their Ends.

As Drake and Cavendish at this time gain'd great Fame and Renown, so two other Men, in the Netherlands, (Stanley and York) purchas'd as great Infamy and Disgrace: This York was a Londoner, a bold Fellow, and of loose Behaviour, famous for bringing first into England the manner of turning the Point upon the Adversary in single Combat; whereas the English till this time were wont to be arm'd with Buckler and Sword, and to strike with Edge, and then held no Manhood to turn the Point, or strike below the Girdle. He suffer'd some Affront from the Earl of Leicester, fled away, and for a time serv'd under the Spaniards in the Netherlands, till at last being reconcil'd to Leicester, he was set over the Fort near Zutphen, but being bribed, he not only yielded up the Place to the Enemy, but drew to the like Villany one Stanley, who with great Valour had serv'd in an Irish Expedition, to yield up Darenter to the Spaniards, a wealthy and well fortified Town. But what got they by their Treachery? The Spaniards set York and Stanley at variance; they poyson York, and seize upon his Goods; his Carcase was 3 Years after dug up by the States commandment, and hung on a Gibbet till it rotted away. Stanley went into Spain, where there was no Credit given to him; for the Spaniards have a Saying, 'Tis lawful to give Honour to a Traitor sometimes, but never to trust him.

lands, because the Traytors were very intimate with him; whereupon the States, in large Letters to the Queen, accuse Leicester for his ill managing of the Weal publick in the matter of Money, Merchandise, and Military affairs; and to his Credulity they impute the harm that accrued by York and Stanley. The Queen, for the narrow sifting of the matter, and composing it, sent thither Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst, (lately taken into her Privy-Council in Leicester's absence) Norris, and Bartholomew Clark; but when the officious Diligence of Buckhurst seem'd to trench upon Leicester's Reputation, his Grace with the Queen prov'd so forcible, that Buckhurst at his return was for certain Months confined to his House.

Afterward Sluce being beleaguerr'd by the Prince of Parma, Leicester was by the States sent for out of England to succour it; the Town was furiously assaulted with Seventeen thousand great Shot, and a mighty Breach was made into it; which nevertheless Roger Williams, Francis Vere, Nicholas Baskerville, with a Garrison of the English and Walloons, valiantly defended for a while; but at last were forced to yield it up: Leicester, that came to relieve it, finding himself too weak for the Besiegers, went away. And indeed the States would not commit any great Army to his Command, who (they knew) had a determination to seize Leyden, and some other Towns, into his own hands, and had a purpose to surprize the absolute Government. Whereupon the States used means that Leicester was call'd home; so he gave up the Government to the States, and in his room succeeded Maurice of Nassau, Son to the Prince of Orange, being now but Twenty Years of age. Peregrine Lord Willoughby was by the Queen made General of the English Forces in the Low-Countries, to whom she gave Command to reduce the English Factions unto the States Obedience; the which, with the help of Prince Maurice, he easily effected.

Leicester being now come home, and perceiving that an Accusation was preparing against him by Buckhurst and others, for his unfaithful managing of Affairs in Holland, privately with Tears he cast himself down at the Queen's Feet, entreating her, that she would not receive him with Disgrace at his return, whom she had sent forth in Honour; and so far prevail'd with her, that the next day being call'd to Examination before the Lords, he took his Place amongst them, not kneeling down at the end of the Table, as the manner of Delinquents is; and when the Secretary began to read the Heads of his Accusation, he interrupted him, saying, That the publick Instructions which he had receiv'd were limited with private Restriction; and making his Appeal to the Queen, eluded the whole Crimination, with the secret Indignation of his Adversaries.

This Year was famous for the Deaths of many great Personages: In the Month of February died Henry Nevil Lord of Abergavenny, great Grandchild to Edward Nevil, who in the Reign of King Henry the Sixth got his Title in right of his Wife, only Daughter and Heir to Richard Beauchamp Earl of Worcester, and Lord of Abergavenny; in which right, whenas the only Daughter of this Henry, Wife to Sir Thomas Fane, challeng'd the Title of Baroness of Abergavenny, a memorable Contention arose concerning the Title between her and the next Heir-male, to whom by Will, (and the same confirm'd by Authority of Parliament) the Castle of Abergavenny was bequeath'd. This Point being a long time debating, at last, in a Parliament holden in the second Year of K. James, the matter was try'd by Voices, and the Heir-male carried the Lordship of Abergavenny, and the Barony le Despencer was ratified to the Female. This Year also, in the Month of April, died Ann Stanhope Dutcheffs of Somerset, Ninety Years old, who being the Wife of Edward Seymour Duke of Somerset, and Protector of England, contended for Precedence with Catherine Parre, Queen-Dowager to King Henry the Eighth. There died also Sir Ralph Sadler Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster, the last Banneret of England, with which Dignity he was adorn'd at the Battel of Musselborough in Scotland. After him died Thomas Bromley Lord-Chancellor of England; and six days after, he whom the Queen meant should have succeeded him, Edward Earl of Rutland; but he now failing, Sir Christopher Hatton was made Lord-Chancellor, who tho' he were a Courtier, yet the Queen, knowing him to be an honest Man, thought him not unfit for the Place where Conscience hath or should have more place than Law: Altho' some were of Opinion, that it was not so much the Queen's own Choice, as that she was persuaded to it by some that wish'd him not well, both thereby to be a cause of absenting him from the Court, and thinking that such a sedentary Place, to a corpulent Man that had not been used to Exercise, would be a means to shorten his Life; and indeed he lived not full out three Years after.

This Year Sir John Perrot was call'd home out of Ireland, and left all in great Quiet to Fitz-Williams, his successor. Hitherto the English found it no hard matter to vanquish the Irish, by reason of their unskilfulness in Arms; 800 Foot, and 300 Horse, was look'd upon as an invincible Army; but after by Perrot's command they were exercis'd in Feats of Arms, and taught to discharge Musquets at a Mark, and had in the Low-Countries learnt the Art of Fortification, they held the English better to it, and were not so easily overcome.

And now we are come to the One and twentieth Year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, being the Year 1588, long before spoken of by Astrologers to be a Wonderful Year, and even the Climacterical Year of the World; and yet the greatest Wonder that happen'd this Year, was but the Wonderful Fleet that Spain provided for invading of England, if the Defeat of that Wonderful Fleet were not a greater Wonder.

In the time of a Treaty of Peace between England and Spain, the K. of Spain sends his great Armada against England. It is true, there was at this time a Treaty of Peace between England and Spain, and the Earl of Derby, the Lord Cobham, Sir James Crofts, Dale and Rogers Doctors of Law, Commissioners for the Queen; for the Prince of Parma, the Count Aremberg, Champignie, Richardot, Mais, and Garvyer, Doctors, had many meetings about it near to Ostend, but it seem'd on the part of Spain rather to make the English secure, that they should not make provision for War, than they had any purpose of real proceeding, seeing they accepted not of any reasonable Conditions that were offered, but trifled out the time till the Spanish Navy was on our Coast, and the Ordnance heard from Sea, then they dismiss'd the English Delegates.

The Spanish Navy consisted of One hundred and thirty Ships, whereof Galeasses and Galeons seventy two, goodly Ships, like to floating Towers, in which were Soldiers 19290, Mariners 8050, Galley-slaves 2080, great Ordnance 2630. For the greater holiness of the Action, twelve of their Ships were call'd The Twelve Apostles. Chief Commanders of the Fleet were Don Alphonso Duke of Medina Sidonia; next to him, John Martin Recalde, a great Seaman. The 20th of May they weigh'd Anchor from the River Tagus, but were by a Tempest so miserably dispers'd, that it was long e're they met again: But then they sent before to the Prince of Parma, That he with his Forces, consisting of Fifty thousand old Soldiers, should be ready to joyn with them, and with his Shipping conduct them into England, and to land his Army at the Thames mouth.

consisted; and

The Queen's Preparation in the mean time was this: The Lord Charles Howard Lord-Admiral, with all her Navy, and Sir Francis Drake Vice-Admiral, were to be ready at Plymouth, and the Lord Henry Seymour (second Son to the Duke of Somerset) with forty English and Dutch Ships to keep the Coasts of the Netherlands, to hinder the Prince of Parma's coming forth: Then, for Land-service, there were laid along the Southern Coast Twenty thousand Soldiers, and two Armies besides of train'd Men were levied, over one of which, consisting of a thousand Horse and Twenty-two thousand Foot, the Earl of Leicester commanded, and pitch'd his Tents at Tilbury, near the Thames mouth: Over the other appointed to guard the Queen's Person, and consisting of Twenty-four thousand Foot, and Two thousand Horse, the Lord Hunsdon was General: Arthur Lord Gray, Sir Francis Knolles, Sir John Norris, Sir Richard Bingham, Sir Roger Williams, and other military Men, were chosen to make a Council of War, and consult how the Land-service should be order'd. These declar'd, amongst other things, That the places which lay fittest for the Enemy's landing, as, Milford-haven, Falmouth, Plymouth, Portland, the Isle of Wight, Portsmouth, the Downs, the Thames mouth, Harwich, Yarmouth, Hull, and such other, should be fortified with Works and Garrisons, the train'd Soldiers of those Shires which lay near the Sea-Coast should defend those places, and be ready at the Alarm to hinder the Enemy from landing; but if they did land, then to spoil the Country round about, that they might find no Food; and by continually crying Arm, arm, give the Enemy no rest, but yet should not give Battel till good store of Commanders were come together.

and Land to

At this time many fearing the Papists at home no less than the Spaniards abroad, persuaded the Queen to take off the Heads of some of the greatest of them; but she detesting such cruelty, took order only, That some of them should be committed to Custody in Wisbych Castle.

And now all things on both sides prepar'd, the Spanish Navy set forth out of the Groyne in May, but were dispers'd and driven back by Weather. The English Navy set forth somewhat later out of Plymouth, bearing up towards the Coast of Spain, but partly by occasion of contrary Winds, partly by advertisement that the Spaniards were gone back, and upon some doubt also that they might pass by towards the Coast of England whilst they were seeking them afar off, they return'd to Plymouth; at which time a confident (tho' false) Advertisement came to the Admiral, that the Spaniards could not possibly come forward that Year; whereupon the English Navy was upon the point of disbanding, and many of the Men were gone ashore, when suddenly the Invincible Armada (for so it was call'd in a Spanish Ostentation) was discover'd upon the Western Coast: Whereof the Lord-Admiral being inform'd, had much ado to get the Queen's Navy out of the Haven (the Wind being contrary) yet at length he haled it forth. The next day the English beheld the Spanish Ships, in height like to Castles, sailing slowly along, whom they suffer'd peaceably to pass by, that they might have the benefit of the Wind to follow after. The 21st Day of July the Admiral of England sent a Pinnace before, call'd The Defiance, which by a great shot challeng'd the Spaniards to fight; and by-and-by they fell to't: Then Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher let flie against the outmost Squadron, which Ricalde commanded, making him glad to flee to their main Navy for succour. The Night following a mighty Biscainer of Oquendo's (in which the King of Spain's treasure was) was by chance fired with Gunpowder, but was timely quenched by other Ships sent to her succour, one of which Ships was the Galeon of Don Pedro, whom Sir Francis Drake took Prisoner, and sent him to Dartmouth; the Biscainer itself (the Treasure being taken out by the Spaniards) they left behind them, which the English brought into the Haven at Weymouth.

The two Fleets engage, and the Passages
thereof.

The Three and twentieth Day of this Month they had a second Fight, in which most of the Spanish Shot flew over the English Ships, and never hurt 'em; only one Cock, an Englishman, being with his little Vessel in the midst of the Enemy, died valiantly. The Four and twentieth Day they rested on both sides, in which time the Lord-Admiral rank'd his whole Fleet into four Squadrons; the first he ruled himself, Drake the second, Hawkins the third, and Forbisher the fourth.

The Five and twentieth Day (which was St. James's Day) they fell to it the third time, in which Fight the English had again the better, so as after this time the Spaniards would no more turn upon the English, but holding on their Course, dispatch'd a Messenger to the Prince of Parma, requiring him forthwith to joyn himself to the King's Fleet, and withal to send them Bullets.

The Day following the Lord-Admiral knighted Thomas Howard, the Lord Sheffield, Roger Townsend, John Hawkins, and Martin Forbisher; and holding a Council of War, they decreed not to set again upon the Enemy till they came to the Streight of Calais, where the Lord Henry

Seymour and Sir William Winter waited for their coming. And now so far were the English from being terrified at this Invincible Navy, that many of the Nobility and others of special note hired Ships at their own charge, and came to the Admiral, as, the Earls of Oxford, Northumberland, Cumberland, Thomas and Robert Cecil, Henry Brook, Sir Charles Blount, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir William Hatton, Sir Robert Carew, Sir Ambrose Willoughby, Sir Thomas Gerard, Sir Arthur Gorge, and others.

The Seven and twentieth of July, towards the Evening, the Spaniards cast Anchor near unto Calais, and not far from them rode the English Admiral, within shot of a great Ordnance, to whom Seymour and Winter joyn'd themselves, so as by this time there were in the English Navy One hundred and forty Ships, nimble and serviceable for fighting or sailing, yet only fifteen of them bore the stroke of the Battel. And now again the Spaniards sent Post after Post to the Prince of Parma, to send them forty Fly-boats, without which they were not able to skirmish with the English, by reason of the greatness and unweildiness of their Ships, and importune him presently to put to Sea with his Army; but he was unprepar'd, and his flat-bottom'd Boats were full of Chinks, and leak'd; and besides, the Hollanders hover'd before the Ports of Dunkirk and Newport, in such sort that he durst not look forth.

The Prince of Parma is unprepar'd to put to Sea.

The Eight and twentieth Day the Lord-Admiral made ready eight of his worst Ships, on the outside daub'd with Wildfire, Rosin, and Brimstone, within full of combustible matter, and under the conduct of Young and Prowse sent them down with the Wind in the silent time of the Night towards the Spanish Fleet; the which when the Spaniards saw approach 'em, and the Sea as 'twere all on a light fire, imagining withal that those Fireships might carry in them some murdering Engine, they made a hideous noise, took up Anchors, cut Cables, spread Sails, and betook themselves to their Oars, but more to flight: One of the Spanish Galeasses having lost her Rudder, and floating up and down, was held in fight by Amias Preston, Thomas Gerard, and Harvey, who slew Capt. Hugh Moncado, cast the Soldiers overboard, and carried away a great deal of Gold, but the Vessel and Ordnance was Wreck to the Governor of Calais.

A Stratagem
English Admiral.

Drake and Fenner in the mean while perceiving the Spanish Fleet gather together again before Graveling, set upon them with great violence, to whom straitways Fenton, Southwell, Beefton, Crofts, and Ryman joyn themselves, and soon after the Admiral himself, Sir Thomas Howard, and the Lord Sheffield: The Galeon call'd St. Matthew was sorely batter'd by Seymour and Winter, driven toward Ostend, and set upon again by the Zealanders, and at length was taken by the Flushingers.

And now the Spanish Navy, having want of many Necessaries, and no hope of the Prince of Parma's coming, they resolv'd to return Northward for Spain; in which passage they lost both many Ships and Men, the English Navy still following them close, till they were fain to give them over for want of Powder. Whilst these things pass'd at Sea, the Queen in person came to Tilbury to view the Army and Camp there, where where she shew'd such undaunted Courage and Resolution, that it wonderfully animated the Spirits of them all.

And thus this Navy, which was three whole Years preparing, in the space of one Month was often beaten, and at length put to flight, many of their Men being slain, more than half of their Ships taken and sunk, (of the English not above a hundred at the most missing, nor so much as a Ship, but Cock's little Vessel) and sailing about all Britain by Scotland, the Orkneys, and Ireland, they return'd into Spain with as much Dishonour as they came out with Boasting; for indeed Mendoza, in France, by a Book in print, triumphed before the Victory.

Q. Elizabeth comes to Pauls and gives publick Thanks to GOD for this Victory.

For the happy Success of this Action, Queen Elizabeth appointed Prayers and Thanksgiving in all the Churches over England, and she (as it were in triumph) came in Person, attended with a great troop of Nobility into the City, and went into the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, (where the Banners taken from the Enemy were placed in view) and there in most humble manner gave Thanks to Almighty GOD. And that which increas'd the publick Joy was, the News which Sir Robert Sidney brought out of Scotland, That the King had overpast all Injuries, was lovingly affected towards the English, and desir'd to embrace sincere and perfect Amity with the Queen. And as for the King of Spain, he wittily told the Ambassador, That he expected no other Courtesie from him, but such as Polyphemus promis'd Ulysses, That he should be the last whom he would devour.

The Earl of Leicester dies.

And now died the great Earl of Leicester, the Fourth Day of September, at his Manour of Killingworth, of a violent Fever; I may well say the Great Earl, considering the many great Honours he enjoy'd, which are extant in the Story; yet one Honour greater than he had before he effected even then, when he was ready to go out of the World, and that was, to be Vicegerent in the high Government of England and Ireland; for which the Patent was already drawn, and had been seal'd, but that Burleigh and Hatton shew'd the Queen how dangerous a thing it might prove for so great Authority to preside in one Subject. He was, while he liv'd, in so great favour with the Queen, that some thought (and himself not the least) that she meant to marry him; yet when he died his Goods were sold at an Outcry, to make payment of the Debts he ow'd her.

Philip Earl of Arundel is cited to be try'd by his Peers, by whom he's condemn'd; but the Queen spares his life.

About this time Philip Earl of Arundel, who three Years before had been cast in Prison, was now cited in Westminster-hall, to the Judgment of his Peers, and Henry Earl of Derby was made High-Steward of England for the time. The Matters laid to his charge were these: That he had contracted Friendship with Cardinal Allen, Parsons the Jesuite, and other Traytors, exciting divers, both abroad and at home, to restore the Romish Religion, promising his Assistance thereunto; and for that reason had a Purpose to depart the Kingdom: That he was privy to the Bull in which Pope Sixtus Quintus had deposed the Queen, and given England to the Spaniard: That being imprison'd in the Tower, he caused Mass to be said for the prosperous Success of the Spanish Fleet, and for that purpose had fram'd peculiar Prayers for his own private use. Being demanded whether he were guilty of these things, turning himself to the Judges, he ask'd them these Questions: First, Whether 'twere lawful to heap up so many Crimes together in one Bill of Indictment? They answer'd, That it was. Then, Whether Arguments taken from Presumptions were of force? They answer'd, That it was lawful for him to interpose Exceptions, if he saw cause. Then again, If he might be arraign'd for those things which were Capital, by the Law made the Thirteenth Year of the Queen, after that the time express'd in the Act was expir'd? They promis'd, They would proceed against him by no Law but the old Statute of Treason, made in the Reign of King Edward the Third; but now again ask'd if he were Guilty, or not; he pleaded, Not Guilty. Whereupon Puckering, the Queen's Serjeant at Law, Popham Attorney-General, Shuttleworth Serjeant at Law, and Egerton the Queen's Solicitor, in their turns, urg'd and prov'd the Crimes objected, some whereof he deny'd, others he extenuated, but in conclusion was by his Peers found guilty, and condemn'd; yet the Queen spared his Life, and was content with thus much done in terrour to the Papists.

'Twas now in the Year 1589, and the Two and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when to be in some sort reveng'd of the Spaniards for their Invasion, she gave leave to Sir John Norris and Sir Francis Drake to undertake an Expedition at their own private Charges, requiring nothing of her but a few Ships of War, who took along with 'em Anthony the Bastard, laying Claim to the Kingdom of Portugal, and of Soldiers to the number of Eleven thousand, of Seamen about Fifteen hundred: Setting sail from Plymouth the 5th Day of April, they arriv'd at the Groyne in Galicia, where with great Valour they took first the Lower Town, and afterward the Higher: And from thence sailing towards Portugal, they met Robert Earl of Essex, who without the Queen's Leave had put to Sea: After two days they arrive at Penycha, a Town of Portugal, which they took, left the Castle to Don Antonio, and from thence they march by Land towards Lisbon, threescore Miles off. The Foot Companies led by Norris, whom Drake promis'd to follow with the Fleet, being come to the West Suburbs of Lisbon, they found nobody there but a few unarm'd Portuguese, who cried out, God save King Antonio. The Day following the Spaniards made a salley out, in which Skirmish Brett, Carefly, and Carr (stout Commanders) were slain; yet did the Earl of Essex drive the Spaniards to the very Gates of the City.

And having now tarried here two Days, and seeing no sign of the Portuguese revolting, which Don Antonio had assur'd them would be, finding fresh supplies come into the Town, their own Army sickly, Victuals and Powder failing, and (which is worst of all) Sir Francis Drake not bringing the great Ordnance as he promis'd, they departed from the Suburbs of Lisbon toward Cascais, a little Town at the mouth of the River Tagus, which Town Drake had taken this mean while, who excus'd his not coming to Lisbon by reason of the Flatts he must have passed, and the Castle of St. Julian, fortified with Fifty pieces of great Ordnance. Near this place they found three threescore Hulks of the Hans-towns of Germany, laden with Corn and all manner of Munition, which they took as good Prize towards their charges, in regard the Queen had forbid them to carry Victuals or Munition to the Spaniard. From hence they set sail to Vigo, a forlorn Town by the Sea-side, and pillaging all-along that Quarter, return'd for England, having lost in the Voyage of Soldiers and Mariners about 6000; yet not so much by the Enemy as by eating of strange Fruits, and distemper of the Climate.

It concerns the State of England to look at this time into the State of France, for while those things were in doing between Spain and England, the Popish Princes of France, under pretext of defending the Catholick Religion, enter'd into a Combination, which they call'd The Holy League; the purpose whereof was to root out the Protestants, and to divert the Right of Succession to the Crown of France; for they bound themselves to each other by Oath to suffer no Person but a Catholick to be King of France; which was directly to exclude the King of Navarre and the Prince of Conde if the present King without Issue male should fail.

A Combination call'd the Holy League was made in France.

The head of this League is the Duke of Guise, who having given some overthrows to the German Forces that came into France in aid of the Protestants, was immeasurably extoll'd by the Clergy and others, and grew to such a height of Reputation, that entering into Paris, he made the King glad to leave the City, and in an Assembly at Blois to make him Great Master of the French Cavalry, and to consent by Edict to the cutting off the Protestants: So as the King standing now in fear of him, used means at last, even in the very Court, to have him murder'd; and soon after, the Cardinal his Brother to be strangled: Hereupon so great a Confusion follow'd, that the People every where disobey'd the Magistrates, and spoil'd the King's very Palace at Paris; some Cities affected a Democracy, others an Aristocracy, but few liked of a Monarchy. The Confederates in the mean while made a new Seal, usurp'd the Royal Authority, seiz'd into their hands the best fortified places, intercept the King's Revenues, call in Spanish Soldiers, and in all places denounce War and Violence against the King; and the King in this case being forced to flee to the Protestants for succour, they then most wickedly, by one James Clement a Monk, made him away. The King being ready to die, declareth the King of Navarre to be his lawful Successor, but the Confederates would exclude him as an open Heretick, and yet whom to make choice of they cannot well agree; some would have the Duke of Lorraine, as being descended from the ancient Kings of France; some the Duke of Savoy, as born of the French King's Daughter, a Prince potent and courageous; others would have the Duke of Guise's Brother that was murder'd; others, the King of Spain; but the greatest part gave their Voices for the Cardinal of Bourbon, who was one degree nearer ally'd to the slain King than the King of Navarre his Nephew. He therefore was proclaim'd King of France, with the Title of Charles the Tenth; but he being a Priest, the King of Navarre also was at the same time proclaim'd King of France, who abode at Diepe, a Sea-Town in Normandy, and doubted not to drive the Cardinal easily out of France.

The King of Navarre being thus rais'd in Dignity, but weak in Means, implores aid of the Queen of England, offering to make a League offensive and defensive: The Queen, out of a pious respect to a King of her own Religion, sent him presently Twenty-two thousand pound Sterling in Gold (such a sum of Gold as he profess'd he had never seen at one time before) and withal supply'd him with Four thousand Soldiers under the command of Peregrine Lord Willoughby; for Colonels she appointed Sir Thomas Wilford, who was made Marshal of the Field, John Burroughs, Sir William Drury, and Sir Thomas Baskerville, and gave them a Month's Pay in hand. Hereupon the Confederates, whom the King had vanquish'd a little before at Arques beyond all expectation, began to quail, and the day before the arrival of the English they vanish'd away. With this addition of Forces the King marcheth to Paris, and being ready to enter the City, caus'd a Retreat to be sounded, as loth to have spoil made of a City that he hoped shortly should be his own: Afterwards, by the assistance of the English, he won many Towns, and then having march'd at least Five hundred Miles on foot, he gave them leave, after a long Winter's Service, to return into England; in which Voyage, of Men of note died Capt. Huntings, but of a natural Death; also Stubbs (he whose right Hand was cut off for writing the Book against the Queen's Marriage) and Sir William Drury, slain by Mr. Burroughs in a single Combat, where the Quarrel was, that he being but a Knight, would take place of Burroughs, that was the younger Son of a Baron, contrary to the Laws of the English Gentry.

Sir Will. Drury is slain by Mr. Burroughs in a single Combat, on a quarrel of taking place, the one being a Knight, the other a Baron's younger Son.

About this time James King of Scots (with Queen Elizabeth's good liking) espoused Anne, the Daughter of Frederick the Second, King of Denmark, by his Deputy; but she afterwards sailing for Scotland, was by Tempest cast upon Norway, and there, thro' continual Storms, forced to stay, so as the King in the Winter season set sail thither, that the Marriage (according to his Vow) might be accomplish'd within the Year. Some were of opinion, that those Storms were caus'd by Witchcraft, and was confirm'd indeed by some Witches taken in Scotland, who confess'd they had rais'd those Storms to keep the Queen from landing in Scotland; and, that the Earl Bothwell had ask'd Counsel of them concerning the King's End; who was thereupon cast into Prison, but in a short time breaking loose, occasion'd new Stirs in Scotland.

This Year many Noble Personages died; as, Frances Countess of Sussex, Sister to Sir Henry Sidney, Sir Walter Mildmay Chancellor and Vice-Treasurer of the Exchequer, William Somerset Earl of Worcester, so numerous in his Offspring that he could reckon more Children of both Sexes than all the Earls of England; also John Lord Stourton, Henry Lord Compton, and at Brussels the Lord Paget.

Many Great Persons die.

Will. Somerset Earl of Worcester, his numerous Issue.

At this time the Queen, who was always frugal, strain'd one point of frugality more than ever she had done before; for, upon the information of one Caermarden, (tho' Leicester, Burleigh, and Walsingham were offended that credit should Sir Fra. Walsingham dies.

Some Disturbances in Ireland, but soon compos'd.

It was now the Year 1590, and the Three and thirtieth of Q. Elizabeth's Reign, in which the Earl of Cumberland made a Voyage to the Indies, where he laid level with the Ground the Fort of the Ile of Fiala, and brought away eight and fifty Pieces of great Ordnance.

This Year was fatal to many great Personages, first died Ambrose Dudley Earl of Warwick (Son to John Duke of Northumberland) without Issue: After him, Sir Francis Walsingham Secretary, a Man more skilful in the Politicks than in the Oeconomicks, more cunning in managing Matters of the publick State, than of his own private Estate, which he left so mean, and died so much indebted, that he was fain to be buried by Night, without any Funeral Pomp, in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, leaving behind him one only Daughter, famous for her three Husbands, all of 'em the goodliest Men of their time, the first Sir Philip Sidney; the second, Robert Earl of Essex; the third, Richard Brugh Earl of Clanriccard, by King Charles made Earl of St. Albans. Within two Months after Walsingham, died Sir Thomas Randal, who had been 14 times sent in Embassage to several Princes, yet was never rewarded with any greater Dignities than the Chamberlainship of the Exchequer, and the Post-mastership of England. Soon after him died Sir James Crofts, who had done good service in Scotland in Edward the Sixth's time; in Queen Mary's time was condemn'd of High-Treason, in Queen Elizabeth's time set at liberty, and made Governor of Berwick, and afterwards Comptroler of her House. After him died George Talbot, the 7th Earl of Shrewsbury of this House; he was made Earl-Marshal of England, and left behind him a Memorial of Wisdom and Integrity. Lastly, died Thomas Lord Wentworth, the last of the English that had been Governor of Calais.

In Ireland at this time Hugh Gavelock (so call'd because he had been long kept in Fetters) the natural Son of Chane O-Neal, accus'd Hugh Earl of Tir-Oen for holding private Consultations with certain Spaniards, who in 88 were by Shipwreck cast upon the Coast of Ireland: Tir-Oen, to prevent the Accusation, took the said Hugh, and when others refus'd to do it, took a Cord, and with his own hands strangled him. Hereupon he was sent for into England, and came, and on Pardon obtain'd, solemnly undertook in the presence of the Queen at Greenwich, to maintain the Peace with Turlough Leynigh, not to usurp the Title of O-Neal, nor any Authority over the Gentry about him; to reduce the Territory of Tir-Oen to the form of a County and civil behaviour, and many such matters; giving Hostages for his true performance; and indeed for a time he observ'd all things very dully. This Trouble allay'd, another arose; for, soon after this, Hugh Roe Mac-Mahon, a Potentate in the Territory of Monagan, compell'd those under his Jurisdiction to pay him Tribute; whereupon the Deputy caus'd him to be taken and try'd by a Jury of common Soldiers, and then to be hang'd up, dividing his Lands amongst certain English, and some of the Mac-Mahons, reserving a certain yearly Rent to the Crown of England, by this means thinking to extinguish the Power and Title of Mac-Mahon. But hereupon O-Rork, fearing he would be serv'd in like manner, took up Arms against the Queen, whom Bingham President of Connaught soon distress'd, and drove into Scotland, and, at the Queen's request, was by that King deliver'd up into his hands.

'Twas now the Year 1591, and the Four and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when she, careful lest Britany should come into the Spaniard's hands, sent Edmund York into France to advertise the King to take care thereof, promising to send him Forces to that end, if he would name some Towns where they might be in safety. Hereupon he nam'd Cherburg, Granville, or Brest, as the fittest; and it was agreed, that Three thousand English should be sent into Britany and Picardy; but in the mean time Henry Palmer was sent to Sea with certain Ships, who seiz'd upon thirteen Spanish Ships as they were returning from Nova Francia. And now Roger Williams, with a company of 600 Soldiers, passeth over to Diepe in Normandy, and Sir John Norris with the rest of the Forces hasten'd into Britany soon after. Roger Williams, with his own 600, and the help of Chartres Governor of Diepe, put to rout the Confederates that had block'd up the passages, whose Valour the French King, in his Letters to the Queen, highly extol'd: Whereupon growing more courageous, and not minding his Charge, which was to stay at Diepe, he accompanied the King to the very Suburbs of Paris, where, in honour of his Nation, he sent a Challenge to the Spaniards, to encounter Two hundred Pikemen of the English, and a hundred Musqueteers, with as many Spaniards, in open Field.

After this, the King of France acquainted the Queen, That he had a Purpose to set upon Roan before the Prince of Parma should come into France, and thereupon requested her to send Four thousand English into Normandy; which upon certain Conditions she willingly did, and sent them under the command of Robert Earl of Essex, accompanied with Sir Thomas Leighton and Sir William Killigrew, as his Counsellors.

When the Earl came into France, he found that the King was at Noyon, and in Normandy no preparation for the War at all; which seem'd strange, and much troubled him; but by-and-by Sir Roger Williams comes to him from the King, requesting him to come to Noyon, that they might confer concerning a course of War. Thither the Earl made a tedious Journey; and being come thither, the King told him, He was now of necessity to go himself into Champagne, but promiseth to send Marshal Biron and the Duke of Montpensier forthwith to him, to besiege Roan. Hereupon the Earl return'd to his Tents expecting their coming, but neither of them came, which troubled the Earl more than before, so as being weary now of doing nothing, he made himself one approach to Roan, where his Brother Walter Devereux was unfortunately slain. Indeed the Affairs of the King of France were at this time upon such uncertain terms, that before he could act what he had resolv'd, something still interven'd that diverted him; for which, by his Letters he excus'd himself to the Queen Hacket's prodigious Carriage.

At this time was memorable the prodigious Carriage of one Hacket, born at Oundle in Northamptonshire, a mean fellow and of no Learning, whose first Prank was this; that when, in shew of reconciliation to one with whom he had been at variance, he embrac'd him, he bit off his Nose, and the Man desiring to have his Nose again that it might be sew'd on while the Wound was green, he most villainously eat and swallow'd it before his face. After this, all on a sudden, he took upon him a shew of wonderful Holiness, did nothing but hear Sermons, and get Scriptures by heart, counterfeiting Revelations from God, and an extraordinary Calling, grew to be magnified by certain zealous Ministers, and specially one Edward Coppinger, (a Gentleman of a good House) and one Arthington, a great admirer of the Geneva Discipline, that they look'd on him as sent from Heaven, and a greater Prophet than

He takes upon him to be Christ.

Moses or John Baptist; and finally, that he was Christ himself, come with a Fan in his Hand to judge the World: And this they proclaim'd in Cheapside, giving out, that Hacket participated of Christ's glorified Body by his special Spirit, and was now come to propagate the Gospel over Europe, and to settle a true Discipline in the Church of England; and, that they themselves were two Prophets, the one of Mercy, and the other of Judgment, with many other such incredible Blasphemies; hereupon Hacket was apprehended and arraign'd, and at last hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd, continuing all the time (and at his death) his blasphemous Assertions. Coppinger a while after starv'd himself to death in Prison; Arthington repented, and made his Recantation in a publick Writing.

The calling of Bishops at this time cried down by some, but countenanced by the Queen.

Besides these, others also at this time oppos'd the establish'd Government of the Church of England, crying down the Calling of Bishops, with whom sided some Common-Lawyers also, affirming, That the Queen could not depute, nor these Men exercise any such Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction; and, that the Oath ex Officio was unchristian. But the Queen conceiving that thro' the Sides of the Prelates she herself was shot at, suppress'd them what she could, and maintain'd the Government formerly establish'd.

The great Ship call'd the Revenge taken by the Spaniards.

About this time the Lord Thomas Howard, six of the Queen's Ships having waited at the Azores six whole Months for the coming of the Spanish Fleet from America, was at last set upon by Alphonso Bassano with 53 Ships sent out for the Convoy of the American Fleet, where Richard Greenville Vice-Admiral, being in the Revenge, and separated from his company, was so hem'd in by the Spanish Ships, and so batter'd with great Shot, that most of his Men being slain, his Main-mast cut off, himself sore wounded in the Head, he commanded to sink the Ship, that it might not come into the Spaniards's hand, but this being countermanded by most Voices, 'twas agreed to yield it to the Spaniards, upon condition that the Men should be set at liberty. Greenville himself was carried in to the Spanish Admiral, where within two days he died, not without Praise of his very Enemies: Thus the great Ship, call'd The Revenge, was yielded, but had so many leaks in her Keel, that soon after it was cast away in a Storm; and the loss of this one Ship was soon made good upon the Spaniards, by taking many of theirs

About this time also Cavendish, who in the Year 1578 had sail'd round about the World, now with five Ships bent his course towards the Magellan Straights, but by reason of foul weather was not able to pass 'em; and being driven to the Coast of Brazil, was there cast away.

Cavendish cast away in the Straights.

And now Enmity encreasing daily between Spain and England, two Proclamations were set forth, one prohibiting, on pain of High-Treason, to carry Victuals or Munition into any of the King of Spain's Dominions; another, forbidding all Persons to entertain any in their Houses till enquiry be made what they were, lest they might entertain Popish Priests, who at this time came swearing into England, by reason the King of Spain had lately founded a Seminary at Valladolid for the English.

At this time died Sir Christopher Hatton Lord-Chancellor, who, of a mean Gentleman's House, the Queen's favour rais'd to this height of Dignity; a goodly Personage of Body, of a noble, but no aspiring Spirit, the only of all the Queen's especial Favourites that died a Bachelor, and therefore left William Newport his Sister's Son his Heir, who erected for him, in St. Paul's Church, a sumptuous Monument. After his death, the keeping of the great Seal was for certain months committed to the Lord Burleigh Treasurer, Hunsdon, Cobham, and Buckhurst; afterwards Puckering, the Queen's Serjeant at Law, was elected, not Chancellor, but Keeper of the Great Seal.

Sir Christopher Hatton, Lord-Chancellor, dies.

Puckering the Queen's Serjeant is made Lord-Keeper.

At this time also Bryan O-Rork, the Irish Potentate, was arraign'd at Westminster; his Indictments were, for raising Rebellion against the Queen, for dragging her Picture at a Horse-tail, for giving the Spaniards entertainment; which things being told him by an Interpreter, (for he understood no English) he said, He would not be try'd unless the Queen her self sate in person to judge him: Yet being told, that it was the Law, he only said, If it must be so, let it be so; and so was condemn'd, and was executed at Tyburn as a Traytor, whereof he seem'd to make as little reckoning as if it had been but in jest.

Bryan O-Rork an Irish Potentate hang'd, and why.

And now this Year the Queen made the College of Dublin in Ireland a University, which was formerly the Monastery of All-Saints, endowing it with Power to confer Scholastical Dignities.

The College at Dublin made a University.

At this time Sir John Perrot, who had been Deputy of Ireland, and done good service there, was yet by the Malice of his Adversaries, of whom Hatton was one, call'd in question before the Baron Hunsdon, the Lord Buckhurst, Sir Robert Cecil, lately made a Councillor, Sir John Fortescue, Sir John Woolley, and some of the Judges: His Accusations were, first, That he had spoken opprobrious Words against the Queen, saying, She was Illegitimate and Cowardly; secondly, That he had foster'd notorious Traytors, and Popish Priests; thirdly, That he held Correspondence with the Prince of Parma and the Queen's Enemies. To the first of which he confess'd, that in his Passion he had spoken of the Queen unadvisedly, for which he was infinitely griev'd; the rest he deny'd, and all Men knew knew he was never Popishly affected. His Accusers were one Philip Williams, some time his Secretary, Dennis O-Roghan an Irish married Priest, whose Life he had sav'd; and one Watson, a fellow of no Worth or Reputation; yet the Crimes being urg'd against him by Popham and other Lawyers till eleven a-clock at Night, he was at last condemn'd of High-Treason, but Sentence was not pronounc'd till twenty days after, and yet was not put to death, but died a natural death in the Tower. He was a Man of a goodly Personage, stout and cholerick, and one whom (many thought) the Queen had the more reason to respect for her Father King Henry the Eighth's sake.

The Earl of Essex challengeth Monsieur Villars to a single Combat but is refus'd.

The Earl of Essex, after a tedious Winter's Siege in Normandy, challeng'd Monsieur Villars Governor of Roan to a single Combat, who refusing to meet him, he then return'd into England, being call'd home by the Queen, whose Favour, by his long absence, might else have suffer'd prejudice.

And now the King of France hearing that the Prince of Parma was coming into France, once again was fain to flee to the Queen for succour, to whom, upon certain Conditions, she granted an Army of Four thousand Men, and some great Ordnance; with which Sir John Norris was sent into France; whom yet the French King employ'd not, as was agreed, to the great displeasure of the Queen. But as for the Prince of Parma's coming into France, he was prevented by Death, when he had govern'd the Netherlands under the Spaniards fourteen Years; a Prince of excellent Parts, and whom Queen Elizabeth never mention'd but with Honour.

The Prince of Parma dies.

Sir Walter Raleigh sent with 15 Ships against the Spaniards, and what he did.

And now Queen Elizabeth considering that the King of Spain's chiefest strength was in his Gold of America, sends forth Sir Walter Raleigh with a Fleet of fifteen Ships, to meet with the Spanish Fleet; who passing by a Promontory of Spain, receiv'd certain Intelligence, that the Spanish Fleet was not come forth that Year; whereupon dividing his Navy into two parts, whereof the one he committed to Sir John Burroughs, the other to Sir Martin Forbisher, he waited other Opportunities; when, soon after, a mighty Carrack came in view, call'd The Mother of God, which from the Beak to the Stern was a hundred threescore and five foot long, built with seven Decks, and carrying Six hundred Men besides rich Merchandise. This great Vessel they took, and in it to the value of One hundred and fifty thousand pounds Sterling, over and above what the Commanders and Seamen pilfer'd.

The Queen in her progress goes to Oxford, where her Entertainment there, and her Counsel to the University.

This Year the Queen going in progress, pass'd thro' Oxford, where she was entertain'd by the Scholars with Orations, Stage-plays, and Disputations; and by the Lord Buckhurst, Chancellor of the University, with a sumptuous Feast. At her departure she made a Latin Oration, wherein she vow'd a Vow, and gave them Counsel; her Vow was, That as she desir'd nothing so much as the prosperity and flourishing state of her Kingdom, so she as much wish'd to see the Universities and Schools of Learning to flourish likewise: Her Counsel was, That they would serve God above all, not following the Curiosity of some Wits, but the Laws of God and the Kingdom; That they would not prevent the Laws, but follow them; nor dispute whether better Laws might be made, but observe those which were already enacted.

This Year died Anthony Brown Viscount Montacute, whom Queen Mary honour'd with this Title, because his Grandmother was Daughter and one of the Heirs of John Nevil Marquis Montacute; who, tho' he were a great Roman Catholick, yet the Queen finding him faithful always, lov'd him, and in his Sickness went to visit him. There died at this time also Henry Lord Scroop of Bolton, Knight of the Garter, and long time Governor of the Western Borders towards Scotland.

Anth. Brown Viscount Montacute dies, and how this Honour came to his Family.

At this time Henry Barrow and his Sectaries condemning the Church of England to be no Christian Church, and derogating from the Queen's Authority in matters Ecclesiastical, he the said Barrow, as the Ringleader of the rest, was put to death, in terror to all such disturbers of the Peace of the Church.

Henry Barrow a seditious Sectary is put to death.

About this time, by reason of the Queen's Correspondence with the Turk, to the end her Subjects might have free trading in those Territories, 'twas maliciously given out by some, that she had excited the Turk to a War against the Christians; which caused the Queen to write to the Emperor, shewing him the falseness of this Report, wherein she gave him full satisfaction.

And now a constant Report came into England, That the King of France had really embraced, or was ready to embrace, the Romish Religion; which so much troubled the Queen, that she presently sent Thomas Wilks into France with Reasons (if 'twere not too late) to divert him from it; but before Wilks came the King indeed had openly profess'd the Romish Religion at the Church of St. Dennis in Paris, of which his Conversion he declar'd the Causes to Wilks at large, shewing the necessity of it, unless he would suffer himself to be utterly thrust out of the Kingdom: And the French Ambassador signifying as much to the Queen, in great perplexity she wrote to him to this effect.

The King of France turns Roman Catholick, and acquaints Queen Eliz. with the necessity of his doing it.

Alas! what Grief, what Anxiety of Mind hath befallen me since I heard this News! was it possible that worldly Respects should make you lay aside God's Fear? Could you think that He, who had hitherto upheld and kept you, would now at the last leave you? It is a dangerous thing to do Evil that Good may come thereof; but I hope your Mind may alter: In the mean while I will pray for you, and beg of God, that the Hands of Esau may not hinder the Blessing of Jacob.

The Queen's Letter to him out of Sorrow for it.

To this the King answer'd, That tho' he had done this in his own Person out of Necessity, yet he would never be wanting to those of the Reformed Religion, but would take them into his special Care and Protection.

The King's Answer.

And now was Richard Hacket condemn'd and executed for Treason, being sent from the English Fugitives beyond Sea, to persuade Ferdinand Earl of Derby, Son to Henry newly deceased, to assume the Title of the Kingdom, by right of Descent from Mary Daughter to Henry the Seventh; and threatening him, that unless he undertook this Enterprize, and withal conceal'd him the Abettor, he should shortly die in most wretched manner. But the Earl fearing a trap was laid for him, revealed the matter; yet the fellows fellows threatening prov'd not altogether vain, for the Earl within four Months died a most horrible death. This Year Death had his Tribute paid from the Nobility, for there died Henry Ratcliffe Earl of Sussex, and three renowned Barons, Arthur Gray of Wilton, Henry Lord Cromwell, and Henry Lord Wentworth; besides Sir Christopher Carlisle, whose warlike Prowess at Sea and Land deserves to be remembred.

The Papists think upon a Successor to the Queen.
Some would have the Earl of Essex, and frame a Right to him by De-

It was now the Year 1594, and the Seven and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when the good Correspondence between the King of Scots and Queen Elizabeth, gave the Papists small hope that ever he would prove an Instrument to restore the Catholick Religion. Whereupon they began to bethink themselves of some English Papist that might succeed the Queen; but finding none of their own Sect a fit Person, they fixed their Thoughts upon the Earl of Essex, who always seem'd a very moderate Man; and him they devised to have some Right to the Crown, by Descent from Thomas of Woodstock, K. Edward the Third's Son. But the English Fugitives were for the Infanta of Spain; and desiring to set the King of Scots and the Earl of Essex at odds, they set forth a Book, which they dedicated to Essex, under the Name of Doleman, but was written indeed by Parsons (Doleman's bitter Adversary) Cardinal Allen, and Francis Englefield. The Scope of which Book was to exclude from Succession all Persons whatsoever, and how near soever allied to the Crown, unless they were Roman Catholicks; contending further for the Right of Isabella, Infanta of Spain, as being descended from Constance, Daughter of William the Conqueror; from Eleanor eldest Daughter to King Henry the Second, married to Alphonso the Ninth King of Castile; from Beatrix, Daughter to King Henry the Third; Titles obsolete, and which exceed the Bounds of Heraldry or discuss. This Year the 19th of February, was Henry Prince of Scotland born, to whom the Queen was God-mother, and sent Robert Earl of Essex for her Deputy.

But now greater matters were in hand, Plots were laid against the Queen's Life; some Spaniards thinking to make her away by Poyson, and not daring to trust any Englishman in such a business, they treat to that purpose with Roderick Lopez a Jew, and Physician to the Queen, with Stephen Ferreira, Emanuel Loyse, and other Portugals; for divers of that Nation came into England at this time, in relation to Don Antonio; who being discover'd by Letters of theirs that were intercepted, were arraign'd at Guild-hall, and by their own Confessions convinc'd to have conspir'd against the Life of the Queen; they were all condemn'd and executed at Tyburn, Lopez professing, that he lov'd the Queen as well as Jesus Christ; which was the cause of Laughter to them that knew him to be a Jew. The next Day after them, was condemn'd Patrick Cullen an Irish Fencer, sent hither by the English Fugitives, to kill the Queen, who was straight-way executed, tho' he were at that very time sick, and ready to die.

About this time Sir John Norris having been in a hot Conflict at Sea against the Spaniard, where Sir Martin Forbisher receiv'd his Death-wound, was now call'd home, with a purpose to send him into Ireland: In which mean while, Richard Hawkins, Son of Sir John Hawkins the famous Sea Captain, had been set forth a Year since, with three of the Queen's Ships, and 200 Men in them, whereof one of them at the Isle of St. Anne was by chance fired, and another of them separated by Tempest, return'd into England; himself in the third pass'd the Streights of Magellan, being the sixth Man in the Spanish Accompt that had ever done it; and being now come into the wide Southern Sea, he took five Ships laden with Merchandize; one whereof he took away, the rest he suffer'd to redeem themselves for 2000 Ducats: But atlast being set upon by Bertrandus a Castro, who was sent out by the Vice-Roy of those Parts, with eight Ships against him, after three Days Battery the yielded, and tho' upon Composition, yet was nevertheless sent into Spain, and there for divers Years kept Prisoner.

But James Lancaster in another part of Ameica had better success; for being set forth by some London Merchants (whose Goods the Spaniards had seiz'd) with three Ships and a long Boat, he took 39 Spanish Ships, and at Fernambuco in Brafile, where the Wealth of an East-Indian Caraque was lately unloaden, he desperately venturing upon the Shore, loaded fifteen Ships with the Wealth of the Indian Caraque; Sugar-Reed, Red Wood, call'd Brazil, and other Merchandize, and then safely and victoriously return'd home.

At Rome, about this time, died Cardinal Allen, born in Lancashire of an honest Family, brought up in Oxford in Oriel College. In Qu. Mary's days he was Proctor of the University, and after Canon of the Cathedral Church at York: Upon the change of Religion in England he left the Kingdom, and was Divinity Professor at Doway in Flanders, and made Canon of the Church at Cambray. He procur'd a Seminary to be set up in Doway for the English; another at Rheims, and a third at Rome; and through Zeal of the Romish Religion, forgot whose Subject he was born.

dies, and of his Education.

At home, at this time, died John Peers Archbishop of York, in whose place succeeded Matthew Hatton, translated from the See of Durham. There died also Ferdinand Stanley Earl of Derby, being in the flower of his Age, miserably tormented, and vomiting stuff of a dark rusty Colour, being thought to have been poyson'd or bewitch'd. There was found in his Chamber a little Image of Wax, with Hairs of the colour of his Hairs thrust into the Belly; which some thought was done on purpose, that Men should not suspect him to be poyson'd: His Vomit so stain'd the silver Andirons, that it could never be gotten out; and his Body, tho' put in Searcloths, and wrapped in Lead, did so stink and putrifie, that for a long time none could endure to come near where he was buried. The Master of the Horse was much suspected, who the same Day the Earl took his Bed, took one of his best Horses, and fled away. About this time also died George Pines

And now Sir William Fitz-Williams Lord Deputy of Ireland was called home, and William Ruffel youngest Son of Francis Earl of Bedford, is sent Deputy into Ireland, to whom Tir-Oen submits himself, but dissemblingly.

Edmund York and Richard Williams executed for being bribed to kill the Queen. A new Rumour spread of a new Fleet of Spaniards, to invade England, but false.

It was now the Year 1595, and the Eight and thirtieth Year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when Edmund York and Richard Williams, who were formerly apprehended, came to their Tryal, and were executed at Tyburn, for being bribed to kill the Queen.

At this time a constant Rumour was blown abroad from all parts of Europe, that the Spaniards were coming again against England, with a far better Fleet than that in Eighty eight, and that it was already under Sail; whereupon Soldiers were levied, and placed on the Sea-coast. Two Navies were made ready, one to expect them at home in the Channel; the other to go for America under Hawkins and Drake; but when all came to all, it was but certain Spaniards, who loosed from the Sea-coast of France, with four Gallies, which betimes in the Morning landing in Cornwall, fired a Church standing alone in the Fields, and three Villages of Fishermen, Newlyne, Mowshole and Pensans, and then presently retired, not taking or killing any one Person; and these were the first and last Spaniards that in hostile manner ever set foot upon English Ground.

And now Mischief growing daily in France, a great number persuaded the King to conclude a Peace with Spain, and the Queen her self began to mistrust him, especially having lately receiv'd Intelligence out of the Pope's Conclave, that he was receiv'd into the Bosom of the Church of Rome, with the Pope's Benediction, and upon Conditions prejudicial to the Protestants.

Sir Walter Rawleigh's Voyage to Guiana, and what he did.

And therefore at this time were divers Undertakings of the English against Spain; Sir Walter Rawleigh Captain of the Guard, having de-flower'd a Maid of Honour (whom he afterward married) had lost the Queen's Favour, and was held in Prison for certain Months; but afterward being set at liberty, tho' banished the Court, he undertook a Voyage to Guiana; setting Sail from Plymouth in February, he arriv'd at Trinidad, where he took St. Joseph's Town, but found not one jot of Money there. From hence with Boats and 100 Soldiers, he enter'd the vast River Oronoko, ranging up into Guiana 400 Miles, but getting little but his labour for his travel. In like manner, Amias Preston and Summers pillag'd sundry Towns of the King of Spain's in the Western Parts, and three Ships of the Earl of Cumberland set upon a huge Caraque, which by casualty was fir'd when they were in Fight; and these were the Enterprizes of private Persons: But the Queen being inform'd, that great store of Wealth for the K. of Spain's use was convey'd to Porto-Rico in St. John's Island, sent thither Hawkins, Drake and Baskerville, with Land-Forces, furnishing them with six Ships out of her own Navy, and 20 other Men of War. They set Sail from Plymouth the last of August, and 27 Days after, came upon the Coast of the great Canary, which being strongly fortify'd, they forbore to assault. A Month after they came to the Isle of St. Domingo, where five Spanish Ships being sent forth to watch the English, lighted upon one of the small English Ships which was stray'd from the Company, and putting the Master and Mariners upon the Rack, understood by them, that the English Navy was bent to Porto-Rico; whereupon they make all possible speed to give notice thereof, that being forewarn'd, they might accordingly be arm'd: And thereupon as soon as the English had cast Anchors in the Road of Porto-Rico, the Spaniards thunder'd against them from the Shore; Sir Nicholas Clifford and Brute Brown were wounded as they sat at Supper, and two Days after died: Hawkins also and Drake, partly of Disease, and partly of grief for their ill success, died soon after. At the end of eight Months the Fleet came home, having done the Enemy little hurt, fired only some few Towns and Ships, but receiv'd infinite damage themselves; lost two such Seamen as the Kingdom, I may say all Europe, had not their like left. For the Spaniards having of late Years receiv'd great harms by French and English, had now provided for themselves with Fortifications which were not easily to be won.

At this time the Queen made known to the States in the Low-Countries, the great Charges she had been at in relieving them Ten Years together; for which she requir'd some considerable Recompense: The States again alledg'd the great Charges they were at in Eighty eight in repelling the Spaniards in her Cause; yet (not to fall out about the matter) they were content to allow some reasonable Retribution; but yet for the present nothing was concluded. Likewise at this time, the Hans-Towns in Germany make a Complaint to the Emperor, and the Princes of the Empire, That the Immunities from Customs anciently granted them by the King of England, began to be antiquated, and that a Monopoly of English Merchants was set up in Germany: To which the Queen by Sir Christopher Perkins, first shewing the cause of the first Grant, and then the Reason of Queen Mary's prohibiting it afterward, makes them so satisfactory an Answer, that those very Hans-Towns which complained, brought into England at this time such store of Corn, that it prevented a Mutiny, which through dearth of Corn, was like to have happen'd in London.

This Year was famous for the Death of many great Personages, Philip Earl of Arundel, condemn'd in the Year 1589, the Queen had all this while spared, but now Death would spare him no longer, having since that time been wholly given to Contemplation, and macerated himself in a strict course of Religion, leaving one only Son, Son, Thomas by his Wife Ann Daughters of Gilliland. He had two brothers, Thomas Lord Howard, whom Queen Elizabeth made Baron of Suffolk; and William Lord Howard of the North, who yet liveth; and one Sister, the Lady Margaret married to Robert Sackville, afterward Earl of Dorset, and Father of Edward Earl of Dorset, now living; a Lady so mild, so virtuous, and so devout in her Religion, that if her Brother macerated himself being in prison, she certainly did no less, being at liberty; whom I the rather mention, because I had the happiness to know her living, and the unhappiness to be a Mourner at her Funeral. There died this year also William Lord Vaulx, a zealous Papist, and Sir Thomas Heneage, Vice-Chamberlain, and Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster, whose only Daughter married to Sir Moyle Finch of Kent, was no small advance of that House. There dyed also William Whitaker, Master of St. John's College in Cambridge, and Divinity Professor: As likewise Sir Roger Williams, and Sir Thomas Morgan; so as this year was honoured with the deaths of two great Lords, one exquisite Courtier, one great Scholar, and two famous Soldiers.

In Ireland at this time, Russel the Deputy doubting a storm of War from Tir-Oen, sent into England, requiring to have some experienced Soldiers sent unto him with forces, who though he desired Baskerville to be the man, yet Sir John Norris was sent unto him with thirteen hundred old Soldiers, besides a further supply; whom Tir-Oen hearing to be coming, set presently upon the Fort of Blackwater, and in the absence of Edward Cornwall the Governor took it. But now being doubtful of his case, in a subdalous manner (as he was a double-dealing man) he both offereth his help to the Earl of Kildare, against the Deputy's servants, and at the same time maketh promise to the Earl of Ormond, and Sir Henry Wallop, of Loyalty and Obedience; but notwithstanding he was forthwith proclaimed Traytor, under the name of Hugh O'Neal, bastard Son to Con O'Neal. There was at this time with the Rebels in Ulster a thousand Horse, and 6280 Foot: And in Connaught, two thousand three hundred, all at Tir-Oen's command: And the Forces of the English under Norris, not much fewer, with whom the Deputy himself joyned, and marched together to Armagh; which so terrified the Rebels, that Tir-Oen forsaking the Fort of Blackwater, began to hide himself. Whereupon the Deputy returned, leaving Norris to follow the War, with the Title of General of the Army. But this satisfied not Norris, and therefore out of emulation betwixt him and the Deputy, he performed nothing worth the speaking of, and seemed to favour Tir-Oen as much as the Deputy hated him; insomuch, as he had private Conference with him (a thing not lawful with proclaimed Traytors) and upon his submission, and Hostages given, a Truce was granted both to him and Odonell, till the first of January. When the Truce was expired, Tir-Oen exhibited certain Petitions, protesting if they were granted, he would then perform all duties of a loyal Subject. In consulting about which Petitions, another Truce was concluded, till the first of April: During which Truce, Tir-Oen dealt secretly with the King of Spain, for Aid to be sent him, making nevertheless a fair shew of willingness to obedience, so far, that by the procurement of Norris and Fenton, a pardon was granted him; the which he pretended to receive more joyfully, than the Instrument which conferred the Earldom upon him; yet all this was but dissimulation, to win time for his own ends.

In the midst of these Irish Affairs, Albert, Arch-Duke of Austria and Cardinal, whom the King of Spain had newly set over the Netherlands, mustered together the Spanish Forces, upon pretence of raising the Siege of La Fere in Picardy; but upon a sudden turneth aside, and besieged Calais; and taking Newnham Fort, the very first day became Master of the Haven. The Queen informed hereof, forthwith upon the very Sunday in time of Divine Service, commanded to levy Soldiers, whom she committed to the Earl of Essex; but before they could be shipped, certain news came, that the Town and Fort were taken by the Spaniards; Whereupon the Queen's Army was dismissed, and only some Money lent to the French King.

But a few days after, a far greater and more select Army is raised in England, wherein many of Noble Houses served as Volunteers: For the Queen, to divert the King of Spain from invading her Borders, thought it the best way to invade his: Whereupon a Navy of a hundred and fifty Ships was made ready; where were Soldiers under pay, Six thousand three hundred and threescore; Volunteers of the Nobility and Gentry, One thousand; Mariners, Six thousand seven hundred seventy and two, besides the Dutchmen, who brought two and twenty Ships, Robert Earl of Essex, and Charles Howard Lord Admiral of England, were made Generals with equal Authority; but the Admiral to hold Prerogative at Sea, Essex at Land. To these, for a Council of War, were joyned the Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Francis Vere, George Carew, and Conyers Clifford. The whole Fleet was divided into four Squadrons; The Admiral commanded the first; Essex the second; the Lord Thomas Howard the third, and Rawleigh the fourth. The Officers of the Army were Francis Vere, Serjeant Major General, or Marshall; John Wingfield Quarter Master General; George Carew Master of the Ordnance; Conyers Clifford Serjeant Major. Colonels were Robert Earl of Sussex, Sir Christopher Blount, Sir Thomas Gerrard, Sir Richard Wingfield; William Wingfield was commander of the Volunteers; and Anthony Ashley, Secretary to the Council of War, was to Register their Acts and Consultations. The Commission being drawn, the Queen gave them private Instructions, and withal, a Prayer of her own making, to be daily used in every Ship.

This Fleet set forth from Plimouth at the beginning of June. Nigh unto Cape St. Vincent: they lighted upon an Irish Barque, which told them, that at Cales they were secure, and then in the Haven there were at anchor Gallies, Ships of War, and a great many Merchant Vessels. The 20th of June they cast Anchor on the West side of the Island; within two days they were agreed to set upon the Spanish Ships, whereat the Earl of Essex cast up his Cap for Joy, This business was allotted to the lesser Ships, because the Road was too shallow for the great. The Gallies quickly fled, and creeping along the shore, shifted away, but the Spanish Ships that lay at Anchor at Puntal, turned their broad sides; so as the English fight with them lasted from break of day till noon; at which time the Spaniards having their Gallies miserably torn, and many of their Men slain, resolved to fire the Ships, or run them on shore. The Spanish Admiral being fifteen hundred Tun of Burden, was fired by a Moor, and two other Ships which lay next her took the fire, and were lost likewise. When the Sea-fight was ended, Essex landed Eight hundred Soldiers at Puntal, a league from the Town of Cales, when half a Mile from the Town, the Spanish Horse and Foot shewed themselves, and presently gave back again; but straightway cometh forth a greater number: Then Essex commanded his Forces to make a fair retreat; and having enticed forth their Enemies, they turned upon them with such violence, that they forced them back into the Town: Then the Earl got up to a Bulwark newly raised, near the Gate, where he spied a passage into the Town, but so high from ground, that they must leap a Spears length to get down. Yet Evans the Earl of Sussex his Lieutenant, Arthur Savage and others leaped down; and the mean while Sir Francis Vere broke the Gate, and rushed in; and the rest with him. In the Market Place John Wingfield was shot in the Head, and with stones from the top of Houses divers were wounded; amongst whom Samuel Bagnall received eight Wounds, and Arthur Savage was bloody all over, which two were Knighted in the Place. The next day the Castle was yielded, upon condition, that the Inhabitants might depart with the Clothes on their Backs, the rest to be left for spoil. For five hundred and fourscore thousand Ducats the Castle was to be redeemed; and for the Payment, forty of the chief Citizens to be sent Hostages into England. Now Rawleigh was commanded to fire the Merchants Ships lying at Port-Real, when they promised two Millions of Ducats to redeem them: But this the Admiral would not hear of, saying, He was sent to destroy Ships, not to dismiss them upon composition. A world of Munition was found in the City, and great store of Money privately carried away, every one shifting for himself. It was thought by the wiser sort, that the Spaniards could not be damnified less by this Expedition, than twenty Millions of Ducats. None of Note was slain amongst the English, but only Wingfield, who also slew a Spanish Captain; and now at last, threescore Military Men were honoured with Knight-hood. After this, having spoiled the whole Island, and demolished the Fort, they returned into England, much against the Will of Essex, who would fain have been attempting some other enterprize.

The Queen received them home with much affability, giving many thanks to those of principal Note, but extolling the Earl of Essex and the Admiral above the rest. And now bethinking her self of a fit Man to be Governor of the Bryll, which was given by the States as a Caution Town for Money due she made choice of Sir Francis Vere, although Essex commended others to her for the Place: But another thing he took with great Indignation, that in his absence she had made Sir Robert Cecil Secretary, whereas he had formerly with great instance commended Sir Thomas Bodley to her.

Sir Robert Cecil is made Secretary of State.

And now the King of Spain, to recover his Honour lost at Calais, setteth forth a Navy for England and Ireland, with a great number of Irish Fugitives; but being at Sea, most of his Ships were either run upon Rocks, or cast away in storms, so as this Expedition came to nothing.

But the Queen, at this time, for her better security, entred a League of Defence and Offence with the French King, against the Spaniard, upon certain Conditions: which League she confirmed by Oath, in the Chapel at Greenwich, the nine and twentieth of August, laying her Hand upon the Hand of Henry de la Tour, Duke of Bouillon, and Marshal of France; the Bishop of Chichester holding forth the Evangelists, and a great Company of the Nobility standing round about. In September following, Gilbert Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, was sent on Embassage into France to take the French Kings oath, and to present Sir Antony Mildmay for the Queens Ambassadour in Ordinary in the room of Sir Henry Unton lately there deceased, and to invest the King with the Order of the Garter. Soon after, Baskerville wasted into Picardy with Two thousand Soldiers; for no more were by agreement to be sent this Year.

It was now the year 1596, and the Nine and thirtieth year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when Thomas Arundel of Wardour returned into England, from the War in Hungary against the Turk, whom, for his good service done there, the Emperor by his Letters Patents, had created Earl of the Sacred Empire, and all and singular his Heirs and their posterity, Males or Female, lawfully descended from him, to be Earls and Countesses of the holy Empire for ever. Those who are graced with this Title, have a Place and Voice in the Imperial Diets, may purchase Lands in the Emperor's Dominions, may take up voluntary Soldiers, and are not bound to answer any matter before any Judge, but only in the Chamber of the Empire. At his return, a great question came in agitation, Whether Titles of Honour given to the Queens Subjects without her privy, ought to be accepted by them, or admitted by her. For this new Earl stuck in the stomachs of the English Barons, who inwardly grudged to give him place. The matter was long disputed on both sides, but what issue it had, or whether he were permitted this honour here at home, I find not: Certain it is, That Sir Nicholas Clifford and Sir Anthony Shirley, whom the French King two years since received into the Order of St. Michael, were laid in Prison at their coming home, and charged to resign their Robes of the Order. This Year many great Persons dyed; John Puck-

The Earl of Essex, Sir Walter Raleigh and others are sent to seize the Spanish Fleet, but are distressed by Tempests.

The Queen at this time was told, That the King of Spain was preparing a new Fleet against Ireland; whereupon to encounter him, she also prepared a Navy of a hundred and twenty Ships, seventeen of the Queen's, three and forty lesser Ships of War, the rest for the carriage of Provision. They were parted into three Squadrons: Essex commanded the first, who was also chief Commander in the Expedition, the Lord Thomas Howard the second, and Raleigh the third. In this Fleet were sundry of the Nobility and Gentry; Charles Blount, Lord Mountjoy, Vere, Cavew, Sir Christopher Blount, the Earls of Rutland and Southampton, the Lord Grey, Cromwell Rich, and many others. The 9th of July they weighed Anchor from Plymouth, and were to direct their course to Ferall and the Groyne, to seize upon the Spanish Fleet in the Harbour, and towards the Isles called Azores, and to intercept the Indian Fleet at their return into Spain; but this Expedition was crossed and overthrown by tempests, for they had not sailed forty Leagues from Plymouth, when they were shaken with such a terrible Tempest for four days together, that the Mariners themselves were at their wits end, and the Fleet had much ado to recover Plymouth: The Navy being amended, they hoisted up Sail the second time, but the Wind fell presently again so cross, that for a whole Months time they could not get out of the Haven; returning to Plymouth, the 17th of August they got out of the Haven; and now the third time, with a side-wind hoisted up sail, but before they came in view of Spain, they were dispersed by another horrible Tempest, wherein of the two great Ships which were taken at Cales, one was dashed in pieces, the other wandered no Man knew whither. At the Island Flores the Fleet met again, where Raleigh being distressed for Water went on shore without leave; and ere he had watered, had charge to follow Essex to Fyal: but not finding him there, he observed the Port, and calling a Council, the Commanders wished him to set upon the place, and not let slip so fair a Booty. Upon this Raleigh with some of the prime Volunteers, got to shore, and won the Town, but found no booty in it. The next day Essex came thither, whom Merrick informeth what Raleigh had done, affirming spitefully, that he had done it only to prevent his Lordship in the honour of the exploit: Whereupon some perswaded the Earl to call a Council of War, and then displace him: others again, to take off his head for going to Land without the Chief Commanders leave: saying, He was never like to have such another opportunity to be rid of his Adversary; upon this Sidney, Brett, Berry, and others of Raleigh's Company were displaced, and laid by the heels; Raleigh himself was sent for, and entertained with a grim look by Essex and all his party; Essex rebuked him angrily for landing his forces, which none upon pain of Death might do, without the Generals Command; Raleigh made answer, that the Captains indeed, Shipmasters, and the rest were within the compass of that Law; but not the three prime Commanders, of whom himself was One: That he had a long time waited his coming, and longer would have waited, but that the Islanders provoked him to fight. And now the Lord Thomas Howard mediated, that no severity might be used against Raleigh, and perswaded him to acknowledge his fault; which being done, all were friends, and the displaced Captains were restored to their places, for the Earl was of a placable disposition; easily apt to take offence, and as easily to remit it.

From hence they sail to Gratiosa, where the Inhabitants craved mercy, and obtained it; and here Essex would have tarried, in expectation of the Indian Fleet, but that Graves the Pilot dissuaded, because the Harbour was not good. And now see the unluckiness of ill counsel, for the English were not gone above an hour or two from this place, when lo, the American Fleet (wherein were forty Ships, and seven of them laden with treasure) cometh thither, which hearing that the English were thereabouts, directed their course to Tercera, where they gained the Haven, all but three Ships, indifferent wealthy; which the English took, and then were minded to set upon the rest in the Port; but finding the attempt not feasible, they passed from thence to St. Michaels; where Southampton, Rutland, Evers, Bredon and Dockwray were knighted. And then Essex landed within six Miles of the Town, nigh unto Villa Franca, a fair Town and well furnished with Merchandize, Wine, Wood, and Corn; where they tarried six days, and the common Soldiers found good Booty. And now a Caraque was espied, coming out of the East-Indies, which, by a warning piece shot off in a Dutch Ship, perceiving that the English were there, run her self ashore, unloaded her Merchandize, and then fired her self. Thus the English had ill luck every where in this Expedition: And the 9th of October they hoisted sail for England; but within two days, a terrible tempest from the Northward dispersed them; and the Spanish Fleet also at the same time, so as they never came in view of one another: one Spanish Ship was cast upon Dartmouth, the Mariners and Soldiers half starved in her; who intimated, that the Spanish Fleet intended to seize upon some Haven in Cornwall, which being nigh the mouth of the Channel, might be convenient to receive Forces from Spain

The Earl of Essex is made Earl Marshal, of purpose to take place of the Admiral.

The sawcy speech of a Polish Ambassador to the Queen, and her Answer.

Baskerville and Sir Arthur Savage's Service in recovering of Amiens.

Spain; but the Divine Providence frustrated the designs both of the Spaniards and the English.

But now at his return, the Earl of Essex found that done in England, in his absence, which infinitely discontented him; Sir Robert Cecil made Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster; and which was more, Charles Lord Howard, created Earl of Nottingham, with relation in his Patent to the Victory in Eighty eight, and his good service at Calles: This glory he envied him, and besides stomached it, that he must now take place of him: It being enacted in the Reign of Henry the Eighth, That the chief Officers of the Kingdom should have Precedence of all Men of their degree. Whereupon the Queen, to give him content, was fain to create him Earl Marshal of England, by which he recovered his place again.

About this time, an Ambassadour came into England, from the King of Poland; who, when the Queen expected he should give her thanks for having procured a peace between the King his Master, and the Turk, he clean contrary expostulated unkindness, for breach of Privileges in trading with Spain, requiring a present remedy, or else the King would otherwise right himself. The Queen not a little offended, suddenly replied; How was I deceived? I expected an Ambassador, and behold an Herald; such a speech I never heard of in my life-time. And after some further checking of him for his boldness, she referred him to her Council; and then retired into her Closet. The Ambassador afterward in private Conference with some of the Council, excused himself, saying, That his Speech was penned by others, and then given him in Writing. To this Message, the Council gave the like Answer as they had given before to the Hans-Towns, upon the like occasion: Though now again, the Hans-Towns obtain of the Emperour, to prohibit the English from trading in Germany, which made the Queen to prohibit the Hans-Towns from trading in England; and put them out of the Steel-yard till this difference was accorded.

This year the Chancellor of Denmark came into England to restore the Garter, which she had bestowed upon the Kings Father, and withal offering the King's help to make Peace for the Queen with the Spaniard. The Queen thanked him, but meant not to use his help for that which she did not desire, and especially not now, when he had newly molested the King of France her Ally, and had taken Amiens the strongest Town in Picardy: Though why should the Queen be so tender of the French King, when now to get an Aid of four thousand Soldiers from her, he fell to devices; intimating unto her, That he was now offered by the Pope's Nuncio a very commodious Peace, if he would but forsake her. But while these things were in Treaty, Amiens was recovered again by the valour of Baskerville, (who died at the Siege) and of Sir Arthur Savage, as the King in his Letters to the Queen thankfully acknowledged.

About this time a Parliament was holden at Westminster, where Subsidies were willingly granted; and to this Parliament was called the Lord dela Ware, and restored to his Blood, which by Act of Parliament in the reign of King Edward the Sixth was tainted. Also to this Parliament was called Thomas Lord Howard, by the Title of Baron Howard of Walden.

In Ireland at this time, a great part of Ulster, and almost all Connaught, was in Rebellion; whereupon Russel the Deputy was called home, and Thomas Lord Burroughs sent in his place, a Man very stout and courageous, but no Soldier. This infinitely discontented Norris, who thought himself sure of the place, and now to see his Rival preferred before him, and himself to be under him, President of Munster drave him into such a melancholy, that in a very short time (and as he thought to himself with much disgrace) he ended his life.

And now the Earl Tir-Oen craveth and obtaineth a months Truce of the new Deputy; at the months end the Deputy marched against the Rebels, and gaineth the Fort at Black-water, when suddenly the Rebels shew themselves upon a hill hard by, against whom the Earl of Kildare marches and puts them to flight; but yet with some loss of his own side, as Francis Vaughan the Deputies Brother in Law, Turner a Serjeant Major, and two Foster-Brothers of the Earl of Kildare, whose death he took so heavily, that within a few days he died himself.

As soon as the Deputy had fortified the Castle at Black-water, and withdrawn his Army, the Rebels began to besiege it again, (for this was the main place of their strength) which caused the Deputy with all possible speed to make thither, but unhappily died by the way. Whereupon the Rebels set upon the Fort more fiercely than before; but being still repelled, they comforted themselves with this, that there was not many days provision left in the Fort; yet the admirable fortitude of Thomas Williams the Captain and the Garison Soldiers saved the place, who, when their Horse-flesh was all spent, fed upon weeds growing within the Trenches, and endured all kind of misery. And now the Lord Burroughs the Deputy being dead, the Army, by direction from England, was committed to the Earl of Ormond, and the Government to two Lords Justices, Adam Loft-house Archbishop of Dublin and Chancellor, and Robert Gardiner: to this new Lieutenant, Tir-Oen exhibited a Bill of his oppressions and grievances with request of pardon, and at the same time stirreth up Mac Hugh to a new Rebellion in Lemster.

In France at this time, the French King being importuned by the Pope, and by his own Subjects, began to incline to a Peace with Spain; which the Queen understanding, she sent into France Sir Robert Cecil, Herbert and Wilks, (who died at his landing in France.) The States likewise sent thither Justine of Nassaw and Barneveldt, and others likewise into England to dissuade the Peace, but notwithstanding all they could say or do, the French King shortly after concluded a Peace, to the great discontentment of the Queen and the States; but to the great good, and establishment of the French Commonwealth.

And now the Queen providing for her own and her Peoples Safety, sent Sir Francis Vere to the States, to know if they were willing to join in a Treaty of Peace with the Spaniards: if not, what what they would afford towards a War; and to deal earnestly with them about repayment of Money due to her from them. At home in the mean time was holden a great Consultation, Whether a Peace with Spain were convenient for England, or no? and many Reasons were on both sides alledg'd. Burleigh Lord Treasurer was for Peace, Essex for War, and so vehement in it, that the Treasurer, after long debating, in a strange manner of presage, reach'd forth the Book of the Psalms to him, pointing him to that Verse, The bloody-minded Man shall not live out half his Days: Which made Essex afterward set forth an Apology, with Reasons for justification of his Opinion.

The Queen gives the Earl a box on the Ear, and why and how he took it.

But now another Consultation was held about a fit Man to be Deputy of Ireland; The Queen intended to send Sir William Knolles, Essex's Uncle; but Essex was violent for Sir George Carew, whom he had a mind to remove from the Court; and when he could not by any means persuade the Queen to it, he then, forgetting himself and his duty, uncivilly and contemptuously turn'd his back upon the Queen, muttering certain Words. Whereupon she growing impatient, gave him a box on the Ear, and bid him be gone with a vengeance: Essex laid his Hand upon his Sword hilt, and swore a great Oath, That he could not, nor would not put up such an Indignity; and that he would not have taken it at King Henry the Eighth's hands; and so in rage flung away from the Court. But afterward, admonish'd by the Lord Keeper, he became more mild; and in a short time return'd into the Queen's favour.

The Lord Burleigh Lord Treasurer dies.

About this time William Cecil Lord Burleigh, and High Treasurer of England, finding himself to droop with Age, (for he was now threescore and seventeen Years old) sent Letters to the Queen, entreating her to release him of his publick Charge; whereupon she went to visit and comfort him; but within a few Days he ended his Life, after he had been the principal stay of the English Common-wealth for many Years together. One great good he did to his Country a little before his death, that he brought the States of the Low-Countries to a Composition for the payment of Eight hundred thousand Pounds, by thirty thousand Pounds yearly; likewise a new League to be concluded with them.

The King of Denmark's Subjects having lately seiz'd upon some Goods of the English as Prize, to the value of a hundred thousand Dollars; the Queen sent the Lord Zouch, and Christopher Perkins Doctor of Law, in Embassyage to the Dane, both to congratulate his late marriage with the Elector's Daughter of Brandenburg, and also to crave restitution of the English Goods; who obtain'd, that in lieu thereof threescore thousand Dollars were repaid. And now George Clifford Earl of Cumberland, having with a Navy of eleven Ships waited for Portugal Caragues and the American Fleet, till the Season of the Year was past (they not daring to stir forth) he at last set upon Porto-Rico, and took it; but seven hundred of his Men falling sick of Calentures, and dying within forty Days, he was fain to return home with some Honour, but little profit.

The Earl of Cumberland takes Porto-Rico.

About this time, one Edward Squire was arraign'd of High Treason; he had been at first an ordinary Scrivener, afterwards a Groom in the Queen's Stable, and going as a Soldier in Drake's last expedition, was taken prisoner and carried into Spain; there he came acquainted with one Wallpole an English Jesuite, who caused him to be put into the Inquisition for an Heretick, and the Fellow tasting of Misery, was easily drawn to become a Papist, and afterward to attempt any thing for the Catholick Cause. His ghostly Father perswaded him it were meritorious to make away the Queen and the Earl of Essex, and sent him into England with a certain Poyson, wherewith to anoint the Pomel of the Queen's Saddle, and the Chair in which the Earl should sit, which he accordingly perform'd, but neither of them took effect, whereupon Wallpole suspecting Squire's Fidelity, was bent to revenge it, and sent one into England, who in general terms should lay this aspersion upon him; whereupon Squire is call'd in question, and never thinking that his Confessor would detect him, directly denied all at first, but after being himself betray'd, confess'd all the matter, and was executed.

Edward Squire executed, and why

This whole Year the Rebellion was hot in Ireland; for Tir-Oen, notwithstanding his pardon lately obtain'd, all on a sudden besieg'd the Fort at Black-water, to the raising of which Siege the Lieutenant General (for there was as yet no Deputy) sent thirteen Companies under the command of the Marshal, Tir-Oen's sworn Adversary, him Tir-Oen slew, and put his whole Army to rout, and achiev'd such a Victory, with so great loss to the English, as they had never felt the like since they first set footing in Ireland; for thirteen valiant Commanders, and fifteen hundred common Soldiers were slain at this skirmish, and soon after the Fort of Black-water was yielded up. And now Tir-Oen's Fame began to resound as the Assertor of the Liberty of the Nation, and upon a sudden all Munster break forth into Rebellion: For the cherishing whereof Tir-Oen sent thither Ouny Mac-Rorye and Terrell (who originally an English-man, was grown a deadly Enemy to the English Nation) with four hundred Kerns. Against these Thomas Norris, President of the Province, march'd to Killmallock with a good force; but finding that the Irish Soldiers of his Company were ready to revolt, he was fain to disperse his Army, and retire to Cork. Hereupon the Rebels grew insolent, spoiled the Country, and in cruel manner put all the English to the Sword. Furthermore they declare Fitz-Thomas to be the Earl of Desmond; but upon condition he should hold of O-Neal; that is, of Tir-Oen, who now dispatch'd Letters to the Spaniard, relating his Victories to the full, and vowing to accept no terms of Peace with the English; and yet at the same instant (after his wonted treacherous manner) proffer'd some kind of submission to the Lieutenant, but withal made unreasonable demands.

Tir-Oen breaks openly into Rebellion, and gives the English a great defeat.

Yet at the same time makes some offer of Submission.

The State of Ireland being thus in combustion a serious Consultation is holden whom to send to quench it: The Qu. and most of the Council thought Sir Charles Blount Lord Mounjoy the fittest Man; but Essex covertly intimated, that he had no military experience, and besides was too bookish to prove a good Commander: He seem'd to aim at the place for himself, tho' he made a shew modestly to refuse it, and yet still ready with with his exceptions if any other were nominated: Many thought it dangerous to have an Army put into his Hands, for his Followers talked of great matters, that he (forsooth) was descended of the Blood Royal of Scotland and England, and had better right to the Crown than any other of the Competitors. In conclusion, he is appointed Vice-Roy, with ample Authority to make War, or conclude Peace, and pardon all Offenders, even Tir-Oen himself. An Army is allotted him as great as he desir'd; indeed greater than ever Ireland had seen before, twenty thousand Foot, and thirteen hundred Horse: With these, and a great Retinue besides of the Nobility, he passeth into Ireland; where as soon as he had taken the Sword, contrary to his Commission (which was to go immediately against the Arch-rebel) he march'd towards Munster against the petty Rebels, taketh the Castle of Cahir, and driveth the Rebels into the Woods and Groves adjoining. His Forces being now impair'd, he tarrieth to make them up, but in the mean time sendeth Directions to Sir Conyers Clifford, President of Connaught, to set upon the Rebels in one place, (thereby to sever their Forces) while he assaulted them in another: Clifford march'd towards Belike, 1500 Soldiers, where the Rebels are upon them at unawares, under the Conduct of O-Rork, (his Son that was hang'd here in England.) The English repel them at first with ease, and march along, but the Rebels finding they wanted Powder, set upon them again, and put them to flight; in which skirmish Clifford and many of the old Soldiers were slain.

Essex having by this receiv'd new Supplies out of England, and a check for neglecting the Queen's Command, setteth forth at length towards the Borders of Ulster with 1300 Foot, and 500 Horse; being come thither, Tir-Oen by a Messenger requested parley; Essex refuseth, saying, He might speak with him the next Morning between the two Armies: The next Day word is brought to Essex, that Tir-Oen crav'd the Queen's mercy, and that he might only be heard to speak, appointing the shallow of Bala Clinch for a most convenient place; thither came Essex alone, with whom Tir-Oen (riding his Horse up to the Girts) had private conference a full Hour. A while after, Con (Tir-Oen's base Son) came to Essex, requesting in his Father's Name a second parley, and that some of the chief on both sides might be present; Essex consented, so there came not more than six. At the Day appointed, many Words had not passed, but it was agreed, that their Delegates should treat the next Day concerning a Peace: Between them it was concluded, that a Truce should be held from six Weeks to six Weeks, till May-day.

concluded.

The Queen
writes to Essex, blaming
his delay.

By this time, the Queen understanding that no more was done, after so much Time and Money spent, in a great anger taxeth the Earl's proceedings, and I know not how, it fell from her to some others that stood by, that he had other thoughts in his Mind, than the good of his Prince and Country: And thereupon dispatch'd very sharp Letters to him, blaming his delay, and letting slip every fair opportunity: With which Letters Essex was so nettled, and chiefly troubled that the Queen had now made Cecil Master of the Wards, which he expected himself, that he began to cast strange projects within his Mind, and held private Consultations of returning into England with part of his Forces, to surprize his Adversaries: But from this course the Earl of Southampton and Sir Christopher Blount dissuaded him, as being dangerous and wicked. Yet within a Month over he went, and came to the Court at None such to inform the Queen of the State of Ireland. By the Way the Lord Gray of Wilton cross'd him, but saluted him not; whom one of his followers offer'd to kill for his Contempt; but Essex would not suffer him; and made such haste, that early in the Morning he was upon his Knees before the Queen in the Privy-Chamber. She entertain'd him courteously, but not with the Countenance she was wont: And after a little talk, bid him keep in his Chamber; and soon after committed him to Custody in the Lord Privy Seal's House; where entering into consideration of his Case, he giveth himself wholly to Divine Contemplation, and writeth wonderful Letters to his Friends, of the Vanity of the Things of this Life.

It was now the Year 1600, and the 42 of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, when after the departure of the Earl of Essex, Tir-Oen began to carry himself as Monarch of Ireland, and sendeth Kernes to make spoil in the Possessions of such as continu'd in their loyalty to the Queen, under Mac-Guir their Captain, who lighting casually upon Sir Warham Saint-Leger, thrust him through with a Spear, and was himself thrust through withal. Whereupon the Queen sent Sir Charles Blount Lord Mountjoy, to take upon him the Deputy's place, who loseth no time, but first of all march'd towards Ulster, buildeth a Fort within eight Miles of Armagh, which in honour of Sir John Norris, under whom he had his first military schooling, he call'd by the Name of Mount Norris; where he placed Edward Blaine, who kept the Rebels in awe in those Parts: From thence back he goeth into Leinster, where in the Glynnes he reduceth into order Donel-Spaniah, Phelim Mac-Pheoph, and the rebelling Nation of the O-Tooles, taking Hostages of them; then back into Ulster again, being Victor wheresoever he cometh, and at Tredah receiveth into protection Mac-Henry, Mac-Cowly, and other Rebels who fell at his Feet for mercy. All this and more he did in his first Year, and no less successful was Carew President of Munster, who drove out of the County the Titular Earl of Desmond; and having found Munster a turbulent Province, in April he overcame it, and made it so quiet by December following, that the Rebels maintain'd no one Fort in it against the Queen.

And now a new Consultation was holden in England touching a Peace with the K. of Spain, the which he fought both by the French King and by Albertus the Arch-Duke, who was now returned into the Netherlands out of Spain, where he was married to the Infanta. The Queen consenting to a Treaty, left it to the French K. to nominate both the Time and Place for the meeting of the Delegates, who set down the Month of May, and Buloign in France: But now foreseeing that a Question would arise about Precedency, some were appointed to search ancient Records concerning that point. These Men found in the Book of the Ceremonies of the Court

The English Commissioners have a charge not to give Precedence to Spain; and why.

Court of Rome, which (according to the Canons) giveth Rule to the rest, as the Lady and Mistresses, that amongst Kings the first place is due to the Kings of France, the second to the Kings of England, and the third to the King of Castile; That the English quietly held this privilege in the General Councils of Basil, Constance, and others: Besides the Kingdom of Castile, (which is the Spaniards first Title, and which is but an upstart in regard of England) had Earls, but no Kings till the Year 1017. In like manner Pope Julius the Third gave Sentence for Henry the Seventh of England, against Ferdinand, who was then King of Castile.

At the Day appointed, the Delegates met at Bulloign, Sir Henry Nevill, Leiger Ambassador, Sir John Herbert, Robert Beal, and Thomas Edmunds for the English, and other for the K. of Spain and the Archduke. The English had Instructions, first, concerning Precedency, in no case to give way to the King of Spain; yet if they contended, to put the Matter to the decision of Lots, rather than the Treaty should be dissolv'd; and for the rest, to purpose and mention the reviewing of the ancient Burgundian League, freedom of Commerce, &c.

At the meeting, when they had severally shewed their Commissions, the English challenge the Precedency, the Spaniards do the like, and in so peremptory a manner, that without it they would dissolve the Treaty. Hereupon the English made a proposition to let pass the Question of Precedency; and to transact the business by writing, and Messengers between them: Or that the Treaty might be intermitted only for three-secre Days, not quite broken off; but all was to no purpose; and at three Months end they parted.

The famous Battel of Newport won by the Valour of the English.

The States the mean while were so far from regarding a Peace, that at this time they thought upon reducing the Sea-coast of Flanders into their Command; and thereupon they landed an Army there of fourteen thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse, under the conduct of Maurice of Nassau; and fifteen hundred of the English under the command of Sir Francis Vere, and his Brother Horatio. At which time happen'd the famous Battel of Newport against the Archduke, where nine thousand of the Spaniards were slain; and the Victory, by the Valour of the English, fell to the Dutch; for so forward were the English in this Battel, that of their fifteen hundred, eight hundred were slain and fore wounded, eight Captains kill'd, and of the rest every Man hurt.

The Company of East-India Merchants founded by the Queen.

All this Year and the Year past sundry quarrels and complaints arose between the English and French, touching reprisals of Goods taken from each other by Parties of either Nation. Also touching Customs and Impositions, contrary to the Treaty of Blois, and deceit in English Cloths, to the great Infamy of the Nation. In Denmark likewise arose controversies touching Commerce, and the Fishing of the English upon the Coast of Island and Norway. The Queen also at that time, for the encrease of Navigation and Commerce, founded the Company of the East-India Merchants, allowing them large Privileges: But whether this hath prov'd beneficial to the Common-wealth (there having been by this means such a mass of Money and great store of other Commodities carried out of the Kingdom, and so many Mariners lost every Year, wise Men make a Question.

About this time also Pope Clement the Eighth, perceiving the Queen to be in her declining age, sent two Breves into England, the one to the Popish Clergy, the other to the Laity, to suffer no Person whatsoever to take the Kingdom upon him after the Queen's death, but one that should promise by Oath, to promote with all his might the Roman Catholick Religion, how near soever otherwise he were ally'd to the Blood Royal of the King of England.

This Year by reason of intemperate Weather, happen'd a great scarcity of Corn in England, and thereby many grievous Complaints were occasion'd. The common People cast out reproachful Slanders against the Lord Treasurer Buckhurst, as the Granter of Licenses for transportation of Corn; but he apply'd to the Queen, she forthwith defended his Innocency, and made it known by open Proclamation, imputed the Fault upon Broggers of Corn, and Forestallers of Markets, and gave order that the Slanderers should be apprehended and punish'd.

The Earl of Essex, who had now been Prisoner six Months in the House of the Lord Privy Seal, he then began to repent in good earnest, resolving to put away his perverse Counsellors Gilley, Merrick and Henry Cusse, and then he shew'd so much patience and great submission, that the Queen then sent him to his own House, and to be there confin'd, always protesting that she would do nothing that should be for his Ruin, but only that which should be for his Amendment. Nevertheless, when as the common People extoll'd his Innocency, she could not for the removal of suspicion of Injustice, free her self and her Councillors, but bring him to tryal; not in the Star-Chamber, lest the Censure should fall too heavy on him, but in the House of the Lord Privy Seal, where the Cause should have a plain hearing before the Lords of the Council, four Earls, two Barons, and four Judges of the Realm. The Objections were, That contrary to his Commission he had made the Earl of Southampton General of the Horse, had drawn his Forces into Munster, neglecting the Arch-rebel Tir-Oen; entertain'd a Parley with him against the Dignity of the Queen's Majesty, and the Person of a Viceroy, which he represented: And, that the said Parley was suspicious, in regard it was private. Some Aggravations the Lawyers added from abrupt Sentences in his Letter to the Lord Privy Seal, written two Years since; as these, No Storm is more fierce than the Indignation of an impotent Prince. What! cannot Princes err? May they not injure their Subjects? and such like.

He falling upon his Knee at the End of the Board, profess'd he would not contend with the Queen, nor excuse the Faults of his young Years either in whole or in part; protesting that he always meant well, however it fell out otherwise, and that now he would bid the World farewell; withal shedding many Tears, so as the standers-by wept also. Yet could he not contain himself, but began to plead Excuses, till the Lord Privy Seal interrupted him, advising him to proceed

At length, in the Name of the rest, he pronounceth this Sentence against him; That he should be deposed from the Office of a Privy Councillor, suspended from the Functions of the Earl Marshal and Master of the Ordnance, and be imprison'd during the Queen's pleasure. She had given express charge, not to suspend him from the Office of Master of the Horse (minding shortly to take him into favour) and that his Censure in no case should be Recorded. After this he made shew of wonderful humility and mortification, which so affected the Queen, that shortly she remov'd Barkeley his Keeper, and gave him leave to go at large, only admonishing him, to make his own Discretion his Keeper, and not to come at the Court, or in her Presence.

After this Sentence, Cuffe, who always perswaded the Earl to stand stoutly in his own defence, began so plainly to tax him of Cowardise and Pusillanimity, that the Earl in anger commanded his Name to be put out of the Roll of his Servants; yet Merrick the Steward did it not, as being of Cuffe's mind himself.

Essex being now ready to go into the Country, remember'd himself to the Queen by the Lord Henry Howard, in these Words; That he kiss'd the Rod, and the Queen's Hands, which had only corrected, not overthrow him; yet he should never enjoy solid comfort, till he might see those blessed Eyes which had been his load-stars, whereby he had steer'd his course, while he held on his way at lawful distance: But now he resolv'd to eat Grass with Nebuchadnezzar, till it pleas'd the Queen to restore his Senses. She being greatly joy'd with these his Speeches; Would to God (said she) his Deeds be answerable to his Words: He hath long try'd my Patience, I must now make tryal of his Humility.

And now the Earl grew so confident of the Queen's Favour, that he became a Suitor to her for the Farm of sweet Wines; but she, to try his Temper, and with what Mind he would bear a Repulse, made him answer, That she must first know what it was worth, and not give away things hand over head; and had often times in her Mouth the Aphorism of Physicians, That foul Bodies, the more you nourish them, the more you corrupt them. And indeed, this was the right way to find whether the Ulcer of his Mind were thoroughly cured or no; for being not thoroughly cur'd, it would endure no touching; and no more did his, but as tho' every denial of a Courtesie were an Injury that requir'd Revenge, his Melancholy was presently turn'd into Choler: Now he began to hearken to Cuffe again, telling him, That it was now plain the Queen determin'd to make him as poor as Job; that he should live of the Basket, and gather Crumbs under the Table. Hereupon he return'd to London. Southampton is sent for out of the Low-Countries, his Doors are set open for all Comers: Merrick, his Steward, receiveth to his own Table decay'd Soldiers, discontented and audacious Persons; Sermons are made there every Day by Puritan Ministers, to which the Citizens flock, and all signs of Popularity appear'd; which matters coming to the Queen's Ears, alienated her Affection from him daily more and more; but especially she was exasperated, that her Person was despis'd by him; for (not to say the worst) he had murmur'd, That the Queen was now old, and decrepit and wither'd as well in Mind as Body.

And now again he runneth upon desperate counsels for the removal of his Adversaries from the Court, seeketh to screw himself into the K. of Scot's favour, to whom he traduceth his Adversaries, by name Raleigh, Cobham, Carew, Cecil, and the Admiral, as inclin'd to the Spanish Faction, and at one and the same time seeketh to win to him both Puritans and Papists. Many were of his Party, but few of his Counsel; and these were the Earls of Southampton, Sir Charles Davers, Sir Ferdinando Gorges Captain of the Garrison of Plymouth, Sir Christopher Blount, and some others. With these he met privately in Drury-House to avoid suspicion, where he first giveth them a Catalogue of the Nobility and Gentry that favour'd him, to the number of a hundred and twenty. Then they consult, Whether it were better to set upon the Tower of London, or the Queen's Palace; this latter they resolve upon, which should be done in this manner; Blount should keep the great Gate with a select number of Men, and Davers seize upon the Presence Chamber: Then Essex with his Company should come from the Mews, and present himself before the Queen. But now suspicions arising from divers circumstances, Secretary Herbert was sent to call him before the Council, at the Treasurer's House; but he doubting the matter, excuseth himself that he was not very well. And now the Plot of seizing upon the Court, which had been four Months in contriving, was by this means quite dash'd, for they had ready at the present neither Soldiers nor Ammunition, so as some speedier course must now be thought on: At which time very opportunely cometh one to them (set on no doubt by Essex's Adversaries) as if he had been sent on purpose from the Citizens to promise him their Aid: which made Essex to applaud his own great good Fortune.

And now were four of the Lords, namely, the Lord Keeper, the Earl of Worcester, Sir William Knolls and the Lord Chief Justice of England, sent by the Queen to Essex's House, who could hardly be suffer'd to come in, all their Attendants were kept out, save he that carried the Seal before the Keeper. In the Court they found a confus'd number of People, and the Earls of Essex, Rutland and Southampton in the midst of them. The Keeper turning himself to Essex, told him, The Queen had sent him and the rest to understand the cause of this concourse, promising Justice if any Person had done them wrong. Essex with a loud voice cry'd out, They lie in wait for my Life, we are met to defend ourselves. The Keeper urging Essex again to unfold some part of his grievance; the unruly Multitude cryeth out, Away, let us be gone, they come to betray you, kill them, cast away that Great Seal. Essex retireth into the house, the Lords follow him; he chargeth them to make the doors fast, and turning him to the Lords, Have patience for a while (saith he) I must go into the City to dispatch a little business with the Mayor and Sheriffs, I will return presently.

Who were his chief adherents and Counsellors.

They resolve to set upon the Queen's Palace, and in what manner.

But are prevented.

The Lord Keeper and three other of the Privy Council, sent to Essex's House, to know the cause of this concourse. And his Answer.

But presently giving charge to keep the Lords, he goes into the City.

There the Lords are kept prisoners; Essex maketh haste into the City, with a Troop of 200 men at his heels; the Earl of Bedford, the Lord Cromwell, and other Lords meeting him by the way joyn themselves: coming into London, he cryeth out aloud, For the Queen, for the Queen, they lay wait for my life. The Citizens came running to gaze, but not so much as one person took Arms to take his part. Passing along the City, he came all in a sweat to the Sheriff Smith's house, who shifteth himself forth at a Back-door; and goeth to the Lord Mayor. By this time certain of the Nobility entred the City with a Herald, declaring Essex and his adherents Traytors. Hereupon, hearing also that the Lord Admiral made towards him with an Army, he began to be disheartned; Gorge taketh care for himself, requesteth he might be sent to release the Counsellors, and with them to crave the Queens mercy, while the issue was yet doubtful. The Earl was content that Popham only should be freed; but he refused, unless the Keeper also might be dismissed. Then Gorge freeth them all, and goeth along with them to the Court by Water.

He comes to Sheriff Smith's house, looking for aid, but Smith was gone. Essex is proclaimed a Traytor.

Gorge goeth and letteth all the Lords at liberty.

Essex returning and finding the Counsellors all dismissed, grows much dismayed.

At ten a clock at night Essex yields himself to the Lord Admiral.

He is sent to the Tower together with the Earl of Southampton and other Lords.

Essex and Southampton are arraign'd.

Now when Essex thought to remain, he found a Chain fastned cross the street, at the West end of Paul's, and Men in Arms on the other side: then he began to draw his Sword, and having once given the word, Blount letteth fly at them, slew one of them incontinent, himself being sorely wounded and taken. Essex himself had his Hat shot through; whereupon retiring, he took Boat at Queen-Hytbe, and went to Essex House; where, finding the Counsellors all dismissed, he grew extream angry and dismayed, and cast certain papers into the fire, saying, They should tell no tales. By and by the Admiral besiegeth the House, commanderh them to yield. Southampton offereth, if the Admiral would give Hostages to secure them, they would present themselves to the Queen. The Admiral answereth him by Sidney, That Rebels are not to proffer conditions. Within an hour, Essex finding the case desperate, resolveth to rush forth; and the Lord Sands (the most aged in the Company) greatly urged it, saying, it were better to die valiantly than by the hands of a Hang-man. But Essex's mind upon a little deliberation altering, they fell upon their knees, and deliver their Weapons to the Admiral, when it was ten a clock at night, Owen Salisbury, and one or two more, were slain with Musket shot, and as many of the Besiegers. The next day Thomas Lea, Commander of a Company of Soldiers in Ireland, who to one Crosse a Sea-Captain (that detected him) intimated, how noble an exploit it were, for six stout Fellows to go to the Queen, and compel her forcibly to release Essex and Southampton, was presently apprehended, examined, found guilty, and executed. Essex and Southampton were carried first to Lambeth, to the Archbishop's house, because it was a dark night; but anon were sent to the Tower, by the Queen's direction; and with them Rutland, Sands, Cromwell, Mounteagle, Darvers, and Bromley, the rest were put in common Prisons.

On the 19th of February, Essex and Southampton were called to their Arraignment before their Peers in Westminster-Hall, where Buckhurst Lord Treasurer, was appointed Lord High Steward of England for that time. The Peers being severally called by their names, Essex demanded if it were not lawful for them to except against some of the Peers, as private persons might do against the Jurors. The Judges made answer, That the credit and fidelity of the Peers of England was presumed to be such, That in Tryals they were not bound to take an Oath, nor are they liable to any exception. Then were they joyntly indicted of High Treason; namely, that they plotted to deprive the Queen of her life and Kingdom, To surprize her in her very Palace; and that they brake forth into open Rebellion, by imprisoning the Councillors of the Kingdom; by exciting the Londoners to Rebellion with vain fictions; by assaulting the Queens loyal Subjects in the City; and by defending of Essex House against the Queen's Forces. Hereunto they pleaded, Not guilty: Essex withal averring, That they had done nothing but of necessity, and the Law of Nature. Telverton aggravated the specialties; and Edward Coke Attorney argueth, That the Earl could not excuse himself from the Law of Nature, seeing Majesty is not to be affronted for private Revenge. The Earl of Essex with great confidence made answer, That to his Prince and Country he always had and would bear a loyal affection. Then Francis Bacon (one that was little expected to speak against Essex, by whom he had been raised) in defence of Cobham, Cecil, and Raleigh, aggravateth his crying out, That the Crown of England was sold to the Spaniard: whereto Essex replied, That he heard indeed, that Cecil the Secretary, should say to one of the Lords of the Council, That the right of the Infanta of Spain to the Kingdom of England, was as good as any of the Competitors. Upon this Cecil (who stood by as an Auditor) steppeth in, and falling upon his knees, beseecheth the Steward, that with his good leave, he might quit himself from this foul aspersion; which leave being granted him, he provoked Essex, if he durst, to name the Councillor; but he would not: therefore (saith Cecil) it is a Fiction; still Essex averreth it. Then Cecil turning himself to Southampton, besought him by all manner of Obtestations to name the man. He referreth it to the Honourable assembly, and to Cecil himself, if in Honour and good Reason he ought to do it: they affirming, He might, Southampton named Sir William Knolls, Essex's Uncle. He being sent for, at Cecil's entreaty, said, That Cecil two years since told him, that one Dolman in a Book, had asserted the Right of the Infanta; and had spoken no otherwise than so.

Now after the Judges had delivered their opinion what was Law in the matters alledged, the Earls, by the Stewards direction, were taken aside: Then the Peers rose, and went apart, and having consulted about an hour, returned to their seats, and in their order, pronounced the Earls guilty of High-Treason. Then the high Steward advising Essex to implore the Queen's mercy, giveth Sentence, and that done, brake his Staff, and departed.

The next day, Sir Robert Vernon, Sir William Constable, Sir Edward Baynham, Littleton, Cuff, Captain Whitlock, John and Christopher Wright, and Orel an old Soldier, were called to their Tryal; but the Queen (informed by Sir Fulk Gre- Grevil, That most of them were drawn unwittingly into the danger) commanded that only Littleton, Baynham, and Orell should have their Tryal, the rest to be sent back to prison. These were all condemned, but their lives spared, which favour Raleigh (for a good sum of Money received of Baynham) procured.

Essex in the mean while, requested he might speak with some of the Counsellors, to whom he reconcilled himself, and to Cecil specially; and then intimating that the Queen could not be in safety while he lived, he requested he might be executed privately in the Tower: He grievously inveigheth against some of the Conspiracy; and wisheth to speak with some of them, but especially with Blount and Cuffe; whom as soon as he saw, he brake forth in these words; O Cuff, ask pardon of God, and the Queen, for thou hast chiefly provoked me to this disloyalty. Also he intimated Sir Henry Nevill, ordinary Ambassador in France, to have been acquainted with the Conspiracy; and that others in Scotland, France, the Netherlands, and the Lord Mountjoy, Deputy of Ireland knew of his purpose, and others in England; who being many in number, and the Lord Mountjoy ordering the Affairs of Ireland in good fashion, the Queen wisely would take no notice of it.

The 25th day of February, which was to be the fatal day, there were sent to the Earl divers Ministers, to give him ghostly comfort. The Queen now wavering in her self, one while remembering the ancient kindness she had shewed him, she commanded he should not be executed; then again, thinking of his stubbornness, that he would not once ask her mercy, and had said openly, That he could not live, but she must perish; countermanding her former word, she gave order that he should be executed.

He is executed in the Tower.

Then was he brought forth into the Yard, where a Scaffold was erected, and sundry of the Nobility present, among whom Raleigh also; but being told, it was an unhumane thing to stand by and behold the death of his Adversary, he withdrew himself into the Armory, and from thence beheld the Tragedy. Essex being ascended the Scaffold, uncovered his head, cast up his eyes towards Heaven, and crying God have mercy for the manifold sins of his youth, but this last especially, which he said was a bloody, crying and contagious sin; craved pardon of the Queen and her Counsellors, commended his spirit into the hands of God, and had his head taken off at the third blow, though the first bereft him both of his sense and motion.

The 5th of March, Sir Christopher Blount, Sir Charles Davers, Sir John Davis, Sir Gyllie Merrick and Cuffe, were brought to their Tryal in Westminster-Hall, before the Queens Delegates. The Heads of their Indictments, were the same which were objected to Essex and Southampton. The others said little in their defence, only Cuffe stood upon these two answers; Whereas (saith he) I am challenged of Treason, because I was in Essex house the day of the Rebellion: by the same Argument the Lyon in the Cellar might be indicted; all that day I lamented the Earls fortune, and dealt with him to fly to the Queens mercy. And as for the Consultation in Drury-House, it is no more to be called High-Treason, than an Embryo may be accounted a perfect man. The Lawyers on the other side demonstrated, That no necessity lay upon him to tarry in the House; and that the Consultation in Drury-House was itself a Treason, though it had never broke forth into act. Merrick said only this, The Earl of Essex raised me, and he hath overturned me.

The 13th of March, Merrick, and Cuffe, are drawn to Tyburn, where Cuffe entering into a long Speech, was by the Sheriff interrupted; and then after prayers to God, and desiring God and the Queen to pardon him, he was cast from the Ladder: a Man of great Wit and Learning, but of a boisterous and turbulent disposition. In the same manner dyed Merrick.

Merrick and Cuffe are drawn to Tyburn, and there executed.

The 15th of March, Sir Charles Davers and Sir Christopher Blount were beheaded on the Tower-Hill, albeit Davers offered ten thousand pounds to redeem his life, though with perpetual imprisonment. The Earl of Southampton and the Sheriff Smith were kept prisoners; though Smith, after some time, was upon sureties suffer'd to go at large. The 8th of July Sir Henry Nevill was cited before the Lords of the Council, where it was laid to his Charge, That he was present at the Consultation in Drury-House, yet had not revealed their sinister purposes; and had imparted to Essex the secrets of his French Embassage. He confessed, That at the Earl's entreaty, he shewed him the Commentaries of the French proceedings, was present at one of their Consultations only, but contemned their Counsels, yet durst not be an Informer against so great Personages. Hereupon he had a grievous check given him, and was committed to Prison.

Sir Charles Davers and Sir Christopher Blount beheaded at Tower hill.

One act by the by is not here to be omitted. Essex at his Arraignment had complained, That his hand-writing was counterfeited. It happened the Countess of Essex being fearful in her Husbands behalf, gave a Letter which she had received from him, to the Custody of one Rhibove, a Dutch Woman that waited on her: this Dutch Womans Husband named Daniel, lighted by chance upon the Letter, and perceiving some passages in it which might bring the Earl of Essex into danger, got a cunning Fellow to draw a counterfeit Copy of the said Letter; with this he cometh to the fearful Lady, who was newly brought to bed, threatening to give the same to her Husbands Adversaries, unless she would presently give him three thousand Pounds. She, to shun the danger, paid him eleven hundred and seventy pounds at the very instant; yet did he deliver her the counterfeit Copy only, meaning to make use of the true one, to get another sum of the Earl's Adversary. This imposture being found out, he was censured to perpetual imprisonment, condemned in three thousand Pounds (two of which were to go to the Countess) and his Ears nailed to the Pillory, with this Writing over his head; A notorious Cheater.

Soon after a Parliament was assembled, where The Queen in grievous complaints being tendered to the lower House touching Monopolies, the Queen, by way of prevention, sendeth out Proclamations, declaring the said Licenses and Patents to be void in part, leaving some part to the discussion of the Laws: which thing was so acceptable to the lower House, that they presently sent eighty eighty select Persons, together with the Speaker. to give the Queen thanks; and she on the other side gave them thanks for being such faithful Monitors to her, to recall her from an Error whereinto thro' Ignorance, not Wilfulness, she was fallen.

In Ireland the Deputy, at the entry of the Spring draws his Forces together, and driveth Tir-Oen from where he had fortified himself. Carew, President of Munster, taketh the titular Earl lurking in a Cave, and receives Intelligence, that the Spaniards invited by Tir-Oen had a purpose to land in Munster, yet could not persuade the Deputy they had any design for Ireland; but in the midst of September certain news was brought the Spaniards were in fight, who wanting Wind to carry their Fleet to Cork, put into Kinsale the 23d of September, and land their Soldiers without resistance. Richard Perry, having but few Soldiers to defend the Town, is commanded to come away and leave Kinsale to the Spaniards, into which they enter with Ensigns display'd, and by the Magistrates and Inhabitants were bidden welcome.

D'Aquila, who commanded the Spaniards, publish'd a Declaration, wherein he shew'd, That Queen Elizabeth was depos'd from her Kingdom by Sentence of the Pope, her Subjects absolv'd from their Allegiance; and, that the Spaniards were now come to deliver Ireland from the Jaws of the Devil. Tir-Oen joyns his Forces with them, so as they were now Six thousand Foot, and Five thousand Horse, and promis'd themselves assured Victory, the English being not near so many. The 24th of December a Battle is joyn'd, where after long fight the Victory inclin'd to the English. Tir-Oen, Odonnell, and the rest cast away their Weapons, and save themselves by flight: Alphonso O Campo, chief Ruler of the Spaniards, together with three other Captains, was taken Prisoner, and six Ensign-bearers, 1200 were slain, nine Colours taken, whereof four belong'd to the Spaniards; of the English not many were slain, but a great number wounded.

After six days d'Aquila sendeth Letters to the Deputy by a Drummer, requesting that some Person of account might be sent to him, with whom to confer: Sir William Godolphin is sent, to whom he complain'd of the Cowardise and (he fear'd) Treachery of the Irish; and therefore, altho' he wanted nothing to hold out the Siege, and did daily expect great Forces from Spain, yet was willing to make Composition: whereupon at last it was agreed, the Spaniards should yield up Kinsale to the Deputy, as also the Castles and Forts at Baltimore, Beer-haven, and Castle-haven, and should depart with Life and Goods, and Colours display'd. The English, at a reasonable price, should furnish them with Ships and Provision into Spain, and that they should not carry Arms against the Queen of England, till they were arrived in Spain, &c.

And now the Spaniards being driven out of Ireland, the Queen, to prevent their coming again, sendeth out Sir Richard Levison and Sir William Monson, with eight Ships of her own, and some smaller ships of War, to attempt something on the Coasts of Spain. On the 19th of March, Levison hoisteth Sail, and Monson afterward, having in vain tarried behind for some Dutch Ships to joyn with them. Levison in the mean time lighted upon the Spanish Navy of Eight and thirty Ships, which brought the Treasure from America, and set upon them, but to no purpose. When Monson was come with the rest of the Fleet, they had certain notice, that a mighty Indian Carrack of Sixteen hundred Tun, and richly laden, was upon the Coast of Portugal: There indeed they found it, but it lay close under a Fort, attended with eleven Galleys, and the Carrack it self appear'd as big as a Castle, yet they resolv'd to fire it if they could not take it. The next Day they thunder'd so violently against the Galleys, that within seven Hours the Marquis of St. Cross, together with the Portugal Galleys, which he commanded, withdrew themselves; two of them were taken and fir'd, and in them was great store of Powder, which was going for the Low-Countries. And now Levison signifieth to the Captain of the Carrack, That the Galleys, which they trusted to, were driven away, and therefore, if they now refus'd Mercy, they must expect none hereafter. After much Speech to and fro, it was at last agreed, That the Carrack, with the Ordnance and Merchandize, should be yielded up. Thus the English, having a fair Wind, return'd home with a Booty to the value of a Million of Ducats, by the Portugal account, and not past five of their Men lost in the Voyage.

At this time there arose a Contestation amongst the Popish Clergy here in England, for the Jesuites and secular Priests made bitter Investives in their Writings one against the other. The original of the Priests Quarrel was, That Blackwell, one wholly at the beck of the Jesuites, was set over them as Arch-Presbyter, who first of all despoiled them of their Faculties, and when they appealed to the Pope, caused them to be declar'd Schismatics and Hereticks. They in sundry Books extolled the Queen very highly, as one that dealt mildly always with the Catholics till such time as they set all in a combustion in England, and by their Treasons caused most severe Laws to be enacted against the Catholics. Parsons they traduced as a Bastard, an Equivocator, and a Traytor. Whether they contended thus in good earnest, or in jest only, is hard to say; but the Bishop of London politickly nourish'd the Contention; and all he gain'd was this, That the Queen and her Council, finding them dangerous to the Common-wealth, both the one and the other, upon penalty of the Laws, were by Proclamation commanded to depart out of the Kingdom presently.

In France, the Marshal Biron, for entering into dangerous Attempts against the publick Peace, was arraign'd, and lost his Head: His Confession brought some others into danger, and amongst them the Duke of Bouillon, of the Protestant Religion, that when he was cited, he durst not appear, but fled into Germany. Hereupon the King of France sendeth to Queen Elizabeth, complaining that the Duke held his Marriage unlawful, and the Pope's Dispensation nothing worth, pronouncing his Sons illegitimate; had destined the Prince of Conde to the Succession of the Crown, and conspir'd the Destruction of the prime of the Nobility. The Queen, by her

Tir-Oen joins his Forces with the Spaniards, which together make a great Army, but in battel are defeated.

D'Aquila, who commanded the Spaniards, requires a Composition, and departs.

Sir Richard Levison sets upon the Spanish Fleet of Treasure, but can't prevail.

Levison takes a Carrack of 1600 Tun, worth a Million of Ducats.

The Jesuites and the secular Priests contend against one another.

Both order'd to depart the Realm.

The King of France complains to the Queen against the Duke of Bouillon, and her Answer.

Leiger Ambassador adviseth the King not too credulously to entertain those Reports, as doubting these Suggestions might proceed from some of the Spanish Faction. Hereupon the King grew very angry, saying, the Queen held a better opinion of the Duke than he deserv'd; and, that he was one of the chief Architects of Essex's Treason; and being question'd by the King about it, was not able to deny it. About this time also the Duke of Savoy, by cunning sleights and open force practis'd against the States of Geneva, and the Queen reliev'd them with a great Sum of Money, gather'd amongst the Clergy and Laity all over England.

Tir-Oen yields himself to the Deputy absolutely, without any Condition.

And now the Earl Tir-Oen perceiving himself in a desperate state, resolv'd to sue for Mercy, and promis'd at last to submit his Life and Fortune to the Queen's pleasure, without any Condition. Hereupon being admitted to the presence of the Deputy, at the very entry of the Room he fell on his Knees, and then passing on a few steps, prostrated himself again, saying, I confess, and crave Pardon for my great Fault against God, and a most bountiful Prince, my dread Sovereign: I flie to the Queen's Mercy, as a sacred Anchor, permitting her to dispose of my Life and Fortune at her pleasure. On this his submission the Deputy commanded him to go aside, and the next day took him along to Dublin with him, meaning to bring him into England, that the Queen might deal with him according to her Royal Pleasure; but before he could come into England the Queen dy'd.

Her Taxations.

IN a Parliament holden the First Year of her Reign, a Subsidy was granted of 2 s. 8 d. the Pound of Goods, and 4 s. of Lands, to be paid at two several payments, of every Person, spiritual and temporal. In her sixth Year, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, one Subsidy was granted by the Clergy, and another by the Laity, together with two Fifteenths and Tenths. In her eighth Year, in a Parliament then holden, there were offer'd to her four Subsidies upon condition she would declare a Successor, but she refus'd their Offer, and directly remitted the fourth Subsidy which they had granted, saying, 'Twas all one whether the Money were in her Subjects Coffers, or in her own. In her thirteenth Year, in a Parliament then holden, towards her Charges of repressing the Northern Rebellion, there was granted her by the Clergy, a Subsidy of 6 s. in the Pound; and by the Temporality, two Fifteenths, with a Subsidy of 2 s. 8 d. in the Pound. In her Six and thirtieth Year a Parliament was holden, wherein was granted by the Clergy two whole Subsidies, and by the Laity three, besides six Fifteenths and Tenths; but it was put into the Act, That this great Contribution, the like whereof had not been known in former Ages, should not be drawn into Example. In her fortieth Year, in a Parliament at Westminster, were granted her by the Clergy three entire Subsidies, and by the Laity as many, with six Fifteenths and Tenths. In her Two and fortieth Year, to furnish her with Money towards the Irish War, she delegated certain Commissioners to confirm the Crown-lands to the Possessors that held any controverted Titles, and to take Money for the Confirmation, thereby to take

Of her Laws and Ordinances.

IN a Parliament holden in her first Year, an Act was made, That every Person should go to Divine Service upon Sundays and Holydays, or else pay Twelve-pence to the Poor: Also 'twas enacted, That Bishops should not let the Lands of the Church for longer than One and twenty Years, or three Lives, except to the Queen or her Successors. In the third Year, a Proclamation was made, that the Teston coin'd for Twelve-pence, and in the Reign of King Edward embased to Six-pence, should not be current but for Four-pence; the Groat, but for Two-pence; and the piece of Two-pence, but for a Penny: And not long after, all the said base Moneys was call'd in, and fine Sterling Money was allow'd for them after the same Rate. For Ireland also she coin'd Sterling Money; where Nine-pence in England went for Twelve-pence there. The Queen was the first that brought certain Countries to deliver Provision at a certain Rate, that so they might be freed from the Purveyors; also the first that granted Allowance to Judges for their Circuit. In her sixth Year, in a Parliament then holden, 'twas made Treason to refuse taking the Oath of Supremacy, yet with this limitation, that by it the Blood should not be dishonour'd, nor Goods confiscate, nor the Oath to be requir'd of any Baron of the Kingdom: Also this Year, by a Common-council in London, it was enacted, That all such Citizens as from thenceforth should be constrain'd to sell their Householdstuff, Leases of Houses, or suchlike, should first cause the same to be cry'd thro' the City, by a Man with a Bell, and then to be sold by the common Outcryer appointed for that purpose, and he to receive One farthing in the Shilling for his pains. In her Three and twentieth Year she represseth by Proclamation excess in Apparel, gold Chains, and Cloaks which Men wore down to their Heels: The length of Swords was limited to three Foot, and Daggers to twelve Inches besides the Hilt: Buildings likewise in the Suburbs were restrain'd, Inmates forbidden, and expresse charge set forth, that no Dwelling-house should be new built within three miles of any City-gates, under pain of Imprisonment and loss of the Materials. In her time was set on foot by Sir Thomas Smith, the Law made for the serving of Colleges with Provision, to the great benefit of those scholastical Societies. In her Two and fortieth Year she setteth forth Proclamations against the transportation of Gold or Silver, wrought or unwrought, according to the former Acts of Parliament in that case provided. This Year also she founded the Company of the East-India Merchants, allowing them ample Privileges. In her Three and fortieth Year all Monopolies are call'd in by Proclamation. In her Four and twentieth Year severe Laws are made against Papists, some inflicting Death, some Fine and Imprisonment. In her Eight and twentieth Year a Proclamation was set forth, prohibiting to sow Woad within eight miles of any of the Queen's Houses, and four miles of any Cities or Towns corporate. In her Five and twentieth

Year was first instituted and founded a publick Lecture in Chirurgery, to begin to be read in the College of Physicians in London, and the Reader to have a Stipend no less than those of the Universities erected by K. Henry VIII.

The Protestant Religion is by degrees establish'd.

ON Sunday the first of January next after the Queen's coming to the Crown, by virtue of her Proclamation, the English Litany was read according as 'twas used in her Grace's Chapel, and in all Churches thro' the City of London, and likewise the Epistle and Gospel of the Day, begun to be read at Mass-time in the English Tongue. Also in a Parliament holden in her first Year, the First-fruits and Tithes were restor'd to the Crown, and the supreme Government over the State Ecclesiastical, and the Book of Common-prayer and Administration of the Sacraments in the English Tongue was restor'd, and by degrees the Protestant Religion was establish'd. The Bishops that refus'd the Oath of Supremacy were all remov'd, and Protestant Bishops placed in their room. It was enacted also, That all Persons should go to Divine Service on Sundays and Holy-days, and a Fine of Twelve-pence impos'd on every one that should absent, the same to be given to the Poor. In her fourth Year the Queen was solicited by Pope Pius to send her Orators to the Council of Trent, which she refus'd, as not acknowledging it a lawful Council. In a Parliament holden in her eighth Year, 'twas enacted, and by a general consent declar'd, that the election of the Archbishops and Bishops in England, together with their Consecration, Confirmation, and Investiture (which some persons slanderously call'd in question) was Lawful and Canonical, and were rightly, and according to the Acts and Statutes of the Kingdom, chose and consecrated. In her eleventh Year there arose in England two contrary Factions in Religion; on the one side Thomas Harding, Nicholas Sanders, and other Divines that had fled out of England, began to exercise the Episcopal Jurisdiction upon the Queen's Subjects, which they had deriv'd from the See of Rome: On the other side, Coleman, Burton, Hallingham, Benson, and others, making profession of the pure Religion, would allow of nothing but what was directly taken out of the Scriptures, openly condemning the received Discipline of the Church of England, together with the Church-Liturgy, and the very calling of Bishops, as favouring too much of the Romish Religion, protesting in the Pulpits, That it was an impious thing to hold any thing common with the Church of Rome, and used all diligence to have the Church of England reform'd in every point according to the Rule of the Church of Geneva. These, altho' the Queen commanded to be committed to Prison, yet it is incredible how on a sudden their followers encreas'd, known by the envious Name of Puritans. This Sect so mightily encreas'd, that in her sixteenth Year the Queen and Kingdom was extreemly troubled with some of the Clergy, who breathing out nothing but Evangelical parity, cry'd down the Ecclesiastical Form of Government, (as a thing polluted with Romish Dregs) setting forth Books likewise, intituled, The Admonition to the Parliament, and The Defence of the Admonition;

they refus'd to resort to the Divine Service publickly in use, framing to themselves other Rites; whereupon the Queen, to suppress them; whom by no means she liked, commanded every where the severity of the Law touching the Uniformity of Common-prayer to be put in execution; and those Books, on pain of imprisonment, to be deliver'd into the hands of the Bishops, or some of the Queen's Council. And this Year were taken at Mass in their several Houses, the Lord Morley's Lady and her Children, the Lady Guilford, and the Lady Brown, who being thereof indicted and convicted, suffer the Penalty of the Law in that case provided. Until the 20th Year of Qu. Elizabeth's Reign, the Papists in England were mercifully conniv'd at, while they solemniz'd their own Rites within their private Houses, (tho' that also were against the Laws) but whenas that Thunderbolt of excommunicating the Queen came abroad, then was the Law enacted against those who brought into the Kingdom any Agnus Dei, or hallow'd Beads, or reconcil'd any of the Queen's Subjects to the See of Rome; yet for six whole years together after this Law was made, it was not executed upon any Papist, till Cuthbert Mayn, a Priest and obstinate maintainer of the Pope's Authority against the Queen, was executed at Launceston in Cornwall, and the Gentleman's Goods that harbour'd him confiscated, and himself adjudg'd to perpetual imprisonment. In her Three and twentieth Year divers Priests and Jesuites came into England, amongst whom Robert Parsons and Edmund Campion, Englishmen and Jesuites, being now bound for England, to promote the Catholic Cause; at which time a Proclamation was set forth, That whosoever had any Children beyond Sea, should by a certain Day call 'em home; and, That no Person should receive or harbour any Seminary Priest or Jesuite. At this time also arose up in Holland a certain Sect, naming themselves The Family of Love, where only who were adopted into that Family were elected, and no other could be saved, but were all Reprobates, and damn'd; and, That it was lawful for them to deny upon Oath whatever they pleas'd, before any Magistrate, or whomsoever that were not of that Family. Many of their Books were printed under these Titles, The Gospel of the Kingdom, The Lord's Sentences, The Prophecy of the Spirit of Love, The publication of Peace upon Earth, by the Author H.N. But who this Author was they would by no means reveal; at last he was found to be Henry Nichols of Leyden, who blasphemously preach'd, That he was partaker of the Divinity of God, and God of his humane Nature: All which Books were by Proclamation commanded to be burnt. In a Parliament holden the 28th Year of her Reign, some (out of a desire of Reformation) began to pick Quarrels at the Clergy, desiring to pass Laws for the restraint of Bishops in their granting of Faculties, conferring of Holy Orders, Ecclesiastical Censure, and the Oath Ex Officio: They complain'd likewise of the Nonresidence of Ministers, and the like; but the Queen (who always hated Innovation, which for the most part changes for the worse) would give no Ear unto them; conceiving besides, That these proceedings in Parliament in Ecclesiastical affairs deroga-

Three Articles almost gasping: whereupon he provided Three Articles, to which every Minister should subscribe. Three Articles to which every Minister must subscribe.

The first, That the Queen had supreme Authority over all Persons born within her Dominions, of what condition soever they were; and, That no other Prince, or Prelate, or Potentate hath, or ought to have, any Jurisdiction, Civil or Ecclesiastical, within her Realms and Dominions.

The second, That the Book of Common-prayer and the Ordination of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, containeth nothing contrary to the Word of GOD, but may lawfully be used; and, that they will use that, and no other.

The third, That the Articles agreed on in the Synod holden at London in the Year 1562, and publish'd by the Queen's Authority, they did allow of, and believe them to be consonant to the Word of GOD.

'Tis incredible what Reproaches the Archbishop incur'd by setting forth these Articles, both from factious Ministers, and from some also of the Nobility, yet by his Patience and Constancy he brought at last Peace to the Church, making this his Motto, Vincit qui patitur. Neither did these at home only disturb the Peace of the Church, but others also from abroad, as Robert Brown, a young Student of Divinity in Cambridge, and Richard Harrison a petty Schoolmaster. These presuming to judge matters of Religion by their own private Spirit, by Books set forth in Zealand, and dispers'd at this time over England, condemn'd the Church of England for no Church, and ensnar'd many in the Nets of their new Schism; neither could they be restrain'd, tho' their Books were prohibited by the Queen's Authority, and soundly confuted by sundry learned Men, and one or two of the Ringleaders executed at St. Edmunds-bury. In her 31st Year these Puritan Flames brake forth again; Books are written by the Name of Martin Mar-prelate, and a Demonstration of the Discipline by Penry and Udal, against the Government of Bishops; and nothing would please them but the Discipline of Geneva: Many Abettors they had, Knightly and Wigstone, Knights, besides Cartwright (the Father of them) Snape, King, Pardlow, Payn, and others, who, tho' call'd in question, fined, and imprison'd, could never be reclaim'd. In her 36th Year the Queen caus'd the Severity of the Laws to be executed upon Henry Barrow and his Sectaries, for disturbing the Church and the publick Peace, by scattering their monstrous Opinions, condemning the Church of England as no Christian Church, and derogating from the Queen's Authority in Causes Ecclesiastical.

Works of Piety in her Time.

THIS Queen converted Westminster-Abby into a Collegiate Church, and there ordain'd a Dean, twelve Prebendaries, a Master, Usher, and forty Scholars, Vicars, Singing-men, and twelve Almsmen. In her third Year the Merchant-Taylors founded a notable Grammar-School in the Parish of St. Lawrence Pountney in London: Also this Year William Harper Mayor of London founded a free-School in the Town of Bedford, where he was born. In her 7th Year, on the 7th of June, Sir Thomas Gresham laid the first Stone of the Royal Exchange in Cornhill, which in November the Year after, at his own charges was finish'd, being the Year 1567. In her 10th Year the Citizens of London built a new Conduit at Walbrook corner, near to Dowgate, the Water whereof is convey'd out of the Thames: Also this Year Sir Thomas Roe Mayor of London caused to be enclos'd within a Wall of Brick one Acre of Ground near unto Bedlam, without Bishopsgate, to be a place of Burial for the Dead of such Parishes in London as lack'd convenient Ground within their Parishes: He also built a convenient Room in Paul's Church-yard, on the south side of the Cross, to receive a certain number of Hearers at Sermon-time. Sir William Petre, having himself been born at Exeter in Devonshire, gave to Exeter College in Oxford One hundred pound Lands a year: He also built at Ingershale in Essex Almshouses for Twenty poor People, giving them some competent Maintenance. Sir Thomas Gresham had his Dwelling-house in Broadstreet, London, which he dedicated to the profession of the Liberal Sciences, erecting there Lectures of Divinity, Civil-Law, Physics, Geometry, Astronomy, Musick, and Phe-torick, allotting to the Professors very competent Allowances. In her 17th Year died Matthew Parker Archbishop of Canterbury, who founded a Grammar-School in Rochdale, in the County of Lancaster: He also procur'd to Corpus-Christi College in Cambridge thirteen Scholarships, and built two Chambers for Scholars, and the inward Library of the same College, procuring to it the Patronage of St. Mary Abchurch in London, with many other Works of like kind. Sir Nicholas Bacon Lord-Keeper, gave for Six Scholars to be found in Bennet College in Cambridge, 3 l. 6 s. 8 d. for ever. Edward Grindall Archbishop of Canterbury founded a Free-School in Cumberland; where he was born, and gave many Pensions to both Universities. Frances Countess of Suffex, Sister to Sir Henry Sidney, founded Suffex-Sidney College in Cambridge; as likewise Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer, founded Emanuel College in the same University. Sir Thomas Bodley erected and furnish'd the famous publick Library at Oxford. Alexander Nowel, Dean of Pauls, endow'd Brazen-nose Col- lege in Oxford, where he was brought up, with 200 l. per ann. and died in the Year 1662. Sir Roger Manwood, Chief Baron of the Exchequer, built seven Almshouses in Canterbury, giving to every Alms-man 4 l. yearly: And our worthy Country-man William Lambert built an Alms-house at Greenwich, which he call'd, The College for the Poor of Queen Elizabeth. Also in her time, namely, in the Year 1595, Bevis Bulmar Gent. built a large House of great height, call'd an Engine, at the Bridge-foot, for the conveying and forcing of Thames Water to serve in the middle and west parts of the City: As also in her time, (namely, in the Year 1596) Ralph Rokeby, one of her Masters of Request, then dying, gave by his Will ## Casualties in her Time.

The Pulse to beat of one that was dead.

A Vein of Copper found. Also the Stone call'd Lapis Calaminaris.

Gunpowder first made in England.

The Spire of Paul's Church burnt with Lightning.

Many monstrous Births.

A monstrous Fish taken in Lincolnshire.

An exream Frost.

IN the first Year of her Reign died Sir Thomas Cheyney, Lord-Warden of the Cinque-Ports, of whom 'tis reportd for certain, that his Pulse did beat more than three quarters of an hour after he was dead, as strongly as if he had been still alive. In her third Year there was found, near Keswick in Cumberland, a most rich Vein of pure and native Copper, which had lain neglected a long time; also the Stone call'd Lapis Calaminaris, which is of great use in Brass-works, was first found in England at this time, and in most plentiful manner. Likewise this Queen was the first that caus'd Gunpowder to be made in England, which before was had from foreign Parts, and at dear Rates. In her third Year the Spire of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, being 520 foot from the Ground, and 260 from the square Steeple where 'twas placed, and was made of Wood Materials, but cover'd with Lead, was by Lightning burnt down, together with the Roofs of that large Church, and that within the space of five hours; the Roofs were after re-edified, but not the Spire: The Queen gave towards it a Thousand Marks in Money, and a Thousand Load of Timber, and the City granted a Benevolence and three Fifteenths, and the Clergy also contributed to it. Also this Year there were many monstrous Births: A Mare brought forth a Foal with two Heads, and a long Tail growing out between the two Heads. A Sow farrow'd a Pig with two Bodies, eight Feet, and but one Head. A Manchild was born at Chichester in Sussex, having Arms and Legs like to an Anatomy, the Breast and Belly monstrous big, about the Neck a great Collar of Flesh and Skin, growing like the Ruff of a Shirt. In her sixth Year, upon the return of the Army from Newhaven, the Pestilence was brought into England, but especially into London, where, in one Year there died Twenty-one thousand five hundred. This Year also, in the Month of December, was driven on the Shore at Grimsby in Lincolnshire, a monstrous Fish, in length 19 yards, his Tail 15 foot broad, and 6 yards between the Eyes; twelve Men stood upright in his Mouth to get the Oil. In her seventh Year, on the 21st of December, began a Frost, so extreame that on Newyears-Eve People pass'd over the Thames on foot; some play'd at Football, some shot at Pricks, as if it had been firm Ground: Yet this great Frost, the 3d of January at Night, began to thaw, and by the 5th Day there was no Ice at all to be seen; which sudden Thaw caused great Inundations. In her eighth Year, within the space of ten Months, there died in London seven Aldermen, namely, Edward Banks, Richard Chamberlain, Sir Martin Bowes, Sir Richard Mallory,

Sir William Hewet, Sir Thomas White, and Richard Lambert, one of the Sheriffs for that Year. The same Year also, in the Town of Oswestry in Shropshire, Two hundred Houses, in the space of two hours, were consumed with Fire. In her tenth Year were taken in Suffolk, at Downham Bridge, near to Ipswich, 17 monstrous Fishes; some of them being 27 foot in length. And in the same Year, many Dutch fleeing into England to avoid the Persecution of the Duke d'Alva, were the first that brought into England the Art of making Bayes, Sayes, Serges, and such wove Stuffs both Woollen and Linen. In her Time a rich Vein of Copper was found in the Earl of Northumberland's Grounds, which she, as her Prerogative, seiz'd upon. In her thirteenth Year a prodigious Earthquake hapned in the East parts of Herefordshire, near a little Town call'd Kynaston. On the 17th of February, at six a-clock in the Evening, the Earth began to open, and a Hill with a Rock under it (making at first a great bellowing noise, which was heard a great way off) lifted itself up a great height, and began to travel, bearing along with it the Trees that grew upon it, the Sheep-folds and Flocks of Sheep abiding there at the same time. In the place from whence it was first mov'd it left a gaping distance forty foot broad, and fourscore ells long; the whole Field was about 20 Acres: Passing along, it overthrew a Chapel standing in the way, remov'd a Yew-tree planted in the Church-yard from the West into the East; with the like force it thrust before it High-ways, Sheep-folds, Hedges, and Trees, making tilled Ground Pasture, and again turning Pasture into Tillage: Having walk'd in this sort from Saturday in the Evening till Monday Noon, it then stood still. In her fifteenth Year, in the Month of November, a new Star (or rather a Meteor, but that it was found to be above the Moon) was seen in Cathedra Cassiopeæ, exceeding Jupiter in brightness, and in that place was carried by the diurnal motion of the Heavens 16 months together, tho' after 8 months 'twas perceiv'd to grow less and less. In her sixteenth Year was a great Dearth, so as Wheat was sold at five and six Shillings the Bushel, and other things in proportion. In her seventeenth Year a vast mighty Whale was cast upon the Isle of Thanet in Kent, 20 ells long, and 13 foot broad from the Belly to the Back-bone, and 11 foot between the Eyes. One of his Eyes being taken out of his Head, was more than a Cart with six Horses could draw: The Oil being boil'd out of the Head, was Sperma Ceti. This Year also the Thames ebb'd and flow'd twice within an hour, and in the Month of November the Heaven seem'd to be all on a fire: Also, on the 24th of February, being a great Frost after a great Flood, there came down the River Severne such a swarm of Flies and Beetles, that they were judg'd to be above an hundred quarters; the Mills thereabout were damm'd up by them for the space of four days, and then were cleans'd by digging 'em out with Shovels. In her two and twentieth Year a strange Apparition hapned in Somersetshire, three-score Personages all cloath'd in black, a furlong in distance from those that beheld them; after their appearing, and a little while tarrying, they vanish'd away, but immediately another strange company in like manner, colour, and number appeared in the same place; and they encounter'd one another, and so vanish'd away: And a third time appear'd that number again, all in bright Armour, and encounter'd one another, and so vanish'd away. This was examin'd before Sir George Norton, and sworn by Four honest Men that saw it, to be true. In her three and twentieth Year, in the beginning of April, about six a-clock after Noon, hapned an Earthquake not far from York, which in some places struck the very Stones out of Buildings, and made the Bells in Churches to jangle. The Night following the Earth trembled once or twice in Kent, and again the first day of May. In this Year also, in the Town of Walsbam in Sussex, a Child of eleven years old, named William Withers, lay in a Trance for the space of ten days without any sustenance; and at last coming to himself, he utter'd to the standers-by many strange speeches, inveighing against Pride, Covetousness, coldness of Charity, and other enormous Sins. In her Six and twentieth Year, being the Year 1588, the like Prodigy hapned in Dorsetshire as in the Year 1571 had hapned in Herefordshire; a Field of three Acres in Blackmore, with the Trees and Fences, mov'd from its place, and passed over another Field, travelling in the High-way that goeth to Herne, and there staid. In her twenty-eighth Year, Tobacco was brought out of the West-Indies into England by Ralph Lane. In her thirty-fifth Year there was so great a Drought, as not only the Fields, but the Springs themselves were dry'd up, and many Cattle every where died for want of Water: The River of Thames likewise did so fail, that a Horseman might ride over at London-bridge. In her thirty-sixth Year was a great Plague in London and the Suburbs, 17890, besides the Lord-Mayor and three Aldermen; and Michaelmas Term was held at St. Albans. For the Price of Victuals in her Time, we may take a pattern of the rest by one kind; for John Stow reports, That in his Youth he fetch'd many a Halfpenny-worth of Milk from a Farm by the Minories, and never had less than three Ale-Pints for a Halfpenny in Summer, nor less than two Ale-Pints for a Halfpenny in Winter. Also in the Year 1522, a fat Ox was sold at London for Twenty-six Shillings at the most; a fat Weather for Three Shillings four Pence; a fatted Calf, the like price; a fat Lamb for Twelve-pence; three pound of good Beef for one Penny.

Another prodigious Earthquake.

Of her Personage and Conditions.

SHE was of a Stature indifferent tall, slender, and freight, fair of Complexion, her Hair inclining to pale yellow, her Forehead large and fair, her Eyes lively and sweet, but shortsighted, her Nose a little rising in the midst, the whole compass of her Countenance something long, yet of admirable Beauty, but the Beauty of her Mind was far more admirable: She had been a Subject, which taught her to rule: She had been in Misery, which taught her to be merciful; and indeed, never Prince ruled with more Justice, and with Justice mingled more Mercy: She had more Valour in her than was fit for a Woman, but that she was Ruler over Men; and more Humility in her than was fit for a Prince, but that she meant to be a President to Women. She delighted in nothing so much as the Love of her People, which she effectually procur'd by ordaining Good Magistrates, and forbearing Impositions: Her Way not to need them was Frugality; and her Way to have them when she needed, was Liberality. She made Honour in her time the more honourable, by not making it common; and indeed, knowing it to be an Influence from her self, she kept it as her self, a Virgin, and would not prostitute it to Unworthy Persons. She declin'd being a Mother of Children, to the end she might be a Mother of her Country; and indeed no Mother ever lov'd her Children more than she did her People; and therefore never Children lov'd a Mother more than her People did her. She coveted not so much to be an Owner of Riches, as of rich Subjects, for she thought Money lay as safe in their Coffers as in her own; and indeed she never wanted when they had it, and they always had it when she needed it. Never Prince had a wiser Council than she, yet never Prince needed it less; for she was her self a Counsellor to her Council. In fine, whatsoever may in flattery be said of a wise, just, merciful, religious, and learned Prince, may truly be said of her; in all which, if ever she had an Equal, yet she never certainly had a Superior. In playing her Game of Fortune she lov'd not an After-game, for she liked Preventions better than Remedies. She was admirable in expressing her Mind, both by Speech and Writing; and if collection could be made of her Apophthegms and extempore Orations, 'twould certainly excel any thing extant in that kind; and for her Writing, Sir Henry Savile affirms, That he had seen some Translations of hers, which far exceeded the Originals. Never Prince kept better State with less state-lines: Her Pensioners and Guards were always the tallest and goodliest Gentlemen and Yeomen of the Kingdom: Her Maids of Honour, and other Women about her, the fairest and most beautiful Ladies of the Realm, and yet her self a Diana amongst her Nymphs; insomuch that a great Lord of France being entertain'd at Court, and the Queen asking him how he liked her Ladies, made answer, It was hard to judge of Stars in the presence of the Sun.

Of her Death and Burial.

IT was now the Year 1602, when she feeling some Infirmities of Old-age and Sickness, retir'd herself at the end of January to Richmond, at which time, as a sad Omen, she commanded the Ring to be filed off her Finger wherewith she was solemnly at the first inaugurated into the Kingdom, and since that time had never taken it off, it being grown into the Flesh in such manner, that it could not be gotten off without filing. At the beginning of her Sickness the Almonds of her Jaws began to swell, and her Appetite by little and little fail'd her; withal she gave her self wholly to Sadness and Heaviness, which some imputed to her Care for the loss of the Earl of Essex; others, because she heard that divers of the Nobility sought the Favour of the King of Scots, adoring him as the Sun-rising, and neglecting her: But howsoever in March a kind of benumbedness seiz'd upon her, her, with a deep Melancholy, so as she would sit silently, refrain her Meat, and not admit of any Conference, but with the Archbishop of Canterbury, with whom she pray'd fervently till such time as her Speech fail'd her, which fail'd a Day before she died. She being in this case, 'twas thought fit the Admiral and Secretary should go to her, to know her Mind concerning a Successor, to whom she gave this Answer; My Throne hath been the Throne of Kings, I would not that a mean Person should succeed me: The Secretary requesting her to speak more plainly, I will (said she) have a King succeed me, and what King but the King of Scots, my nearest Kinsman? After this, the Archbishop exhorted her to think of GOD; That do I, (said she) nor do my Thoughts ever wander from Him: And when her Tongue no longer serv'd her, it was evident, by the lifting up of her Hands and Eyes, that her Thoughts were fix'd upon Him: And so, on the 24th Day of March, being the last Day of the Year 1602, she yielded up her Soul to GOD, when she had liv'd Threescore and nine Years, six Months, and seven Days; and reign'd Four and forty Years, four Months, and seven Days. Her Body was embalm'd, wrap'd in Lead, and brought to White-hall, from whence, on the 28th of April following, in great Solemnity, it was carried into the Collegiate Church of St. Peters, Westminster, and there interr'd in the Vault of her Grandfather King Henry the Seventh, in his magnificent Chapel, where our Renowned Sovereign King James hath built her a Princely Monument, inscrib'd with Epitaphs to her Eternal Glory. At her Funeral were said to be Mourners in black, to the number of One thousand and six hundred Persons.

THE Ocean is not more boundless than the number of Men of Note in her Time, but tho' all of them cannot be reckon'd, yet some of them must not be omitted. And, to begin with Statesmen, an exquisite Statesman for his own Ends was Robert Earl of Leicester; but for his Country's Good, Sir William Cecil Lord Burleigh; as also Sir Francis Walsingham, that great Underminer of Conspirators. Famous Seamen were, the Earl of Cumberland, the Lord Thomas Howard, afterward Earl of Suffolk; and of meaner Rank, Sir John Hawkins, Sir Martin Forbisher, Sir Walter Raleigh, Cavendish, Preston, Ryman, and (to name the worthiest last) Sir Francis Drake, who, tho' he were but a short square-bodied Man, yet his Great Acts have made the Spaniards believe that he was some goodly Personage. Great Commanders by Land were Robert Earl of Essex, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Gray of Wilton, Sir Francis Vere, Sir Roger Williams, Baskerville, Savage, and the Honour of his Family and our English Nation, Sir John Norris. Learned Gentlemen and Writers were, Sir Thomas Chaloner, employ'd by Queen Elizabeth as her Leiger in Spain, who wrote Five Books of the restoring of the English Commonwealth, in elegant Verse, while (as he said) he liv'd in a Stove in Winter, and in a Barn in Summer; Roger Ascham, born in Yorkshire, notably skillful in the Greek and Latin Tongues, who had sometimes been Schoolmaster to Queen Elizabeth, and her Secretary for the Latin Tongue; but taking too great Delight in Gaming and Cock-fighting, he both lived and died in mean estate, yet left behind him sundry Monuments of Wit and Industry: Sir Thomas Smith, born at Saffron-Walden in Essex, some time Secretary to King Edward the Sixth, who wrote an imperfect Work of the English Commonwealth, a singular Book of the Orthography of the English Tongue, and another of the Pronunciation of the Greek; the first Man that set on foot the Law for serving the Colleges with Provision: Sir Henry Savile, Provost of Eaton, and Reader to Queen Elizabeth, who set forth all St. Chrysostom's Works in Greek, and by translating of Cornelius Tacitus deserv'd as much of the English Tongue as he of the Latin: But above all, the admirable Sir Philip Sidney, who by writing in a light Argument, shew'd how excellently, and beyond all comparison, he could have done in a grave. Learned Divines were John Jewel, born in Devonshire, Student in Corpus-Christi College in Oxford, in Queen Mary's time an Exile, by Queen Elizabeth made Bishop of Salisbury, who wrote an Apology for the Protestant Doctrine, and died at scarce Fifty Years of age, in the Fourteenth Year of Queen Elizabeth. John Whitaker, Master of St. John's College in Cambridge, who learnedly answer'd all the Books of Bellarmine: Bilson, Bishop of Winchester, some time Fellow of New-College in Oxford, who, amongst his other learned Works, hath written notably of Christ's Descent into Hell: Richard Hooker, Preacher at the Temple, who with too much Meekness smother'd his great Learning, yet hath something discover'd it in his Five Books of Ecclesiastical Polity, and died in the Year 1599: Alexander Nowel, Dean of Pauls, who, forbearing deeper Works, set forth a Catechism according to the Doctrine of the English Church, and died in the Year 1620. After such Men, it might be thought ridiculous to speak of Stage-players; but seeing Excellency in the meanest things deserves remembering, and Roscius the Comedian is recorded in History with such Commendation, it may be allowed us to do the like with some of our Nation: Richard Bourbidge and Edward Allen, two such Actors as no Age must ever look to see the like; and, to make their Comedies compleat, Richard Tarleton, who for the Part called the Clown's Part, never had his match, nor never will have. For Writers of Plays, and such as had been Players themselves, William Shakespear and Benjamin Johnson have specially left their Names recommended to Posterity.

THE REIGN OF KING JAMES.

An. Dom.
1603.

King James is proclaim'd King of England, Scotland and Ireland.

Sir Robert Cary
acquaints him with the Queen's death

JAMES the Fourth King of Scotland married Margaret eldest Daughter of Henry the Seventh King of England, by whom he had James the Fifth, who had one only Child Mary Queen of Scots, who had one only Son, James the Sixth, who from James the Fourth had undoubted Right to the Kingdom of Scotland; and from Margaret, King Henry the Seventh's eldest Daughter, (the male Line being clean extinct) unquestionable Title to the Crown of England; whereupon Queen Elizabeth being dead about Ten a-clock in the Morning the Twenty-fourth of March, King James the Sixth, King of Scotland, was the very same Day (Mr. Secretary Cecil himself reading his Title and Queen Elizabeth's Will) proclaim'd King of England, Scotland, and Ireland, by sound of Trumpet, first at White-hall, and then in Cheapside, in presence of all the Lords of the Council, and other of the Nobility, with a general Acclamation of all sorts of People, that we may truly say, Sorrow was never more deceiv'd than at this time; for where, upon the Death of Queen Elizabeth, 'twas expected there would be nothing for a long time but sorrowing and lamenting, now that very Sorrow was swallow'd up of Joy, her Death bringing with it no other alteration but only of Sex, in all other points in a manner the same, the like Wisdom, the like Learning, the like Justice, the like Religiousness in them both; only better'd in this, that we chang'd a Queen of Seventy Years old, whom we could not look to keep long, for a King of Thirty-six, whom we might well hope to enjoy many Years.

Queen Elizabeth was no sooner dead, but Sir Robert Cary, a younger Son of the late Lord Hunsdon, posted away unsent to King James in Scotland, informing him of the Accident; for bringing which News the King afterwards rewarded him with making him a Baron of the Realm, and Lord of Leppington. But tho' it were sufficient for the King's information that he heard the News by Sir Robert Cary, yet it was not sufficient for the Lords of the Council, in discharge of their Duty, if he heard it not from them; and therefore, within a very few Days, as soon as they could provide fit Men, they sent first Sir Charles Percy and Mr. Thomas Somerset, and after them Sir Thomas Lake Clerk of the Signet, a Man well acquainted with the State of the Kingdom, both to acquaint him with the general Applause of all the Realm to receive him for their Sovereign, and also to inform him in what terms the State of the Kingdom stood, that so he might not come altogether a Stranger when he came into it.

Queen Elizabeth indeed had left him not only a Kingdom, but a Kingdom without Incumbrance; no Wars abroad, no Sedition at home; and not only so, but a Kingdom furnish'd with all the Fruits of Peace, plenty of all things necessary, and of all necessary things, the chiefest, a wise Council; for she left Sir Thomas Egerton Lord Chancellor, Thomas Lord Buckhurst Lord Treasurer, Charles Earl of Nottingham Lord Admiral, and Sir Robert Cecil Principal Secretary: Four such Men, that the meanest of them were sufficient to sit at the Helm of any Kingdom. Yet to these, and divers others besides (all whom the King now by his Letters authorizeth to exercise their several Places, as formerly they had done) he addeth certain new ones of his own chusing, as namely, the Earls of Northumberland and Cumberland, the Lord Thomas Howard, and then after the Lord Henry Howard, the one the Brother, the other the Son of the late Duke of Norfolk, who had suffer'd so much, that at last he suffer'd for the Queen his Mother. But altho' the calling of these two last to such Place was done (no doubt) out of Favour to that House, yet one of them being known, the other doubted, to be a Papist, it was presently apprehended as a Favour to that Side: And the Catholics were not a little confident of his good Inclination to them all in general. And it was indeed but necessary they should at this time have such a Conceit; for in the late Queen's sickness, a

lors,

An. Dom. 1603. little before her Death, Pope Clement VIII. had written two Briefs to the Catholics in England, to admit of none to succeed in the Kingdom, when that miserable Woman should happen to die, (so he pleas'd to stile the most glorious Queen that ever liv'd) but such a one of whose good Inclination to the See of Rome they should at least be well perswaded.

The King sets forward into England.

And now King James having settled the Government of his Kingdom of Scotland, and made convenient Preparation for his Journey, on the Fifth of April 1603, he set forward, and rode that Day from Edinburgh to Dinglaffe, and from thence the next Day to Berwick, where having stay'd two Days, the Eighth of April he rode to Witherington, a House of Sir Robert Cary's; from thence the Ninth to Newcastle, where he stay'd Sunday, and heard the Bishop of Durham preach: And so joyful were the Townsmen of his being there, that all the time of his stay they bore the Charges of his Household. The Thirteenth of April he set forward to Durham, thence the 14th to Walthworth, the 15th towards York, where his Train increas'd to such a multitude, that he was fain to publish an Inhibition of the Peoples resorts and flocking to him.

To whom it belong'd to bear the Sword before the King at York.

At York it was a Question to whom it belong'd to bear the Sword before the King in that place; for both the Earl of Cumberland claim'd it as hereditary to his House, and the President of the North claim'd it as belonging to his Place, but it was adjudg'd to George Earl of Cumberland, who accordingly did it. From York, the Eighteenth Day, the King rode to Grimstone, to a House of Sir Edward Stanhope's; the Nineteenth to Pomfret, and so to Doncaster, where he lodg'd at the Sign of the Bear and Sun. The Twentieth of April he rode towards Worsuppe, a House of the Earl of Shrewsbury; from thence the Twenty-first to Newark upon Trent, where a Cutpurse being taken in the Fact, was by the King's Warrant hang'd; a most unseasonable Delinquent, who would force the King to a Work of Justice at a time when he intended nothing but Mercy! the Twenty-second to Beaver Castle, a House of the Earl of Rutland's, hunting all the way as he rode: From Beaver the twenty-third to Burleigh, where having staid two or three Days, the Twenty-seventh he remov'd to Hinchinbrook, a House of Sir Oliver Cromwel's, where the Heads of the University of Cambridge met him: From thence he rode towards Royston, and as he pass'd thro' Godmanchester, a Town close by Huntingdon, the Bailiffs of the Town presented him with 70 Team of Horse, all trac'd to fair new Ploughs; at which the King wondering, they said, It was their ancient Custom so to do, when any King of England pass'd thro' their Town, and by which, as being the King's Tenants, they held their Land. At Royston he lodg'd that Night, at Mr. Chester's House, at his own charge, which he had not done before since his coming into England. The 30th of April he rode to Standon, a House of Sir Thomas Sadler's, where he staid Sunday and heard the Bp of London preach. The 2d of May he removed to Broxbourn, a House of Sir Henry Cocks, Cofferer to the late Queen, and now to the King, where met him the Lord-keeper, the Lord-Treasurer, the Lord-Admiral, and divers other Lords: The 3d of

May he came to Theobalds, a House of Sir Robert Cecil, when all the Lords of the late Queen's most honourable Privy-Council presented themselves, and there the Lord-keeper made a grave Oration. At this House, the 4th of May, the King made divers Noblemen of Scotland of his Privy-Council here in England, namely, the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Marre, the Lord Hume, and Sir George Hume Treasurer of Scotland, Sir James Elphinston his Secretary, and the Lord of Kinlofs made afterward Master of the Rolls. Saturday the 7th of May he rode towards London, where by the way the Sheriff Swinnerton and the Aldermen met him, and by their Orator Mr. Richard Martin made him an eloquent Oration, and then he rode on to the Charter-house near Smithfield, a House belonging to the Lord Thomas Howard, where he staid four Days, and at his departing from thence made the Lord Zouch and the Lord Burgley of his Privy-Council. But we must not here omit, that from the King's first setting forth of Scotland, as he was in all places receiv'd with royal Entertainment and rich Presents, so he again carried himself most affable, and distributed his Favours in most plenteous manner, in some places discharging all Prisoners but such as lay for Treason or Murder; but especially in conferring the Order of Knighthood; of which sort the first he made was Mr. John Peyton, Son to Sir John Peyton, Lieutenant of the Tower; after him, divers Scots, in sundry places; at Theobalds twenty-eight (of which number the Compiler of this Work, tho' unworthy, was one); at the Charter-house above fourscore; and not many Days after, no fewer than at least a hundred; and before the Year went about, God knows how many hundreds, that one would wonder what the King would do with so many Milites, having no War toward; but it was indeed fit to give a Vent to the passage of Honour, which during Queen Elizabeth's Reign had been so stop't, that scarce any County of England had Knights enow to make a Jury.

An. Dom. 1603.

Divers Noblemen of Scotland made of his Privy-Council.

What number of Knights the King made.

Before we go further, 'twill not be amiss to shew what Great Men attended K. James out of Scotland, as namely, the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Marre, the Lord Hume, and many other great Lords, and many other whom he afterward made great Lords, as being in his special favour; first Sir George Hume, made afterward Earl of Dunbarre; then Sir Thomas Erskin, made Earl of Kelly; then Sir John Ramsay made Earl of Holderness; (which two last had the Fortune to come first in to his rescue against the Gowries) then Sir James Hay, made afterward Earl of Carlisle; and then Sir Richard Preston, made Earl of Kildare in Ireland, but whose great fortune by marrying the Heir of that Earldom was afterward the occasion of his great misfortune; for coming out of Ireland he was unfortunately cast away and drown'd.

With what great Lords the King came attended out of Scotland.

Sir Richard Preston, Earl of Kildare, unfortunately drown'd.

But tho' King James was now safely come himself to London, yet he accounted himself but half come, until his Queen and Children were come to him; and therefore there are now appointed to go and conduct 'em, of Lords, the Earl of Sussex, the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Compton, the Lord Norris, and Sir George Carew Knt. Lord President of Munster; of Ladies, the Countess of Worcester, the Countess of Kildare, the Lady Anne Herbert, Daughter to Henry Earl of Pembroke, broke; the Lord Scroope's Lady; the Lady Rich, Wife to the Lord Rich, and the Lady Walsingham one of the late Queen's Bedchamber: But altho' these only were appointed to go, yet many other Lords and great Ladies went of themselves to attend her Majesty, as, the Countess of Bedford, the Lady Hastings, the Lady Cecil, the Lady Hatton, the Lady Harrington, and divers other: And with this Princely attendance the Queen, with two of her Children, namely, Prince Henry, of the age of 9 years, and the Lady Elizabeth, on the eleventh of June came to York, where resting themselves some few days, on the 27th of June they came to Easton in Northamptonshire, a House of Sir George Fermor's, where the King met them at Dinner, and afterward they rode together to a House of Sir John Fortescue, and so to London. The King's younger Son, Charles Duke of Albany, came not at this time, as being not 3 years old, therefore not thought able to endure such a Journey; but the year following falling sick of a Fever, Dr. Atkins, one of the King's Physicians, was sent to conduct him, who in six weeks cured him of his Fever, and the first Week of October brought him safe to Windsor, where the King then lay; for which Service he was so well rewarded, that together with the gains of his usual Practice, he grew to a greater Wealth than was usual for Physicians.

Lords made by
the King.

King James had distributed the meaner Order of Knighthood very plentifully; now he thinks fit to raise his Distributions to a higher degree; and thereupon, the 20th of May, he made Sir Robert Cecil Baron of Esfindon, Sir Robert Sidney Baron of Penhurst, Sir William Knowles Baron of Greys, and Sir Richard Wootton Baron of Morley: Not long after he made the Lord Henry Howard Earl of Northampton, and Thomas Sackville Lord Buckhurst he made Earl of Dorset.

Ambassadors from all Princes of Christendom come to congratulate
the King's happy coming to the Crown.

The King had by this time found the Love and Affection of his own People, but the Affection of neighbouring Princes towards him stood yet in suspence; when now, to take away that doubt came first, in the beginning of June, an Ambassador from the Palgrave of Rhine, presently after another from the States of Holland and Zeland; another from the Archduke of Austria; another from the King of Spain; from the Seignior of Venice another; another from the Duke of Florence; and lastly, on the Eighth of June, Monf. de Rosny from the King of France; all congratulating his happy coming to the Crown of England: For entertaining of which Ambassadors, and all other that should come after, the King had erected an Office by the name of Master of the Ceremonies, allowing him 200 pounds a Year Fee; and the first that had the Place was Sir Lewis Lewkenor, a Gentleman, who, besides other good Parts, was very skilful in the neighbouring Languages.

Master of the Ceremonies erected.

Fourteen Serjeants at Law
made.

Upon the 17th of May this year were made fourteen Serjeants at Law, whereof eleven had receiv'd Writs the last Year of Queen Elizabeth, namely, Thomas Coventry, Robert Haughton, Lawrence Tanfield, John Crook, Thomas Foster, Edward Phillips, Thomas Harris, James Altham, Henry Hubbard, Augustine Nicholls, and Robert Parker; to whom the King added three new, John Sherly, Geo. Snygge, and Richard Hutton, who kept their Feast together in the Middle-Temple Hall.

One would think that at this time all Offences against Q. Elizabeth had been forgotten, but King James, more tender of Wrongs done to her than to himself, would not suffer Valentine Thomas so to escape; who, after he had lain many Years Prisoner in the Tower, was, on the 4th of June, arraign'd at the Kings-bench Bar, and for Conspiracy against the late Queen and some of her Council, on the 7th of June, after six a-clock at Night, drawn to St. Thomas Waterings, and there hang'd and quarter'd.

An. Dom.

Valentine Thomas, for Offences against Q. Elizabeth, hang'd and quarter'd.

About this time the Honourable Charles Lord Montjoy return'd out of Ireland, bringing along with him Hugh O-Neal Earl of Tir-Oen, at whose coming to the King, the Lord Montjoy was sworn of the King's Privy Council; and the Earl of Tir-Oen, who had been the cause of so much English Bloodshed, was yet pardon'd, and Proclamation made, That by all Men he should be used with Respect and Honour.

The Ld Montjoy brings Tir-Oen into England, who is fully pardon'd

All this while the King had mov'd within his own Sphere, and had done nothing out of the Realm. His first Employment abroad was now in June, to his Brother the King of Denmark, to whom he sent in Ambassage the Earl of Rutland, upon two Occasions; the one to be Godfather to his Son, who was named Christianus; the other, to present him with the Order of the Garter. Upon the like Employment, soon after, he sent the Lord Spencer to Frederick Duke of Wirtemberg; which Lords saw the said Princes invested with the Garter, and, after honourable Entertainment, return'd home.

The Earl of Rutland sent with the Garter to the King of Denmark; the Lord Spencer to the Duke of Wirtemberg.

'Twas now a time that every Man might sit under his Vine, and enjoy the Happiness of a peaceable Government; when suddenly, like a Storm in a fair Summer's Day, brake forth a Treason of a strange composition; for where in all Treasons commonly they are all of some one Faction, in this there were People of all sorts, Priests and Laymen, Papists and Protestants, Noblemen, Knights, and Gentlemen; that one would think it should be a well-manag'd Treason, and yet was the shallow'st that was ever set on foot; so shallow, that it could scarce be observ'd, either what the Authors of it ail'd, or what it was they would have done. Indeed the great favour which King James at his first coming to the Crown shew'd to the Earl of Southampton, was like to breed no good Blood in those that were his Opposites; and it was said (how true I know not) that as the King had sent to enlarge the E. of Southampton, and appointed him to meet him upon the Way, so when he heard of an Intention that the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh had to meet him, he sent them word, they should spare their Labour: But whether it were so, or no, it seems they found some cause of Discontentment, and Discontentment will never want Complices: And by this Means was the Composition of this Treason made up; and thereupon were apprehended Henry Lord Cobham and George Brook his Brother, Thomas Lord Grey of Wilton, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Griffith Markham, and Sir Edw. Parham, Knights, Bartholomew Brookesby and Anthony Copley, Gentlemen, William Watson and William Clerk, Priests: But tho' they were apprehended in July, yet they came not to their Arraignment till November folfollowing; for, by reason of the Sickness, which was then hot in London, the Term was put off till Craftino Martini, and then to be kept at Winchester in Hampshire; only the Courts of the Exchequer, Wards and Liveries, and the Dut- chy of Lancaster, were kept in the King's Ma- nor at Richmond in the County of Surry: And so, on the 4th of November following, all the 'fore said Delinquents were remov'd from the Tower of London, and other Prisons, by strong Guards to Winchester, and there arraign'd, whose Indictment was for conspiring,

1. To kill the King.
2. To raise Rebellion.
3. To alter Religion.
4. To subvert the State.
5. To procure Invasion by Strangers.

Concerning the first Point, it was prov'd, That the Lord Grey intended to obtain a le- vy of 2000 Men, for defence of the Low- Countries, and with them to seize upon the King and Prince, and take the Lords of the Council in their Chambers. For the other Points, it was proved, That the Lord Cobham, and Sir Walter Raleigh, met at St. Martins in the Fields, and there consulted about raising Sedition, moving Rebellion, altering Religion, sub- verting the State, and to set up the Lady Arabella. And particularly for the Point of sub- verting the State, it was proved, That Watson was designed to be Lord Chancellor, George Brook Lord Treasurer, Sir Griffith Markham Se- cretary, and the Lord Grey to be Master of the Horse, and Earl-Marshal of England. And for effecting of these Treasons, it was proved, that Watson the Priest had devised Oaths in writing, by which all Parties were bound to keep them secret. And for the last Point, it was proved, that Sir Walter Raleigh was appointed to treat with Count Aremberg for 600000 Crowns, and the Lord Cobham to get to the Archduke and the King of Spain to perswade them to assist the Lady Arabella. These things being prov'd against them, on the Days in which they were severally indicted, the most which was repli- ed in mitigation of their Fault, was first by Watson, who affirmed it could not be Treason, because the King was not yet Crown'd; and then by the Lord Grey, That it was but a ver- bal Matter, and never took Effect, therefore could be no Treason. But these Assertions be- ing both refuted, they were all (except Sir Ed- ward Parham, who only was acquitted) on their several Days of Indictment, found guilty of Treason, and had Judgment accordingly. The Priests, Watson and Clerk, were executed at Winchester the 29th of November; George Brook was beheaded the 5th of December, but then the Hand of Justice stay'd; and this was the course the King held in shewing Mercy. After the Death of the Three before named, he sign'd three other Warrants for the Execution of the late Lord Cobham, Lord Grey, and Sir Griffith Markham, on a certain Day then following; but before that Day he privately framed another Warrant, written with his own Hand to the Sheriff, (who was then Sir Benjamin Tichburn) by which he countermanded the former War- rants; and, that there might be no notice took of it, he sent it by Mr. John Gybbe, a Scotchman, and one utterly unknown of all the Company, appointing him to deliver it so, that it might not take effect till after their several Confessi- ons, and at the very point of their Execution, which was accordingly perform'd: At which time 'twas a wonderful thing to see how the Delinquents, falling upon their Knees, lamen- ted their Misdoings; and most of all, how they extoll'd the King's unspeakable Mercy. But tho' thus pardon'd, yet were they carried back to the Tower, where the Lord Grey not long af- ter died, and in him was extinct that Barony, which had formerly brought forth many valo- rous and worthy Men. Sir Griffith Markham, after some time, was set at liberty, and passed beyond Sea, where he liv'd long after in mean account. The Lord Cobham likewise was after- ward discharg'd of Imprisonment, but depriv'd of his Estate, liv'd many years in great penury, and in him ended that noble Family, which had flourish'd in great Honour many Ages. Sir Wal- ter Raleigh was kept in the Tower, where, to his great Honour, he spent his time in Writing, and had been a happy Man if he had never been releas'd: But such is our state, that no Man's Fortune is understood, whether it be good or bad, until discover'd by the Event.

But in this mean time many Things had pass'd; for his Majesty having deferr'd the Feast of St. George until his being at some of his own Houses, held now the said Feast at Windsor the 2d of July, where the Prince was install'd Knight of the Garter; as also the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Marre, and the Earl of Pembroke; and at the same time were elected the King of Den- mark, and the Duke of Wirtemberg, tho' their investing have been spoken of before.

And now was Preparation made for the King's Coronation; and for a Preparative to it he first restor'd the Earl of Southampton, and then rais'd in Honour these following; Sir Thomas Egerton Lord-Chancellor, he made Baron of Elf- mere; Sir William Russell, Baron of Thornough; Sir Henry Grey, Baron of Groby; Sir John Peter, Baron of Writtle; Sir John Harington, Baron of Exton; Sir Henry Denvers, Baron of Dantsey; Sir Tho. Gerrard, Baron of Gerrard Bromley in the County of Stafford; and Sir Robert Spencer, Baron of Wormleyton. After this, he conferr'd inferiour Orders, and made Knights all the Judges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerks of the Signet, all his Gentlemen-Ushers and divers other, and lastly, made 62 Knights of the Bath, most of 'em Noblemens Sons, and the rest Gentlemen of special Worth. These things done, on the 25th of July, being Saint James's Day, the King and Queen were toge- ther crown'd and anointed at Westminster by the Hands of John Whitgift Archbishop of Canter- bury, in presence of the Nobility and others, namely, Sir Robert Lee, Lord-Mayor of London, in a Gown of Crimson Velvet, his Brethren the Aldermen in Gowns of Scarlet, and 12 principal Citizens admitted to attend them, all other Citizens stay'd from passing thither, ei- ther by Water or Land, by reason of the Sick- ness: And the first of August following, all Suitors were by Proclamation forbidden to re- pair to the Court till the Winter following.

the King's

The King's
Presents to the King and Queen of Spain.

At this time the King forgot not a deliverance he had formerly had; which, tho' it were had in Scotland, yet he would have notice of it taken in England; which was, his deliverance from the Conspiracy of the Gowries on the 5th day of August three years before; and thereupon Friday being the 5th of August, was by Commandment appointed to be Holiday, with Morning-prayer, Sermons, and Evening-prayer that Day, and Bonfires at Night; which was then, and after, during his Life, solemnly observ'd.

King James had in him as 'twere two Persons, one as he was King of Scotland, (and in this he was in perfect Amity with the King of Spain) another as he was King of England, and in this he had some Difference with Spain; but he, as Rex pacificus, took the best from both, and was altogether for the Olivebranch, and thereupon when at his coming into England, he found Letters of Mart granted against the Spaniards, he first caus'd them all to be call'd in, and then consented to a Treaty of perfect reconciliation: In which Treaty, handled at London the 18th of August 1604, the Commissioners for the King of England were Tho. Earl of Dorset, Charles Earl of Nottingham, Charles Earl of Devonshire, Henry Earl of Northampton, and Robert Viscount Cranburn. For the King of Spain, John de Velasco Constable of Castile, John de Tassis Earl of Villa Mediana, and Alexander Robidius Professor of the Law in the College of Millain: For the Archdukes, Charles Count of Aramburg, John Richardot President of the Privy-Council, and Lodowick Werreikin Principal Secretary. By whom a Peace being concluded and continued in many Articles, the Summer following the King of Spain sent Don John de Velasco Constable of Castile and Duke of Fryas, also Pedraca de la Syerra, his Great Chamberlain, accompanied with divers Marqueses, Earls, and Barons; who coming into England, were by the Earl of Devonshire, on the 19th of August, brought to the Court, where the King in his Chapel, in the presence of the Commissioners and other English Lords, (the Duke of Fryas holding the King's Hands between his) took his Oath upon the Holy Bible, religiously to observe and keep all the Articles of the Peace and League agreed upon: And in March following, being now the Third Year of King James, Charles Earl of Nottingham, Lord High-Admiral of England, was sent into Spain, to take in like manner the King of Spain's Oath; who, accompanied with three Barons, and many Knights, Gentlemen, and others, to the number of 650, the 15th of April arriv'd at the Groyne, whence he was conducted to Valledolid, 300 Miles off, where the King of Spain then kept his Court, being entertain'd in all Places as he pass'd at the King of Spain's charge, with so great Provisions, and such demonstration of Love and Gladness, that it plainly shew'd the Spaniards were as glad of our Friendship as we of theirs.

The Lord-Ambassador being come to the Court, he caus'd Thomas Knoll Esq; to deliver the Presents sent from the King of England, which were Six goodly Horses, with Saddles and Saddle-cloths very richly embroider'd, whereof three for the King, and three for the Queen; two Cross-bows, with sheafs of Arrows; four Fowling-pieces inlaid with Plates of Gold, and a couple of Lyme-hounds of singular Qualities; which the King and Queen in very kind manner accepted: And then, on the 30th of May, the Lord-Ambassador being sent for, the King came forth into a large Room, where having a little Table set before him, and a Bible very reverently laid upon it, together with a Crucifix, the Archbishop of Toledo read the Oath, at the reading whereof the Lord-Ambassador held the King's Hands between his, and the King kneeling laid his Hands upon the Book, and after his Oath, subscrib'd to the Articles formerly concluded. Whilst the Earl of Nottingham was thus imploy'd in Spain, the Right Honourable Edward Earl of Hertford was likewise sent Ambassador to Albertus and Isabella, Archdukes of Austria, to take their Oaths for confirmation of the said Articles of Peace, which were taken at Brussels the first of May with great state and solemnity: After which, as the Earl bestow'd on the Archduke's Servants to the full Sum of 3000 Pounds, so the Archduke, at his departure, bestow'd upon the Earl a Jewel worth 900 Pounds, and a Suit of Arras worth 300, and bore his Charges all the time of his stay at Brussels. And now was K. James truly Rex pacificus, in Peace and Amity with all Princes of Christendom, which few of his Ancestors ever were.

A little before this, in the Month of August, Ostend taken in the Year 1604, the strong Town of Ostend in Flanders, after above 3 years siege, and the slaughter of above 120000 Men of both sides, and in defence whereof Sir Francis Vere General, and his Brother Sir Horatio Vere, had shew'd great Valour, was by the Marquis Spinola taken, for which Service the King of Spain made him Duke of Santa Severina, and the Lord-General of all the Forces in the Low-Countries.

It was now the Third Year of King James's Reign, when he kept St. George's Feast at Greenwich, and there made two new Knights of the Garter, namely, the High and Mighty Prince Duke Ulrick, Heir of Norway, and Brother to our gracious Queen ANN; and the Right Noble Lord Henry Howard Earl of Northampton. And upon the Saturday following, in the Hall at Greenwich, being richly hung with Arras, he created three Earls, one Viscount, and four Barons; namely, Sir Robert Cecil, Viscount Cranburn, he created Earl of Salisbury: Tho. Cecil, Lord Burleigh, his eldest Brother, he created Earl of Exeter; and Philip Herbert, younger Brother to the Earl of Pembroke, he created Earl of Montgomery: Then Robert Sidney, Baron of Penhurst, Lord-Chamberlain to the Queen, he created Viscount Lisle: Sir John Stanhope, Vicechamberlain to the King, he made Lord Stanhope of Harrington: Sir George Carew, Vicechamberlain to the Queen, he made Lord Carew of Clifton: Mr. Tho. Arundel, of Devonshire, he made Lord Arundel of Warder; and Mr. William Cavendish he made Lord Cavendish of Hardwick.

About this time a strange Fancy possess'd the Brains of a profess'd Physician, one Richard Haddock, of New-College in Oxford, who pretended to preach at Night in his Sleep, in such sort, that tho' he were call'd aloud, or stirr'd and pull'd by the Hands or Feet, yet would make no shew of either hearing or feeling: And this he did often in the presence of many honourable Persons that came to hear him, so as within a short time his Fame was spread thro' the Land by the name of The sleeping Preacher. At length the King commanded him to be brought to the Court, where his Majesty sat up the most part of a Night to attend the event; when at last Haidock making a shew to be asleep, began to pray; then taking a Text, made his division, applying it to his Purpose; for in his Preaching his Use was to inveigh against the Pope, against the Cross in Baptism, and against the last Canons of the Church of England; and having ended his Sermon, seem'd to continue sleeping. His Majesty having well observ'd the manner of his carriage, after a few days, call'd the said Haidock before him, and in conference with him (as he had indeed an admirable Sagacity in discovering of Fictions) made him confess, that all he did was but Imposture; and thereupon to fall upon his Knees and ask forgiveness, which the King granted, upon condition that in all places he should openly acknowledge his Offence, because many were brought into belief, that his nightly Preaching was either by Inspiration or by Vision.

We may not here think it unworthy the relating, seeing K. James thought it not unworthy the seeing, thereby to observe the nature of the Lyon, and make a solemn matter of it: For on Monday the 3d of June (taking with him the Duke of Lenox, and divers Earls and Lords) he went to the Lyons Tower, and caused two Lyons, a male and female, to be put forth, and then a live Cock to be cast before them, which they (as being their natural Enemy) presently kill'd, and suck'd his Blood. Then a live Lamb was put down to them, which the generous Lyons (as having respect to its Innocency) never offer'd to touch, tho' the Lamb was so bold as to go close to them. Then the King caused those Lyons to be taken away, and another Lyon to be put forth, and two Mastiffs to be put in to him, who presently flew upon the Lyon, and turn'd him upon his Back; and tho' the Lyon were superior to them in Strength, yet it seems they were his match in Courage, and so much superior as they were first assailants, with whom otherwise perhaps the Lyon would not have offer'd to meddle.

On Friday the 4th of January, in the King's second Year, Charles Duke of Albany, the King's second Son, being then but four years old, was created Duke of York, which because 'twas done with extraordinary solemnity, is not unworthy to have the manner of it here related. First were appointed Knights of the Bath, the Duke of Albany himself, then the Lord Willowby, the Lord Chandois, the Lord Compton, the Lord Norris, William Cecil Son and Heir to the Viscount Cranburn, Allen Percy Brother to the Earl of Northumberland, Tho. Somerset second Son to the Earl of Worcester, Francis Mannors Brother to the Earl of Rutland, Tho. Howard second Son to the Earl of Suffolk, and John Harington Son and Heir to the Lord Harington; the Earls of Oxford and Essex were Esquires to the Duke of Albany: All the Knights took their lodging that Night in the first Gatehouse going to King-street, where they supped, and had Baths provided for 'em; the next Morning being Saturday, they went into the Park in their Hermits Weeds, the Minstrels playing and the Heralds going before them into the Court, and so into the Chappel, where every Knight with his Esquires went to the Altar, and there offered, (the Dean of the Chappel, in a rich Cope, holding the Bason.) After this they went up into their Lodgings, and there new attired themselves in Robes of Crimson Taffaty, with Hats and white Feathers, and so went back to the great Chamber: where, by the King, they were girded with the Sword, and had gilt spurs put upon them. This done, they were solemnly served at Dinner, and after went again to the Chapel, and there offered their Swords. The next day being Sunday, and Twelfth-day, in Robes of purple Satin, with Doctors Hoods on their Shoulders, and Hats with white Feathers, they issued out of the Revelstry with the Duke of Albany (being then to be made Duke of York) into the Hall, where the King sat under the Cloth of Estate, and then the Heralds going before, the Knights of the Bath follow'd, and then the Earl of Suffolk Lord-Chamberlain came alone; then follow'd Henry Howard Earl of Northampton, and Charles Blount Earl of Devonshire, carrying the Robes of Estate for the Duke of York; after whom Wriothesley Earl of Southampton carried the Coronet, George Clifford Earl of Cumberland the golden Rod, the Earl of Worcester the Cap of Estate, and the Earl of Nottingham bore the Duke of Albany in his Arms, supported by the Earls of Dorset and Northumberland; who all coming in this order before the King, the Duke of Albany was, after the Patent read, created Duke of York, with the Robes and Coronet put on him, and the golden Rod deliver'd into his Hand: All which perform'd, they went to Dinner, and the Solemnity ended.

About this time, on the 15th of June, Tho. Douglas, a Scotch-man, was committed to the Tower, and had Irons put upon him, being sent hither but 3 days before from the Count Palatine of Rhine. His Offence was, he had counterfeited the King's Privy-Seal to divers Princes of Germany; one to the Archbishop of Cologne, another to the Archbishop of Trier, another to the Duke of Cleve, another to the Archbishop of Magumia, and a fifth to the Count Palatine of the Rhine; whereof being examin'd and convicted, he was drawn on a Hurdle into Smithfield, and there hanged and quarter'd.

And now was a second Parliament appointed to be held at Westminster, on the 19th of March following; when, four days before the day of sitting, the King, the Queen, and Prince rode solemnly in great state thro' the City of London, where in divers places were erected Pageants, Presents given, Orations made, and all Demonstrations of Love and Observance: And the Parliament beginning, the King made a long and loving Speech to the House, wherein he signified the Causes of his calling it: But, in the time when it should have proceeded, there was suddenly discover'd a Plot of Treason, so damnable and foul, that Posterity will hardly think it true, when they shall hear of it. The Plot was, to blow up with Gun-powder both Houses of Parliament, at a time when the King, Prince, and all the Nobility should be sitting in the upper House, and all the Knights and Burgesses in the lower.

The

An. Reg.
1605.By whom first plotted.And with what Assistants.By what means first discovered:

The principal contriver of this Plot was Robert Catesbie, a Gentleman of great account in Northamptonshire, descended from that Catesbie who had been a special Counsellor of King Richard the third, to whose Family the Divine Providence had now ordained to give a disastrous period. This Catesbie, not able to perform the work himself alone, draws in many to assist him, as namely, Thomas Percy, Thomas Winter, John Grant, Ambrose Rookwood, John Wright, Francis Tresham, Guido Fawkes, and at last Sir Everard Digby, all earnest Papists, and all bound by Oath, and by receiving the Sacrament to be secret: For effecting of this Plot, they hired a House close adjoyning to the Upper House of Parliament; where they were to dig through a Wall, for the fit placing of their Powder. About Candlemas they had wrought the Wall half through; when suddenly they heard a noise in the next Room, which made them fear they had been discovered; but sending Guy Fawkes (who went now under the Name of John Johnson, as Mr. Percy's Man) to see what the matter was: He brought word, that it was a Cellar where Sea-coals had been laid, and were now a felling, and the Room offer'd to be Let for a yearly Rent. This Room therefore, as most fit for their purpose, being right under the Parliament House, Mr. Percy presently went and hired, laying into it twenty Barrels of Powder, which they covered with Billets and Faggots, from being discovered. Thus the first part of the Plot was put in good readines. It now remained to consider what was to be done, when the blow should be given: For though the King and Prince might be slain, yet the Duke of York and the Lady Elizabeth should still be safe, and so they should be no nearer their end than now they were. This work therefore for surprizing the Duke of York, Percy undertook; and for surprizing the Lady Elizabeth, they agreed upon a Match of Hunting near to Dunchurch, under colour whereof they would draw Company together, and surprize her at the Lord Harrington's House in Warwickshire, where she then lay, and then proclaim her Queen, and so be sure to have all things done as they would themselves. Thus far their bloody Plot went fairly on, and had perhaps gone on so still, if they had continued only bloody; but now a tenderness of Heart took some of them, lest their Friends should perish together with the rest, and this tenderness overthrows them; for to prevent such promiscuous Slaughter, a Letter was framed and sent to the Lord Montague, Son and Heir to the Lord Morley, brought him by one of his Footmen, which he received from an unknown Man in the Street: The Letter was this; My Lord, out of the Love I bear to some of your Friends, I have a Care of your Preservation; therefore I would wish you, as you tender your Life, to forbear your Attendance at this Parliament; for God and Man have concurred to punish the Wickedness of this Time: And think not slightly of this Advertisement: For though there be no appearance of any stir; yet, I say, they shall receive a terrible Blow this Parliament, and yet shall not see who hurts them. This Counsel is not to be contemned; because it may do you good, and can do you no harm; for the Danger is past as soon as you have burnt this Letter; and I hope you will make good use of it.

My Lord having read the Letter, though much perplexed, yet went presently to the Court at White-hall, (the King being then a hunting at Royston) and delivered it to the Earl of Salisbury, principal Secretary of State; and the Earl having read it, acquainted first the Lord Chamberlain with it, and then the Lord Admiral, the Earl of Worcester and Northampton, who as soon as the King was returned from hunting, acquainted him with it, the Earl of Salisbury telling him, that he thought it must be written either by a Fool, or Madman, because of those Words, (for the danger is past as soon as you have burnt this Letter) for if the Danger were so soon past, what needed any warning? But the King considering it more deeply, apprehended presently some violent motion; and that it must be some sudden danger by blowing up with Powder; and thereupon commanded diligent search should be made in the Parliament-House, and all other Rooms and Lodgings near adjoyning: Which Search was made by the Lord Chamberlain, accompanied with the Lord Montague, who entering the Cellar under the Upper House, found there great store of Faggots and Billets; which was answered to be for Mr. Percy's own Provision: But then (it being considered why such store should be laid in for Mr. Percy, who used to make but little stay in Town) and thereupon more diligent search being made, there was found under the Billets one of the Barrels of Powder; and after that all the rest, being six and thirty; together with other Instruments fit for their purpose, and then spying the said Fawkes to stand suspiciously, they apprehended him, and found in his Pocket a piece of Touchwood, a Tinder-box to light the Touchwood, and a Watch, which Mr. Percy had bought the Day before to try the short and long burning of the Touchwood, which he had prepared to give fire to the Train of Powder. The Plot being thus discovered, yet the most of the Confederates met at Dunchurch, as they had agreed; where they divulged many detestable untruths against the King and State; signifying withal, that they were there met for advancement of the Catholick Cause; hoping thereby to have many to joyn with them in their Rebellion: But this availed them nothing; for first Sir Richard Verney high Sheriff of Warwickshire, chased them from thence, and Sir Richard Welsh Sheriff of Worcestershire, knowing them to be entered into Mr. Littleton's House at Walbach, beset them round, where Catesbie and Percy issuing forth, were both slain with one shot of a Musquet; and after them, both the Wrights, John and Christopher, were likewise slain outright: Thomas Winter was taken alive; all which time Francis Tresham remained still about the Court, offering his service for their suppression; but being suspected, was examined, and sent to the Tower, where he confessed all, and within a few Days after dyed of the Strangury. On the seven and twentieth of January following, a Commission was directed to divers Lords and Judges of both Benches, for tryal of the rest of the Confederates; namely, Thomas Winter, Guido Fawks, Robert Keyes, Thomas Bates, Robert Winter, late of Hoodington in Warwickshire Esq; John Graunt, late of Tortbrook in the County of Warwick Esq; Ambrose Rookwood, late of Stainingfield in Suffolk Esq; Sir Everard Digby, late of Gottburst in Buckinghamshire, Knight, who were all condemned, and had Judgment to die, and on the Thursday following Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, Graunt and Bates, were accordingly drawn, hanged and quartered, at the West End of Paul's Church in London, and on the Friday the other four; namely, Thomas Winter, Keys, Rookwood and Fawks, were executed in the Parliament Yard at Westminster. Of all whom, none was so much lamented as Sir Everard Digby; and indeed worthily; for he was of a goodly Personage, and of excellent Parts, and had, it seems, been cunningly drawn in, and bound to secrecy by Oath, when he little thought of any such Treason. The 7th. of November the Earl of Northumberland, upon suspicion of being acquainted with the Plots, was first commanded to his House, and after a while committed to the Tower. And thus was this great Plot discovered, and the Plotters punished, to the great rejoycing of all People; insomuch, that even the King of Spain's and Arch-Duke's Embassadors made Bonfires, and threw Money among the People in token of Joy. And at this time, on the fourth of January, the Spanish Embassador delivered a Present to the King from the King his Master; namely, six Jennets of Andalusia, with Saddles very rich embroidered, and Saddle-cloths of Cloth of Tissue: One of which Jennets was snow-white, and had a Main which reached to the Ground. But this was a Present sent before any knowledge had of the Powder-Treason: But as soon as that was known, there was presently another Present sent from the Queen of Spain to the Queen of England, on purpose to congratulate the King's happy deliverance from the intended Powder-Treason; and the Present was brought by Don John de Mendoza, which was a Robe of Murrie Sattin, embroidered all over with Amber-leather; and upon the Leather, in every Seam and Skirt, twice embroider'd about with Gold; the fore-part whereof were set with eight and forty Taggs three Inches long of beaten Gold, hollow within, and filled with Ambergrise; also two large Chains of Ambergrise; two Carkanets of Ambergrise, a Velvet-Cap with Gold Buttons, curiously enamelled, and a Girdle suitable to the Buttons; all which were presented together in a large Vessel of Gold, in form of a Bason; so as it seems there was none rejoyced more for the overthrow of this Plot for the Catholick Cause, than the Catholick King himself. And now King James, not to be unmindful to the Lord Monteagle, for being the means of discovering this Treason, he gave unto him in Fee-Farm of Crown Land 200 l. to him and his Heirs, and 500 l. a year besides during his Life: And not to be unthankful to God for the Deliverance, he caused the fifth of November, being the Day of the discovery, to be kept holy, with Prayer and Thanksgiving to God, which was then solemnly performed and hath been since, and is likely for ever to be continued.

But in the midst of this great Joy, there was suddenly spread a Rumour of great Sorrow, for on Saturday the 22d of March News was brought to the Court for certain, that the King was slain at Oking, twenty Miles from London, stabbed with an invenomed Knife; whereupon the Court Gates were presently shut, and double Guard set in all Places about London, and all Mens Minds were infinitely distracted; but within two Hours all these Clouds were dispersed, and the Sun began to shine out again; and it was certainly known, that the King was safe, and in perfect Health: For which a Proclamation was presently sent forth to signify it to the People; and that Afternoon the King came himself to White-hall, where thousands of People ravished with Joy came flocking to see him; and so general was the rejoycing, that the Spanish Embassador gave Sir Lewis Lewknor, Master of the Ceremonies, a Chain of Gold of good value, for bringing him the News: Though after it was thought by some, that this Rumour was but politickly devised to make the Parliament and People more tender of the King's safety, and by making them more sensible what a Treasure they had of his Life, to make them more willing to part with their Treasure for his living, as indeed this Parliament did, giving more Subsidies than are usual.

The 28th of March following, Henry Garnet, Provincial of the English Jesuits, was arraigned in Guild-hall, for concealing the fore-said Treason, where he had Judgment to be hanged, drawn and quartered; and accordingly, on the 3d of May, was drawn from the Tower to the West End of Paul's Church, and there executed. At his Death he confessed his Fault, and asked Forgiveness, and exhorted all Catholicks never to attempt any Treason against the King or State, as a Course which God would never prosper.

On Tuesday the 20th of May were enstalled at *Windso*r Knights of the Garter, Robert Cecil Earl of Salisbury, and Thomas Howard Viscount Byndon; both of them honourably attended, but the Earl of Salisbury beyond ordinary promotion.

There was yet a Fag-end of the late Powder-Treason behind to be examined; whereupon two Barons of the Realm; namely, Henry Lord Mordant, and Edward Lord Sturton, were brought from the Tower to the Star chamber, and there, not charged indeed with any point of the Treason, but only reflectingly, because they neglected to appear at the Parliament, according to their Summons, for which neglect only, without any further charge, they were fined to pay to the King, the Lord Mordant ten thousand Marks, and the Lord Sturton six thousand, and to be Prisoners during the King's pleasure. But on the 27th of June, Henry Earl of Northumberland was likewise brought from the Tower to the Star chamber, and more directly charged with Circumstances concerning the Treason, especially in regard of Thomas Percy, whom he had admitted admitted to be one of the King's Gentlemen Pensioners, without administering unto him the Oath of Supremacy, knowing him to be a Refusant; for which, and some misprisions, he was fined to pay to the King thirty thousand Pounds, to forfeit all his Offices, and to be kept Prisoner during the King's pleasure, as indeed he continued many Years, and at last released; was yet confined.

It was now the fourth Year of King James's Reign, and was a time of Princely Visitation; for this Summer, the 17th. of July, Christian King of Denmark, Brother to the Queen, having been long expected, with eight Ships came into the River of Thames, and anchored before Gravesend; to whom the next Day, King James with Prince Henry, and divers of the Lords went by Barge, and conducted him to London, where he stayed till the 12th of August following: In which time, he was entertained with all the Magnificence that could be devised; the King and he riding in great state through the City, where Pageants in many places were erected; and after he had been shewed the chief Places about London; as namely, the Old Exchange, the Tower, the Monuments at Westminster, and had gone up to the Top of Pauls, had been feasted by the King, by the Earl of Salisbury, four Days together at Theobalds; had seen Tilting, Fencing, Wrestling, and many other Pastimes; on the 12th of August, conducted by the King, the Queen and Prince with many other great Lords, he departed to his Ships, and in eight Days arrived at home: A happy thing when Princes can converse together like private Persons, and are not kept asunder with Jealousies of State.

Francis Prince of Vaudemont comes to England, with what great Train, and of his Entertainment.

After the King of Denmark's departure, on the 23d. of September arrived at London Francis Prince of Vaudemont, third Son to the Duke of Lorraine, accompanied with seven Earls, ten Barons, forty Gentlemen of Quality, and six-score of common Persons, who all, the 25th of September, went by Coach to the King at Hampton-Court, where 14 Days together they were feasted and royally entertained, and then returned.

An Insurrection in Northamptonshire and Warwickshire, about Inclosures by Captain Pouch, and how suppressed.

But these Festivals were followed with a little disturbance; for in May, the Year after, great Assemblies were gathered together in Northamptonshire, Warwickshire and Leicestershire, throwing down Inclosures at first, without any particular head: But at last rose up a base Fellow, called John Reynolds, whom they named Captain Pouch, because he had a great Leather Pouch hanging by his Side, who affirmed to the Company, that in that Pouch he had sufficient to defend them against all comers: But when he was afterward apprehended, and his Pouch searched, there was nothing found in it but a piece of green Cheese. Proclamation was made, commanding them to surcease their Disorder: But this prevailed nothing, till the King sent Henry Earl of Huntington, Thomas Earl of Exeter, Edward Lord Zouch, and Sir Edward Cook Lord chief Justice of England, to suppress them by force of Arms, and to punish the Levellers according to the nature of their Offences; some by Death, as for Treason; some by Fines, as for Routs; but Captain Pouch was made exemplar.

On Friday the 12th of June his Majesty, attended with divers Lords, dined with the Lord Mayor Sir John Wats, who after dinner presented him with a Purse full of Gold, and humbly besought his Majesty, that he would be pleased to be Free of his Company, the Cloth-workers: To which the King graciously condescended; and thereupon called to Sir William Stone Master of their Company, and said, Stone, give me thy Hand; and now I am a Cloth-worker: And in token of my special Favour to this Fraternity, I do here give to this Company a Brace of Bucks yearly for ever, against the Time of the Election of the Master and Wardens: At which time also many Lords and Gentlemen were made Free of the Cloth-workers.

On Thursday the 16th. of July, the King and Prince with many Lords dined at Merchant-Taylors Hall, where the Master and Warden of that Society presented the King with a Purse of Gold, giving him humble thanks for gracing their Fraternity with his Royal Presence; and therewithal shewed him a Roll, wherein were registered the Names of 7 Kings, 1 Queen, 17 Princes and Dukes, 2 Dutcheses, 1 Archbishop, 31 Earls, 66 Barons, 7 Abbots, 7 Priors, with a great number of Knights and Esquires, who had been free of that Company; which his Majesty graciously accepted, but told them, that he himself was already Free of another Company; but the Prince his Son should be Free of theirs, and that he would see the Garland put on his Head: Whereupon the Master presented the Prince also with a Purse of Gold, which he graciously accepted, and said, that not only himself would be Free of the Merchant-Taylors, but the Lords also that were with him should do the like; all which was performed with great Solemnity.

The 4th. of July this Year, Sir Thomas Knevet was called by Writ to the Parliament by the Name of Baron of Esrick: The next Day Sir Julius Caesar, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was sworn a Privy-Councillor; and the 16th. of November following Sir Jervis Clifton, Knight, was called to the Parliament by Writ, by the Name and Title of Baron of Layton Bramfiewold, whose only Daughter and Heir was soon after married to Eysme Steward, Baron of Aubigny in France, sole Brother of the Duke of Lenox; whom he afterward succeeded in that Dignity.

About this Time, Hugh Earl of Tir-Oen, most ungrateful and utterly forgetful of the King's great Clemency to him, together with Tyrconell, Hugh Baron of Dungannon, and divers other Irish Lords fled into the Parts beyond Sea, with purpose to sollicite foreign Princes against the King, and to offer the Kingdom of Ireland to the Pope, which was presently signified to the Realm by Proclamation.

On the 11th. of April this Year, George Jervis a Seminary Priest, and the 23d. of June following, Thomas Garnet a Jesuite, were both executed at Tyburn; Thomas Garnet having the Favour offered him to be pardoned, if he would but take the Oath of Allegiance, which he refused.

The 19th. of April at White-hall, dyed Thomas Earl of Dorset, Lord Treasurer, whose Death (because he dyed suddenly as he sat at the Council-Table) was by some untowardly interpreted; but being dead, and his Head opened, opened, there were found in it certain little bags of Water, which whether by the straining of his study the Night before, in which he sate up till eleven a-clock, or otherwise by their own maturity suddenly breaking and falling upon his Brain, caused his sudden Death; so certain it is that Death comes not always by determinate Steps, but sometimes per saltum; and we all carry about us the Causes of sudden Death, tho' insensible of them till we be insensible. This Lord was of excellent Parts, and in his Place exceeding industrious, and I have heard many Chequer-men say, there never was a better Treasurer, both for the King's profit, and the good of the Subject.

The 20th of May, at Windsor were made two Knights of the Garter, George Earl of Dunbar, and Philip Earl of Montgomery; but the Earl of Dunbar, within a Year or two after, left both his Honour and his Life, but not his Life without Honour, having been a faithful Servant, and a wise Counsellor to the King, and was honourably interr'd in the Church at Westminster.

Divers English
Pirates turn Turks.

About this time were many famous English Pirates that stuck not, some of 'em, to turn Turks, and lived in great state at Tunis, of whom the chief were Ward, Bishop, Sir Francis Verney, and Glarville; whom, after many Depredations and outrageous Acts at Sea, partly the King of Spain suppress'd, and partly the King of England; and Nineteen of their Associates being taken, were hang'd at Wapping.

Also at this time in the Strand, on the North side of Durham House, where stood an old long Stable, Robert Earl of Salisbury, now Lord Treasurer of England, caused to be erected a stately Building, which, upon Tuesday the tenth of April, in the Year 1609, was begun to be richly furnish'd with Wares; and the next Day after, the King, the Queen, and Prince, with many great Lords and Ladies, came to see it; and then the King gave it the Name of Britain's Bourse.

At this time the making of Allom, which heretofore with great Charges had been fetch'd from foreign Parts, was by divers that labour'd in it (and now lastly by Sir John Bourchier) brought to perfection in England; and thereupon the King prohibited, upon pain of confiscation, any Allom to be brought from beyond the Seas, and took the whole Traffick thereof to himself.

An. Reg. 8.
1610.

The Prince is created Prince of Wales, and the solemn manner of his creating.

'Twas now the Eighth Year of King James's Reign, being the Year 1610. When Prince Henry being come to the age of 17 years, it was thought fit he should be initiated into Royalty; and thereupon, the 30th of May this Year, he was created Prince of Wales in most solemn manner, which was thus: Garter King at Arms bore the Letters-patents, the Earl of Sussex the Robes of purple Velvet, the Earl of Huntington the Train, the Earl of Cumberland the Sword, the Earl of Rutland the Ring, the Earl of Derby the Rod, the Earl of Shrewsbury the Cap and Coronet, the Earls of Nottingham and Northampton supported the Prince, being in his Surcoat only, and bareheaded; and in this manner being conducted to the King, attended on by the Knights of the Bath, 25 in number, all great Men and great Mens Sons, the Earl of Salisbury, principal Secretary, read the Letters-patents, the Prince kneeling all the while before the King, and at the Words accusom'd the King put on him the Robe, the Sword, the Cap, the Coronet, the Rod, and the Ring, and then kissed him on the Cheek; and so the Solemnity ended.

After this, it was thought fit he should keep his Court by himself, and thereupon Sir Thomas Chaloner, a learned Gentleman, who had before been his Governor, was now made his Lord-Chamberlain, Sir Edward Phillips his Chancellor, and all other Officers assign'd him belonging to a Prince's Court; wherein he shew'd himself so early ripe for Majesty, that he seem'd to be a King while he was yet but Prince; and all Mens Eyes began to fix upon him.

King James had long since shut up the Gates of Janus, and was in Peace with all Princes abroad; his only care was now to keep Peace at home: And to this end, the three first Days of June, in his own Person, he heard the Differences between the Ecclesiastical and the Temporal Judges argued, touching the Protections out of the Kings-Bench and Common-Pleas. To this end, the 8th, 9th, and 10th of June, he heard the manifold Complaints of the Abuses of the Victuallers, and other Officers of his Navy-Royal: To this end, the 4th of June 1610, he once again, by Proclamation, commanded all Roman Priests, Seminaries, and Jesuites, as being the chief Incendiaries of Troubles, to depart this Kingdom by the 5th of July next, and not to return upon pain of Severity of the Law; as also all Recusants to return home to their Dwellings, and not remain in London, nor to come within ten Miles of the Court, without special License. After which Proclamation, the Oath of Allegiance was presently administer'd to all sorts of People, and their Names settified to the Lords of the Council that refused to take it. And this he the rather did out of consideration of the bloody Fact committed lately by one Ravillack, upon the Person of the Renowned King of France, Henry IV. And whereas Queen Elizabeth, in her 43d Year, had granted her Letters-patents to continue for Fifteen Years to the East-India Merchants, now upon their humble Petition the King was pleas'd to enlarge their Patents, giving them a Charter to continue for ever, enabling them thereby to be a Body corporate and politick; which so encourag'd the Merchants, that they built a Ship of 1200 Tun, the greatest that ever was made in this Kingdom by Merchants, which the King and Prince honour'd with going to Deptford to see it, and then nam'd it The Trade's Encrease; and at this time gave to Sir Tho. Smith (Governor of that Company) a fair Chain of Gold, with a Jewel wherein was his Picture: But

The King builds a Ship of 1400 Tun, call'd The Prince, and gives it to the Prince.

The King dissolves a Parliament under the Great Seal of England.

Sir Rob. Carre comes into the King's favour, and of the many Honours heap'd suddenly upon him.

But this great Ship having been in the Red-Sea, and returning to Bantam, was there lost, and most of her Men cast away. But then the King himself built the goodliest Ship of War that was ever built in England, being of the burthen of 1400 Tun, and carrying 64 pieces of great Ordnance, which he gave to his Son Prince Henry, who named it after his own Dignity, The Prince.

And now whereas a Parliament had been holden this Year, and was prorogued to a certain Day, the King perhaps not finding it to comply with his Designs, or for some other Cause known to himself, on the last Day of December, under the Great Seal of England dissolv'd it.

Before this time one Sir Robert Carre, a Gentleman of Scotland, or of the Borders, at a time of tilting before the King, chanc'd with a Fall off his Horse to break his Leg, upon which mischance he was forced for some Days to keep his Bed, in which time the King was sometime pleas'd to come and visit him; and then it was first perceiv'd that the King had begun to cast an Eye of Favour upon him: And indeed from that time forward (as he was a very fine Gentleman, and very wise) many great Favours were heap'd upon him; so as on Easter-Monday, in the Year 1611, he was created Viscount Rocheſter: On the 22d of April 1612 was sworn a Privy-Councillor: On the 4th of November 1613 was created Earl of Somerſet; and the 10th of July following made Lord-Chamberlain.

But this Sunshine of Fortune lasted not long, yet not by any Inconstancy in the King, but by the Earl's own undeserving, which thus fell out: The Right Honourable Robert Earl of Essex had before this time married the beautiful Lady Frances Howard, Daughter of Thomas Earl of Suffolk, who, upon Causes judicially heard, were afterward divorc'd, and left free to marry any other. After which Divorce this great Favourite (the Earl of Somerſet) takes her for Wife, the King gracing their Marriage with all demonstrations of love and favour, and the Lords gracing it with a stately Masque that Night; and a few Days after, the Bride and Bridegroom, accompanied with most of the Nobility of the Kingdom, were feasted at Merchant-Taylors Hall, by the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen. But see how soon this fair Weather was overcast; for it happen'd that one Sir Thomas Overbury, a very ingenious Gentleman, and the Earl's special Friend, who had written a witty Treatise of a Wife, and, it seems, not thinking the Lady in all Points answerable to his Description, had been an earnest Dissuader of the Match; and to strengthen his Dissuasion, laid perhaps some unjust Imputation upon the Lady's Fame; which so incensed them both against him, that a less Revenge could not give them Satisfaction, than to take away his Life. So true is that Saying,

Upon this they find Pretences to have the said Sir Thomas committed to the Tower, and there, by their Instruments, effect their Revenge; some say by a poyson'd Tanzey sent him to eat; some, by a poyson'd Glistre ministred unto him; but howsoever, effected it was: For which Fact Sir Jervis Telvis, then Lieutenant of the Tower, and three or four others of inferior condition, were put to death: The Lady and Earl themselves were arraign'd and condemn'd, but thro' the King's great Clemency had their Lives spared; but in such sort as was to them no less grievous than Death itself, being never after suffer'd to see the King's Face, nor to come near his Court. This Favourite being thus out of Favour, there was place made for entertaining another; for indeed King James was of so sociable and loving a nature, that he could not be long without an alter idem, a Bosom-friend, with whom to communicate his Internos sensus, and upon whose Shoulders he might sometimes lay a Burthen which he was not willing to bear himself; and this new Friend was Mr. George Villiers, a Gentleman of a good House, but a younger Brother, but of so delicate a compoſure of Body, and withal of so excellent parts of Mind, as if Nature had framed him on purpose to be a King's Favourite; and indeed never any Man was partaker of the royal Influence like to him; made first a Knight, and Gentleman of the King's Bedchamber, soon after made a Viscount and Master of the Horse; a while after created Earl of Buckingham, then Marq. of Buckingham, and made Lord-Admiral; lastly, made Duke of Buckingham, the greatest Title of Honour a Subject is capable of, and yet this Title not greater than his Power; for all Matters of Grace pass'd from the King by him: And to grace him the more, his Mother (who after his Father's death had married a younger Son of the Lord Compton's) was created Countess of Buckingham; his Sister, who had married a Gentleman of no extraordinary Family, had her Husband made Earl of Denbigh, his two Brothers were made, one of them Viscount Purbeck, the other Earl of Angleſey; beside many other of his Friends and Kindred highly advanc'd; for this Lord affected not an Advancement that should be only personal, but rather be in common to all his Family; and was not of the disposition of some, who, like great Oaks, love to keep all that are near them Underwood, tho' it be in truth both against Nature and Policy to stand alone, when they'd be less subject to the violence of Winds if more flood together: And tho' never Man had juster cause to be envied than he, yet never any Man was less envied, because tho' his Honours made him great, yet they made him not swell, but he retain'd the like Temper of affable Carriage after his advancement as he had done before.

But before all these favours were heap'd upon him, many other great Passages had intervened; for first, after the death of Thomas Earl of Dorſet, Robert Earl of Salisbury had been Lord-Treasurer, and after him Thomas Earl of Suffolk; but this Lord, tho' of most noble disposition, yet as having had his training up another way, seems less ready in discharging the Place; and whether for this, or for his Lady's taking too much upon her by his Indulgence, the Staff was soon after taken from him; after whom there came in such a sequence of Treasurers as no Age before had ever seen, all wise and able Men indeed, but yet in whom the Office seem'd an Employment, rather to ennoble the Officer than to enrich the King: For, first, Sir Henry Montague was taken from the Kings-bench, and on the 4th of December 1620, made Lord-Treasurer, and presently upon it Earl of Mancheſter; and before the Year

At this time also the Corps of Mary, late Queen of Scotland, the King's Mother, was translated from Peterborough to St. Peter's Church in Westminster, and from thence was carried to the Chapel-royal there, where it was interr'd in a royal Tomb which the King had erected for her.

After a Years stay here, in which time his Lady lay in of a Son, to whom the Queen was Godmother, and Prince Henry Godfather, he left the Child here in England, and then with his Lady departed into Persia.

An. Reg. 10.
Frederick Prince Palatine of the Rhine comes into England.

It was now the Year 1612, and the tenth of K. James's Reign, when the illustrious Prince Frederick Count-Palatine of the Rhine, with whom a Treaty of Marriage had been before with the Lady Elizabeth, on the 16th of October arriv'd at Gravesend, to whom the Duke of Lenox and divers other Lords were sent by the King, who conducted him to White-hall, and from thence into the great Banqueting-house, where the King, the Queen, Prince Henry, and the Lady Elizabeth, entertain'd him in all kind manner, and after by Barge conducted him to Essex House, appointed for his lodging. It was many Years since any King's Daughter had been married in England, which now happening, and to so illustrious a Prince, was just cause of triumph and rejoicing: But see the Misery of Human Affairs; Joy can no sooner be setting forth, but Sorrow will be sure to follow her at the heels, as now it hapned; for, on the 29th of October, the Prince-Palatine, with all the great Lords of the Kingdom, in most jovial manner dining at Guild-hall, Prince Henry, who was also invited and expected, could not come, being newly fallen exceeding sick of a popular malignant Fever, which reign'd that Year in most parts of this Land, whereof on the sixth of November, between seven and eight a-clock at Night, at his Court of St. James's, he died: But he being infinitely belov'd of the People, and one that had given great Hope of proving an Heroick Prince, it caus'd suspicion in many Mens heads that death was not without Violence offer'd to Nature: Some said, by bunches of Grapes given him to eat; some, by Gloves of a poyson'd Perfume, given him for a Present; but these were but idle Rumours and Conceits: It seems Divine Providence had ordain'd it should be said of him, Hinc tantum terris ostendent Fata, nec ultra esse finent, whose Death would have given a great Blow to the Happiness of this Kingdom if there had not been another Prince left, of a milder Spirit perhaps, but so accomplish'd with all excellent Endowments, that there could be no great want of Prince Henry as long as there was left Prince Charles. The Corps of Prince Henry, who died at the age of 18 Years, 8 Months, and 17 Days, was drawn in a Chariot to the Abbey-Church at Westminster, and there interr'd in the Chapel Royal, on the 17th of December following.

This Accident something appall'd the general Joy, but yet Triumphs went on.

Upon St. Thomas Day the Palsgrave and Grave Maurice were elected Knights of the Garter; and the 27th of December the Palsgrave was betroth'd to the Lady Elizabeth. On Sunday the 7th of February the Palsgrave in Person was install'd Knight of the Garter at Windsor; and at the same time was Grave Maurice install'd by his Deputy, Count Lodowick of Nassau. On the 14th of February, being Shrove-Sunday and St. Valentine's Day, this happy Marriage of the Palsgrave with the Lady Elizabeth was solemniz'd in the Chapel at White-hall: The Bride was led to Church by two Batchelors, her Brother Prince Charles, and the Earl of Northampton Lord Privy-Seal: She was attired all in white, having a rich Crown of Gold upon her Head, her Hair hanging down at length, curiously beset with Pearls and precious Stones; her Train supported by twelve young Ladies in white Garments. The King gave her in Marriage, the Archbishop of Canterbury married them, the Bishop of Bath and Wells preach'd the Bridal Sermon; which ended, the Bride was led home by two married Men, the Duke of Lenox and the Earl of Nottingham Lord-Admiral.

This Marriage was solemniz'd the first Night with a stately Masque of Lords and Ladies, the second Night with a magnificent Masque of the Gentlemen of the Middle-Temple and Lincolns-Inn; the

Wales, by the Death of Prince Henry, had been a good while without a Prince; and now to supply that Place, Prince Charles is created Prince of Wales; in joy whereof, the Town of Ludlow in Shropshire and the City of London perform'd great Triumphs. And the more to honour his Creation, there was made twenty five Knights of the Bath, all of them Lords or Barons Sons: And yet more to honour it, there were forty select Gentlemen of the Inns of Court that perform'd solemn Jufts at Barriers, with great Magnificence.

This Year was a Censure of divers great Delinquents: For first Sir Edward Coke was upon Displeasure discharg'd from being Lord Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench; and two Days after his Discharge, Sir Henry Montague, the King's Attorney; he was first made Lord Keeper, and the Lord Egerton dying soon after, Lord Chancellor. Not long after him, Sir Henry Yelverton, the King's Attorney, for adding new Privileges to the Londoners Charter without the King's privity, was in Displeasure put from his Place; and in his room was plac'd Sir Tho- mas Coventry, the Solicitor. But a while after, Sir Henry Yelverton was made a Puiny Judge of the Common-Pleas; having indeed the Reputation of an excellent Lawyer.

And yet this work of Censuring stayed not here; for much about this time, Thomas Earl of Suffolk, Lord Treasurer of England, had the Staff of his Office taken from him; which was soon after deliver'd to Sir Henry Montague, Lord Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench. If Sir John Bennet, Judge of the Prerogative-Court, had made a little more haste, he might have made one in this number of Delinquents: But he came short three or four Years; and then being charg'd by his own Servant with Bribery, he was put from his Place, and censured in the Star-Chamber to pay 2000 Pounds; and in his room was placed William Byrde, a Man of more Integrity.

Tho' King James, upon the Death of Queen Elizabeth, came to reside in England, yet he forgot not that Scotland was his Native Country; and therefore, after he had spent some Years in England, to acquaint himself with the State of the Kingdom, in March, this Year 1616, he made a Journey into Scotland: For tho' he had left very able Men to sit at the Helm there in his Absence, yet he knew, that it is the Master's Eye that makes the Horse fat: So it is the Prince's Presence sometimes that keeps out many Distempers in a State, that would otherwise creep in. And now, when in his staying six Months there, he had seen all things well settl'd, both in the Ecclesiastical State, and in the Temporal; and made it appear, that he resided not in England out of any neglect of Scotland, but to the end he might be in the Place of most Conveniency to both Kingdoms. On the 15th of September he return'd to London, not more to the Grief of the Scots to leave him, than to the Joy of the English to receive him; so much was King James as a just and wise Prince belov'd of both the Nations.

The 15th of February 1617, in the 15th Year of this King, Francis Ashley, of the Middle-Tem- ple, London, Esquire, where he had been Reader the Year before, was by a Writ call'd to be Serjeant at Law, Eo tempore solus Serviens ad le- gem electus, and the 5th of July following was knighted; and about that time was Steward of the Marshalsea of the King's House; and by King Charles, the 5th of May, in the first Year of his Reign, was by Letters-Patents made one of the King's Serjeants at Law, and so continu'd unto his Death, which happen'd by the Will of God, the 28th of November, 1635, at Serjeants-
Int in Fleetstreet, and was Recorder of Dorchester in Dorsetshire; where, together with his Lady, in the great Church he lies involtd; leaving Dorothy, his only Daughter and Heir, (by the Lady Anne his Wife, the eldest Daughter and Co-heir of Bernard Samwayes of Winterborne St.
Martin in the County of Dorset, Esq;) married unto the Honourable Denzil Holles, Esq; whose only Issue is Francis Holles of Winterborne St. Mar- tin afore said, Esq;

Now comes to be related a Matter of special observation: Sir Walter Raleigh had liv'd a condemn'd Man many Years in the Tower, and now his Destiny brought him to his End by Liberty, which it could not do by Imprisonment; for out of a longing for Liberty, he propounded a Project to the King; upon which, (as he was a well-spoken Man, and of a great Capacity) he set such colours of probability, especially gilding it over with the Gold he would fetch from a Mine in Guiana, and that without any wrong at all to the King of Spain, (if he might be allow'd to go the Journey) that the King, if he gave not credit that he could perform it, at least gave way that he should undertake it:
And thereupon with divers Ships, accompanied with many Knights and Gentlemen of Quality, he set forward on the Voyage. But when after long search, or shew of search, no such Place of Treasure, or no such Treasure could be found; whether it were, that he thought it a shame to return home with doing nothing, or that his Malus Genius thrust him upon the Design, he fell upon St. Thome, a Town belonging to the King of Spain, sack'd it, pillag'd it, and burnt it: And here was the first part of his tragical Voyage acted, in the Death of his eldest Son; the last Part was acted in his own Death at his return: For Gundamore, the Spanish

This Fact Gundamore aggravateth
against him.

nish Leiger, did so aggravate this Fact of his to the King against him, that it seem'd nothing would give Satisfaction but Raleigh's Head, without which he doubted there would follow a breach of the League between the two Nations. Raleigh excused it, by saying, That he was urg'd to it by the Spaniards first assaulting of him; and besides, he could not come at the Mine without winning this Town. But Gundamore was too strong an Adversary for him: And the King preferring the publick Peace before the Life of one Man, already condemn'd, gave way to have the Sentence of his former Condemnation executed upon him; and thereupon brought to the King's-Bench-Bar, he was not new arraign'd or indicted, as being already Mortuus in Lege, but only hath the former Sentence averred against him, and so carried to the Gate-house, and from thence the next Morning to the Parliament-Yard; a Scaffold was there erected, upon which, after fourteen Years reprieval, his Head was cut off: At which time such abundance of Blood issu'd from his Veins, that shewed he had stock of Nature enough left to have continu'd him many Years in Life, tho' now above sixty Years old, if he had not been taken away by the Hands of Violence.

And this was the End of the great Sir Walter Raleigh; great sometimes in the Favour of Qu. Elizabeth, and next to Drake the great Scourge and Hate of the Spaniard, who had many things to be commended in his Life, but none more than his Constancy in his Death; which he took with so undaunted a Resolution, that one might perceive he had a certain Expectation of a better Life after it. So far was he from holding those Atheistical Opinions; an Aspersion whereof some traducing Persons had cast upon him.

About this time King James made a Progress to the University of Cambridge; where, delighted with the Disputations, and other Scholastical Exercises, he stay'd three Days, and could have been content to have stay'd as many Years; for next being a King, he was made to be a Scholar.

In the Year 1619, being the 17th Year of King James's Reign, that Knot of Love, which above twenty Years had been ty'd between him and his Queen, was by Death dissolv'd: For on Tuesday this Year, the 2d of March, Queen Anne died at Hampton-Court, whose Corps was brought to Denmark-House, and from thence convey'd to Westminster; where, in the Royal Chapel, with great Solemnity it was interr'd. A Princess very memorable for her Virtue, and not a little for her Fortune; who, besides being a Queen, was so happy as to be Mother of such admir'd Children, as she brought into the World. But the dissolving of this Knot cast the King into an extream Sickness; and after some recovery, into a Relapse; from which notwithstanding it pleas'd God to deliver him, as having yet some great Work to do.

This Year, on Monday the 3d of May, one Mr. Williams, a Barrister of the Middle-Temple, was arraign'd at the King's-Bench, for libelling, and for writing Books against the King; and upon Wednesday following, was hang'd and quarter'd at Charing-Cross.

But an Action of another nature was perform'd this Year, the 17th of July, not unworthy the relating; which was this, That one Bernard Calvert of Andover, rode from St. George's Church in Southwark to Dover, from thence pass'd by Barge to Calais in France; from thence return'd back to St. George's Church the same Day; setting out about three a-Clock in the Morning, and return'd about eight a-Clock in the Evening fresh and lusty.

In the Year 1621 a Parliament was holden at Westminster, wherein two great Examples of Justice were shewed; which for future Terror are not unfit to be here related: One upon Sir Gyles Montpeffon, a Gentleman otherwise of good Parts; but for practising sundry Abuses, in erecting and setting up new Inns and Alehouses, and exacting great Sums of Money of People, by pretence of Letters-Patent granted to him for that purpose, was sentenc'd to be degraded, and disabled to bear any Office in the Commonwealth, tho' he avoided the Execution by flying the Land: But upon Sir Francis Mitchel, a Justice of Peace of Middlesex, and one of the chief Agents, the Sentence of Degradation was executed, and he made to ride with his Face to the Horse's Tail through the City of London.

The other Example was of Sir Francis Bacon, Viscount of St. Albans, Lord Chancellor of England, who for Bribery was put from his Place, and committed to the Tower; but after some Days enlarg'd. In whose Place Dr. Williams, Dean of Westminster, was made Lord-Keeper.

The Count Palatine being now strengthened with the Alliance of the King of Great-Britain, was thought a fit Man to be King of Bohemia; and accordingly was elected by the States of that Kingdom: But he was no sooner invested in the Crown, but the Emperor with great Forces assaulted him in Prague; and not only drove him, with his Wife and Children from thence, but took from him also his own Patrimony, the Palatinate: So as tho' now a King, he was fain to fly to the States of the Low-Countries for a place of residence. King James, tho' he had never given his consent to the Palsgrave's taking upon him that Kingdom, as foreseeing in his great Judgment what the Event would be, yet in his Distress he could not forbear to take care of his Daughter, and thereupon sent Sir Richard Weston, the same that was after Lord Treasurer, in Embassy to the Emperor, to sollicite the Restoring of the Palatinate to the Palsgrave; but he returning without Success, the King had then conference with Count Gundamore the King of Spain's Leiger in England what course might be taken to procure the restoring it: Who made him answer, There could be no better Course than to make a Marriage between his Son the Prince of Wales and the Infanta of Spain, which, he said, would easily be effected, if the Prince might have leave to make a Journey into Spain. King James, tho' he consider'd the inveterate Grudges between Spain and England, and how dangerous it might be to put the Heir of the Kingdom into the Spaniards hands, yet grounding himself upon saying Fidelem si putaveris, facies: And drawn on by the insinuating Speeches of Count Gundamore, not perhaps without some Inclination in the Marquis of Buckingham, was contented at last the Prince should go.

Hereupon the Prince is sent into Spain, and how accompanied.

Gundomar gets Money of Ladies perswading them of the certainty of the Match.

The Prince's entertainment in Spain.

What hindered the proceeding of the Match.

The King sends for the Prince to return home.

And so Prince Charles sending his Ships about, and taking along with him only the Marquis of Buckingham (who in the time of his being in Spain was created Duke of Buckingham) Endimion Porter, and Mr. Francis Cottington, (two that were well acquainted with the language and affairs of Spain) he took his journey by the way of France, went to Paris, and secretly in disguise to the Court there, where he had the sight of that Lady, that might well have stayed him from going further, but yet on he went.

In the mean time Gundomar a cunning Man, and one that besides his Master's had ends of his own, and could play his game no less for his own profit than his Masters Honour, as he had perswaded the King of the facility of the Match with Spain, so he perswaded a certainty of it, especially amongst Catholick Ladies, by which means he brought no small store of Grist to his own Mill, receiving from one Lady three hundred Pounds, to be made Groom of the Stole when the Spanish Princess should come; of another, a good round Sum to be Mother of the Maids, and of divers other the like for other places.

But the Prince being arrived in Spain, was received indeed with all the demonstrations of love and kindness that could be devised, so as the charge of his Entertainment was said to stand the King of Spain in nine and forty thousand Ducats; but his acquaintance with the Lady much restrained, for in all the time of his staying in Spain, (which was no less than eight Months, being from February to October) he saw her but very seldom, and at good distances, never spake with her but twice, and that before company, besides that his speeches were limited, how much and what he should say, far from any means of tying the Knot between them, which was pretended. What the cause should be was much in obscurity; some thought that a difference between the Duke of Buckingham and the Count Olivarez, the King of Spain's great Favourite, was a great hindrance of the Proceeding, but other, and more likely, that the Spaniard indeed never really intended the Match at all, but had drawn the Prince into Spain for other ends: But what those ends were, was no less uncertain; one thought it was done to hold the Prince in a Treaty of Marriage with a Daughter of Spain, till the Daughters of France should be bestowed, thereby to keep him from that Alliance; but others and more likely, that the King of Spain, entertained this Treaty with the King of great Britain, meaning to spin it out till he had compassed some designs in the Low-Countries, and the Palatinate, at least to make King James less vigilant for those parts.

But when much time had been spent in protracting, upon pretence of difficulties in obtaining the Popes dispensation, King James partly wearied with delay, but chiefly angry with delusion, sent to the Prince, with all speed to return into England; which the Prince presently signifieth to the King of Spain, and had his leave to depart; but upon promise to continue the Treaty of the Marriage still: Though it was said, the Prince was gone but a few Days on his Journey, when a Post was sent to have stayed him, if he had been overtaken. But whether it was so or no, it was Gods Providence that he came safely to his ships, and in them safely into England; arriving at Portsmouth, where he was beheld of all the people, with no less gladness than the Sun after a long Eclipse; and now his safe returning did both justifie King James's judgment in suffering him to go, and the King of Spain's justice in suffering him to come back; and was cause that the people began to have a better opinion of the Spanish faith than they had before. But now it presently breaks out, that this Match with Spain could never take effect; for King James having received Declarations of the Articles touching the marriage, found many very strict and large for exercise of the Catholick Religion, but none at all for restitution of the Palatinate; which made him so much discontented, that he presently brake off all Treaty of the Marriage, and signified as much, not only to the King of Spain, but to divers other Princes of Christendom: Upon which breach two great points were presently had in consultation: One for preparing Forces, for recovering the Palatinate by way of Arms, which could not be done by way of Friendship; and for this purpose a Council of War was called, and a proposition resolved on both of Men and Money, for undertaking the enterprise: As also a great contribution by way of Benevolence was collected; towards which, the compiler of this Work gave himself fifty Pounds; as many other far greater Sums, though the collection went not through the whole Land, by reason there was hope given of a peaceable reconciliation, so as many that were not over-hasty in their Payment escaped without contributing at all. The other point was for providing a fit Wife for the Prince, in some other place. It was said the States of Holland offered a very great portion in Marriage to the Prince, if he would match with some Lady of that Country, but Matches are made in Heaven, and there was a young Lady of France destined to his Bed, and for this purpose, the Earl of Carlisle, and the Earl of Holland were sent into France, to treat of a Marriage with the younger Daughter of the great Henry the fourth, King of France deceased, and Sister to the present King Lewis; which marriage after took effect, but not accomplished in King James's Days, who died soon after the agreement.

It was now the year 1623, in which in Michaelmas Term there was a Call of fifteen Serjeants at Law, who kept their Feast in the Middle-Temple Hall.

Two things in this Kings days grew to lose their Lustre; one, the exercise of Tilting, which in Queen Elizabeth's time was so much used, that no year passed without a special solemnity in that kind. The other, the Band of Gentlemen Pensioners and Yeomen of the Guard; which in her time consisted of the choicest Persons both for stature and other good parts throughout the Realm; and was so great a grace to her Court, that no Prince of Christendom could shew the like: But King James was so intentive to Realities, that he lit-little regarded shews: and thereby both these in his time came utterly to be neglected: No solemnity of Arms but very rare, no regard had what persons were admitted into the other places.

We may here observe, how the Sirname of the Kings of England hath at sundry times been changed. From William the Conqueror, to King Henry the second, what Sirname they had or whether they had any or no, is most uncertain: But when King Henry the second brought in the French Surname of Plantagenet; which continued in all the succeeding Kings, till King Henry the seventh, and he brought in the Welsh Sirname of Tudor, which continued the Sirname of all the succeeding Princes till King James the sixth of Scotland; and he brought in the Scottish Sirname of Steward, in which it is likely to continue, (and God grant it may do so) to the World's end.

Some passages of small moment I confess are omitted by me in this Reign of King James, as whereof, for want of knowing the Particulars, I dare not venture upon making the Relation; which if some Men would have done, the Truth of our Chronicles should not have been mingled with so many Falsities.

Of his Taxations.

The Customs of Merchandize raised.

IN his second Year, in the Month of September, he sent Privy Seals to the wealthiest Citizens of London, for moneys to be borrowed of them: And in October following, the Customs of Merchandises, both outward and inward, were raised, and then were letted out to Farm. In a Parliament holden at Westminster, the third year of his Reign, there were given him three entire Subsidies, and six Fifteens by the Temporality, and by the Clergy four entire Subsidies. This year also Henry Lord Mordaunt, convicted in the Star-chamber for divers misprisions, was fined to pay ten thousand Marks, and Edward Lord Stourton for the like offence to pay thirty thousand Pounds, and some Years after Sir John Bennet, Judge of the Prerogative Court was fined to pay twenty thousand Pounds. In his fourth year he repayed threescore thousand Pounds to the Citizens of London, which the Londoners lent to Queen Elizabeth, three Years before her Death; an act by which he got more love than he payed Money. In his seventh year he had aid throughout England, for making his eldest Son Prince Henry Knight: which though they levied with great moderation, brought him in great sums of Money. In his eighteenth year, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, the Temporality gave him two Subsidies, and the Clergy three; and in another Parliament, in the year 1623, the Temporality gave him three Subsidies, and three Fifteens; the Clergy four Subsidies. Besides three Subsidies he sent abroad many Great privy Seals, and had also a Benevolence throughout the Realm; not without some grudging, but without any just cause; for it should have been remembered, that he took it not of covetousness to gather wealth, but out of very necessity to supply wants: For by his employing many Ambassadors in Ordinary, many Extraordinary, by his necessary bounty to his followers, and by his charge of keeping several Courts, none of all which he could avoid; his Expences were far greater than any of his Predecessors had ever been.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

THE day of his removing from Charterhouse, at his first coming into England, he caused Proclamation to be made, that all Monopolies and Protections should cease; as likewise all oppressions done by Salt-Peter-men, by Purveyors, and Carters. On the 26th of May following he set forth a Proclamation, restraining all persons under great Penalties from killing of Deer, or any kind of Fowl used for Hawking. The 7th of May, Proclamation was made against Robberies on the Borders; and on the 19th of May, another for uniting the People inhabiting about the Borders of England and Scotland, to live in love and quietness. In this first year, in a Parliament then holden, it was Enacted, That neither Archbishop, nor Bishop should Alienate, Grant, or Demise, or in any sort convey, no not to the King himself, any of the Honours, Lands, Tenements, or Hereditaments, being parcel of the possession of his Archbishop, or Bishoprick: and if any were, it should be utterly void, and of no effect notwithstanding any former Law, Act, or Ordinance to the contrary. He then also caused himself by Proclamation to be entitled King of Great Britain, that the division of England and Scotland might be no more remembered. In his second year, by his Letters Patents he incorporated the Felt-makers of London, by the name of Masters, Wardens, and Commonalty of the Art or Mystery of the Felt-makers, granting them divers privileges and Liberties, for their good Government of their Corporation. In November, of his second year, were Proclaimed in London certain new pieces of Coin, both of Gold and Silver, with the true valuation and weights of them, according to the Mint of both Nations, English and Scottish. In a Parliament holden the third year of his Reign, the Oath of Allegiance was devised and ordained, and soon after ministred to all sorts of People.

This year also he made Proclamation to redress the misemployment of Lands, or Goods given to Charitable uses. Also this year, he set forth a Proclamation for bearing of Flags in ships to be in this manner, that from thenceforth all the Subjects of Great Britain should bear in their main-top, the Red Cross, commonly call'd St. George's Cross, and the White Cross, commonly call'd St. Andrew's Cross, joined together, and the Subjects of South Britain should carry in their Fore-top only the Red Cross, as they were wont; and the Subjects of North Britain only the White Cross. In his fourth Year, on the 10th of June he set forth a Proclamation, commanding all Jesuits, Seminary Priests and Fryers to depart the Realm before the first of August following; and never to return upon pain of death, according to divers Statutes in that behalf provided. In his second Year he had set forth a Proclamation against Inmates and encrease of new Buildings, which being little regarded, now in his fourth Year he renewed the said Proclamation, adding withal, That the Fore-fronts & Windows dows of all new Buildings should be either of Brick or Stone; for disobeying whereof, many were call'd in the Star-Chamber, and there fin'd. In his fifth Year, he gave order for planting of Mulberry-Trees, and breeding of Silk-Worms, that England might be a Country as well of Silk as of Cloth. In his eleventh Year he instituted the Order of the Baronets, which hath much degenerated since his institution, and thereby having been devised for the Benefit of Ireland, had caused but little Contentment unto England. This Year also the King himself in Person came to the Star-Chamber, where he had appointed the Mint-men to meet, and there, for the better keeping of Coins of Gold within the Realm, he raised the Prizes of them; ordaining the Piece call'd the Unity, which went before but for twenty Shillings, to be current now for two and twenty, the double Crown, and all other Pieces to encrease in the like proportion. In his fifteenth Year, he granted to the Apothecaries of London to be a Corporation for themselves and their Successors for ever; and by Letters Patent made them a Body Politick and Corporate. In this time by his appointment a strict Decree passed in the Star-Chamber against Duels and single Combats, and a strict Law was made in Parliament against stabbing with a Dagger or Knife, making it to be wilful Murther.

A Conference in matters of Religion is held before the King at Hampton-Court, and how the matter proceeded.

THE King, as a Religious Prince, desiring nothing so much as to settle Peace in the Church, and hearing of some Dissention of his Divines in point of Religion, in the very first Year of his Reign, appointed a Conference to be holden before himself at Hampton-Court, to which were call'd divers Bishops, Deans and Doctors, of one side; and of the other four eminent Divines; namely, Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Sparks, Mr. Knewstabs, and Mr. Chadderton; who all meeting before the King, the 14th Day of January; the King first signified the cause of his calling them together, and then told them he was there ready to hear what they could object or say against the present Government of the Church: Whereupon Dr. Reynolds being their Fore-man, reduc'd all matters disliked or questioned, into these four Heads.

1. That the Doctrine of the Church might be preserv'd in purity, according to God's Word.
2. That good Pastors might be planted in all Churches to Preach the same.
3. That the Church Government might be sincerely administred according to the Word of GOD.
4. That the Book of Common-Prayer might be fitted to more encrease of Piety.

Out of these Heads he drew and moved divers Points: One, that Confirmation might not be by Bishops only, but that every Pastor in his Parish might Confirm: But this was thought to trench too much upon the Jurisdictions of Bishops and to be a step to bring in a Presbyterian Government, which the King much disliked; and the Bishop of Winchester challeng'd Dr. Reynolds with all his Learning to shew, where ever he had read, that Confirmation was at all used in ancient times, by any other than by Bishops. Another motion of Dr. Reynolds was, That there might be a new Translation of the Bible, because the present Translations were corrupt, and not answerable to the Truth of the Original; whereof he alledg'd divers Examples, particularly that in the 105th Psalm 28th ver. where it is said, They were not Obedient, when in the Original it is said, They were not Disobedient: To this it was agreed, That a new Translation should be made: And accordingly soon after was perform'd by the most learned Divines of the Kingdom; and is that which is now used. After many other Points moved by Dr. Reynolds, he came at last to Subscription; entreating it might not be exacted as heretofore; which many good Men refused for these Reasons: First; Because the Apocryphal Books are by the Common-Prayer appointed to be read, albeit in some of them there are manifest Errors, directly repugnant to the Scriptures. To this the King himself answer'd, That as he would not wish all Canonical Books to be read in the Church, unless there were one to interpret, so he would wish no Apocryphal to be read wherein was any Error: But for the other which were clear and correspondent to the Scriptures, he would have them ready; seeing there was good use of them, to make up the Story of the Persecution of the Jews, but withal, he would have the People be taught, they were not to teach a Man, either to sacrifice to the Dead, or kill himself. The next Scruple against Subscription was, That in the Common-Prayer-Book it is twice set down, Jesus said to his Disciples, when by the Original Text it is plain, He spake to the Pharisees. To which it was answer'd, That for any thing could be gather'd by the Place, he might speak as well to the one as to the other: But the King for more Plainness sake will'd, That the Word Disciples should be omitted, and only the Words, Jesus said, to be printed in a different Letter, that it might appear to be no part of the Text.

Another Scruple was concerning the Cross in Baptism, which Dr. Reynolds confess'd to have ever been used since the Apostles time, at going abroad, or entring into the Church, or at their Prayers and Benedictions; but doubted of the ancient use of it in Baptism: To which the Bishop of Winchester answer'd, That in Constantine's time it was used in Baptism; and the Dean of Westminster shew'd out of Tertullian, Cyprian, Origen, and others, that in their time it was used in Immortali lavacro; which could be nothing but Baptism: And this the King judg'd to be Antiquity enough to warrant the continuance of it still. At last Mr. Knewstabs mov'd how far an Ordinance of the Church was to bind them, without Impeachment of their Christian Liberty: At which the King seem'd much mov'd, and told him, He would not argue that Point with him, but answer therein as Kings are wont to speak in Parliament Le Roy's avisera; and therefore I charge you (said he) never speak no more to that Point, how far you are to obey, when the Church hath once ordain'd it. Dr. Reynolds added, that the Cross should be abandoned, because in the time of Popery it had been superstitiously abus'd. To which which his Majesty answer'd, That his very Reason was an inducement to him to have it retain'd still : For in as much as it was abus'd (so you say) to superstition in time of Popery, it doth plainly imply, that it was well us'd before Popery.

Concerning the wearing of the Sur-plice.

The next thing objected, was the wearing of the Surplice : To which the King answer'd, That seeing it appear'd out of Antiquity, that in celebration of Divine Service, a different Habit appertain'd to the Ministry, and principally of white Linnen ; he saw no reason, but that in this Church, as it had been for Comeliness and Order sake, it might be still continued.

Last of all, Mr. Chadderton and Mr. Knewstubs requested, That in regard of some tender Consciences the Surplice and Cross in Baptism might not be urg'd : To which the King himself answer'd, If after the Gospel's preaching five and forty Years amongst you, there be any yet in these points unsatisfied, I doubt it proceeds rather out of Stubbornness of Opinion, than out of Tenderness of Conscience ; and therefore let them conform themselves, or else they shall hear further of it.

Concerning
the Ring in Marriage, and Bishops.

It was now observ'd, that in all their Objections, there was not a Word spoken against Bishops, nor against the Ring in Marriage ; for Dr. Reynolds himself confess'd, that the Ring was a very meet Ceremony ; and the King affirm'd he should not think himself rightly married, if he had not been married with a Ring : And as for Bishops, he declar'd himself to be verily perswaded, they were Divina Ordinationis, and most necessary to Monarchy ; and would often say, No Bishop, no King. Many other Points were handled, as about Predestination, Absolution and Remission of Sins, Baptizing by Women, about the Words in Marriage, With my Body I thee worship, the Oath Ex officio, the high Commission, and some other : In all which the King gave so good satisfaction, that they all jointly promis'd to be quiet and obedient, now they knew it to be his mind to have it so : And the King was so admir'd for his excellent Resolutions and Answers, that the Archbishop of Canterbury said, Undoubtedly his Majesty spake by the special Assistance of God's Spirit. After this Conference, the King in his second Year set forth a Proclamation, to confirm the Ecclesiastical Government, and the Book of Common Prayer, in the Form and Estate as Queen Elizabeth left them.

The Book of Common-Prayer con-

King.

After this he sent divers learned Divines into Scotland to have a Conference with the Divines there ; and, if it might be, to reduce the two Kingdoms to an Uniformity of Religion, as he brought them to an Union of Possession. And now entering into consideration of this Title of being, Defender of the Faith ; he conceiv'd it might extend not only to his own Dominions, but in some sort to neighbouring Countries ; if not in Authority, at least in Care : And hereupon hearing that the States in the Low-Countries were determin'd to entertain one Vorstius to be publick Professor of Divinity in Leyden, and knowing him, tho' otherwise a learned Man, yet tainted with many erroneous Opinions concerning the Essence and Substance of God, making him to be Quale & quantum, changing Eternity into Eviternity ; teaching Eternity to consist of a number of Ages, and denying God to be Purus actus, but to have in some sort aliquid Diversitatis, & Multiplicitatis in seipso ; etiam Principium cujusdam mutabilitatis : He earnestly solicited the States, both by his own Letters, and by his Leiger Sir Ralph Winwood, by no means to admit the said Vorstius into that Place ; lest his Doctrine having once infected their Country, might soon after spread it self into his Dominions. Which Request of his, after much soliciting, the States at length granted, and expell'd Vorstius from amongst them.

At this time a Synod was assembl'd at Dort in Holland, consisting of learned Divines, sent from the Count Palatine of the Rhine, from Hassia, from Switzerland, from the Church of Geneva, from Bern, Embden, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Friesland, and other Provinces : Some also sent from England, as namely, George Bishop of Landaffe, John Davenant Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, Samuel Ward Master of Sidney College in Cambridge, Thomas Good Dr. of Divinity, and Walter Belcanquel, a Scottish Man, Batchelor of Divinity : Which Synod was assembl'd to examine and determine the Doctrine of Arminius ; first, concerning God's Predestination, Election and Reprobation ; then concerning CHRIST's Death, and Man's Redemption by it ; then concerning Man's Corruption and Conversion to God ; then concerning the Preseverance of the Saints. In all which Points the Doctrine of Arminius was rejected, as also of Vorstius, and the true Doctrine by a general Consent, together with the Approbation of the Lords the States, which yet the Papists made so little reckoning of it, that one of them in scorn made Echo to censure it in this Distich.

But who knows not that Ill-will never speaks well, and that nothing is so obvious in the Mouth of an Adversary, as Scandals and Invectives.

In the Year 1616. Marcus Antonius de Dominis, Antonius de Dominis Archbishop of Spalato, in the Territory of Venice, came into England, leaving his Country (as he affirm'd) for Religion ; whereof he set forth in writing many Reasons, and being thereupon entertain'd by the Archbishop of Canterbury, was afterward made Dean of Windsor, and Master of the Savoy ; in which time he preach'd publicly divers times before divers Lords of the Council, printed in London the first four of his ten Books, Intituled, Of the Common-wealth of the Church ; wherein with great Earnestness he maintain'd the Doctrine and Discipline of the Protestants : But after all this, whether all he had done was but dissembling from the Beginning, or whether out of remorse of Conscience, he repented him of what he had done ; after five Years staying here, he retracted all he had said or written before : Which so incensed King James, that he commanded him (within three Days, at his peril) to depart the Realm ; who thereupon went to Rome, and there inveigh'd as bitterly against against the Protestants, as he had done in England against the Papists; hoping at least for Pardon, if not for Preferment: But notwithstanding his Recantation, according to the Law of the Inquisition (having once revolted, tho' now return'd) he suffer'd the Death of an Heretick, tho' not the Shame; had the Punishment of a Martyr, but not the Honour; and was publickly burnt at Rome; yet not burnt alive, but dying in Prison, and then buried; it is said his Body was afterwards taken up and burned.

In the King's 10th Year, two obstinate Arrian Hereticks, Bartholomew Legat, and Edward Wightman, was burnt for Heresie; Legat in Smithfield, and Wightman at Litchfield.

John Trask holding divers Judaical Opinions is censured, and after Three Years recants.

In his 16th Year, one John Trask, a pretended Minister, was censur'd in the Star-Chamber, for depraving the Ecclesiastical Government, and for holding divers Judaical Opinions: as, That it was not lawful to do any thing forbidden in the old Law, nor to keep the Christian Sabbath: For which he was set on the Pillory at Westminster, and from thence whipt to the Fleet, and there to remain Prisoner: But three Years after he writ a Recantation of all his former Heresies and Schismatical Opinions.

In this time, George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, being a hunting in a Park, and shooting at a Deer, his Arrow by mischance, glauced and kill'd a Man: Upon which Fact it was much debated, Whether by it he were not become irregular, and ought to be depriv'd of his Archiepiscopal Function, as having his Hands imbrued (tho' against his will) in Blood: But Andrews, Bishop of Winchester, standing much in his defence, as likewise Sir Henry Martin the King's Advocate, gave such Reasons in mitigation of the Fact, that he was clear'd from all imputation of Crime; and thereupon adjudg'd Regular, and in State to continue his Archiepiscopal Charge. Yet himself (out of a religious Tenderness of Mind) kept the Day of the Year in which the Mischance happen'd, with a solemn Fast all his Life after.

Structures of Piety King James made none at all, nor many of Magnificence, only the great Banqueting-House at Whitehall, a Wall of Brick about his Park at Greenwich, another at Theobalds, and some little Buildings at Royston, and such like. His greatest Charity was express'd by Largeſſes and Pensions; as first, where the Gentlemen of his Chapel, being thirty three in number, had each of them but thirty Pounds a Year Fee, he made it up forty. Then he enlarg'd the Pensions of his Alms-Knights of Windsor, being thirteen in number, from Twelve Pence a Day to Two Shillings. Then as he increas'd the number of the Yeomen of the Guard from 140 to 200, so he increas'd their Pensions from Two Shillings a Day for three Months in the Summer, to seven Groats a Day for six Months in the Summer. Then whereas at his coming, he found but only four Judges in each Court of Law at Westminster, he addeth a Fifth, with the like Allowance as the former had; besides many other Pensions of like nature. in his time, were very many, whereof we may justly set in the first place, the Repairing of Paul's Church, begun in his time, tho' not finish'd till many Years after: A Work of as great Cost and Labour as the first founding of it; towards the furtherance whereof, tho' many well devoted Persons contributed liberally, yet none was more industrious than the Learned Dr. Laud, first Bishop of London, and after Archbishop of Canterbury; who also was a bountiful Benefactor to the College of St. John's in Oxford, where he had his Education. Next to him his Predecessor, next before him, the worthy George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, founded a fair Alms-house at Guilford in Surrey, where he was born: As likewise Robert, the second Earl of Dorset, founded another in Suffex, to the Maintainance whereof he gave Lands to the value of 300 Pounds a Year. But of all the Alms-houses that ever was founded in Christendom, there is none I think, can parallel that of Thomas Sutton, Esq; This Man, born at Snayth in Lincolnshire, having always liv'd a Bachelor, and by sundry Employments and Parsimony, being grown to great Wealth, bought of the Right Honourable Thomas Earl of Suffolk, his Mansion-House, call'd the Charter-House, near to Smithfield in London, and out of a Pious Mind converted into an Alms-House, by the Name of Sutton's Hospital, endowing the same with above 3000 Pounds of yearly Rent: Wherein are maintain'd 80 poor Men, with convenient Lodging, Diet, and Allowance of Money for Apparel; also 40 poor Children, with the like Provision, and a Grammar-School, with a Master and Usher to teach them: Over all whom, he ordain'd a Learned Man to be Master of the Household, and to be chosen by the Governors, whom he appointed for the present, by the Authority of the King's Letters-Patents, to be George Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Lord Ellesmore, Lord-Chancellor, Robert Earl of Salisbury, Lord-Treasurer, John Bishop of London, Lancelot Bishop of Ely, Sir Edward Coke, Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, Sir Thomas Foster, a Judge of the Common-Pleas, Sir Henry Hubbard, the King's Attorney-General, Dr. Overall Dean of St. Paul's, Dr. Mountain, Dean of Westminster, Henry Thursby, Esq; Master of the Chancery, Richard Sutton, Esq; Auditor of the Imprests, Jeffery Nightringale, Esq; John Low Gentleman, Thomas Brown Gentleman, and Master of the Household for the time being, to be always one: And as any of these 16 Governors should die, the Survivors to make present addition of others. Next to this was a fair College in Oxford, founded by Nicholas Wilbe, Esq; and called after his Name. About this time also, Edward Allen, of Dulwich in Surrey, founded a fair Hospital at Dulwich, for Six poor Men, and Six poor Women, and for Twelve poor Children, from the Age of Four or Six Years, to be there maintain'd and taught till the Age of 14 or 16, and to have a School-master, with Diet, and a convenient Stipend. This Man may be an Example, who having gotten his Wealth by Stage-playing, converted it to this Pious Use, not without a kind of Reputation to the Society of Players. In this time also, William Camden, King at Arms, founded ded an History Professor in Oxford, to which he gave the Mannor of Boxley in Kent, which some Years expir'd, will be worth 400 Pounds a year. In his 10th Year, Sir Baptist Hicks, one of the Justices of the Peace in Middlesex, who was afterwards made Viscount Cambrden, built a fair Sessions-House of Brick and Stone in St. John's street, which by the Justices was call'd after his Name, Hicks: A great Conveniency for the Justices, who sat before in a common Inn call'd the Castle. He also founded a fair Hospital of Free-stone at Cambridge in Gloucestershire, for Six Men and Six Women, allowing each of them a yearly Gown, and Two Shillings Six-pence a Week, with two Rooms and a Garden. In this King's time, George Patyn, Citizen and Grocer of London, gave to good Uses 3600 Pounds, whereof 1200 Pounds to the two Universities, 900 Pounds for an Alms-house, and a certain Sum of Money to buy two Bells, and make a Chime in Bow-Church. Also Thomas Teasdale of Glympton, in the County of Oxford, Gentleman, gave 5000 Pounds to purchase Lands for perpetual maintenance of Seven Fellows, and Six Scholars, to be placed at Baliol in Oxford, and to be chosen thither from time to time, out of the Free-School of Abingdon in Berkshire; to which School he also gave Lands for the maintenance of an Usher. In this King's time also, Sir Marmaduke Darrel, being Lord of Fulmer, being a Town in Buckinghamshire, where was an old ruinous Church, standing a Mile distant from the Town, pulled down that old Church, and at his own Charge builded a fair new one in the Town, and furnish'd it with a Font, a Pulpit, and all Ornaments necessary. Also Thomas Watson of Halstead in the County of Kent, Esquire, new builded a fair Chapel on the North-side of the Parish-Church of Halstead, of Free-stone from the Ground, and gave to the Church Four new Bells, and Two Pulpits. In his time also, Dr. Aylmer, Bishop of London, and Elizabeth Countess Dowager of Shrewsbury, gave certain Sums of Money towards the better maintenance of Sermons at St. Paul's Cross: As likewise Thomas Russel, Draper, gave 10 Pound a Year for ever, to be given to Unbeneficed Ministers that should preach there, and to the same Use, George Bishop, Stationer of London, gave 10 Pounds a Year more. In this King's time also, the Citizens of London new builded Aldgate; where pulling down the old Gate, they found many ancient Roman Coins. John Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury, founded a fair Alms-house in Croydon.

On the 15th of June, 1614, died Henry Earl of Northampton, who built from the Ground a House near Charing-Cross; and dying, was buried in the ancient Chapel of Dover Castle; who in his Life-time founded Three fair Hospitals, and endow'd them with a large Maintenance for ever; one at Rising in Norfolk, for 12 poor Women, and a Governess; a second at Clun, in Shropshire, for 12 poor Men, and a Governor; the third at Greenwich, in Kent, for a Governor and 20 poor Alms-Men. In this King's time also, Mr. Robert Dows of London, Merchant-Taylor, gave a compleat Maintenance for ever unto St Sepulchres Parish, for the tolling of the great Bell, and for finding some Divine to come to the Prison of Newgate the Midnight before Execution, and there to ring a Hand-Bell, and to put the Prisoners in mind of their approaching Death, with a Christian Remembrance and Exhortation; and the next Morning to toll the great Bell from Six a-Clock till Ten, and then to ring it out when the Execution should be past. He also establish'd a Free Singing-School in Christ's Hospital for the better Education of the poor Children there; besides many other good Deeds of Alms. About the same time, Robert Peak of London, Goldsmith, gave to St. Sepulchres Church a Communion-Table of two Yards long, and Three quarters and a half broad, richly gilded over, and at every Corner imbos'd with Plates of Silver. In this King's 14th Year, William Jones of London, Merchant, gave about 8000 Pounds to found a Free-School in Wales, where he was born, with Alms-Houses and Pensioners in London, and a 100 Pounds a Year to a learned Preacher in London; ordaining all things to be order'd by the Company of Haberdashers, whereof himself was free. This Year also, the old ruinous Gate, call'd Aldersgate, was taken quite down, and new builded from the Foundation; towards the building whereof, William Parker, Merchant-Taylor of London, gave 1000 Pounds. In this King's time also was erected a Building near Chelsea, to be a College for Divines to study Controversies of Religion; but on second thoughts, the Cage indeed stands finish'd, but no Birds have ever yet been brought to sing in it, and perhaps never will.

If any other deeds of Alms, or publick Benefits were done in this King's time, as perhaps there were many, the Reader may be pleas'd, both here, and in other King's Reigns, to add them as he meets with them; for partly to this end I have digested this Chronicle into such several Heads and Chapters.

Of the Casualties happening in his Time.

IN his first Year, on the 27th of April, 13 Persons were slain by misfortune with Gunpowder, at the Gunpowder-Mill in Redriffe, and much other Hurt done in divers Places. This Year also, the Plague in London was so great, that from the 23d of December, 1602, to the 22d of December following, there died in London and the Liberties, thirty eight thousand, two hundred forty four; whereof of the Plague Thirty thousand, five hundred, three-score and eighteen, of them in one Week three thousand fourscore and ten: Where the next Year after, tho' the City was increas'd with a great number of Strangers, yet there died that Year of all Diseases, within London and the Liberties, but only four thousand two hundred threescore and three Persons. In the second Year of his Reign, a strange Accident happened to the Terror of all bloody Murtherers, which was this: One Anne Waters, enticed by a Lover of hers, consented to have her Husband strangled, and then buried him secretly under the Dunghil of a Cow-house: Whereupon the Man being miss'd by his Neighbours, and the Wife making shew of wondering what was become of him, it pleas'd God that one of the Inhabitants of the Town dreamt one Night, that his Neighbor Waters was strangled, and buried under the Dunghill of a Cowhouse; and upon declaring his Dream, Search being made by the Constable, the dead Body was found as he had dream'd; whereupon the Wife was apprehended, and upon examination confessing the Fact, was burnt. And now what Hope can Murderers have of being conceal'd, when they are subject to be discover'd by any Man's Dream?

A Porpus taken, and a Whale seen near London.

A great Inundation in Somersetshire and Gloucestershire.

A Frost that continued from December to April.

A monstrous Child born.

A Man and a Child lynig in Bed, burnt to death with Lightning.

The 19th of January, in his Third Year, a great Porpus was taken at Westham, in a small Creek a mile and a half within the Land; and within a few days after, a Whale came up within 8 miles of London, whose Body was seen divers times above Water, and judg'd to exceed the length of the largest Ship in the River; but when she tasted the fresh Water, and scented the Land, she return'd into the Sea. In his Fourth Year, being the Year 1607, a mighty West-wind brought the Sea into the River Severn with such violence, that in some places of Somersetshire and Gloucestershire the Waters, in divers Towns and Villages, grew higher than the tops of their Houses, so as (notwithstanding all courses that could be taken) there were drowned in Somersetshire 80 Persons, and Damages done to the value of 20000 Pounds: At Coventry also, the 7th of April, so sudden a Flood came into the Suburbs and City, that in one hour it rose in some places above three yards in height, to the great damage and hurt of many: And that which is as much strange, as it suddenly came, so it suddenly abated; so as in four hours and a half it both came and went away. In his sixth Year, being 1609, a Frost began in December, which continued till April following, with such violence, that not only the Thames was so frozen that Carts loaded were drove over it as on dry Land, but many Fowls and Birds perish'd, as also much Herbage in Gardens, especially Artichokes and Rosemary were destroy'd. This Year also, the 11th of April, a Malt-house in the Town of St. Edmunds-bury being by chance set on fire, continued burning till it had consumed 160 Houses; but by the King's Bountifulness (giving 500 Loads of Timber) and the City of London's Relief, the Town was forthwith new built, in a fairer manner than it was before.

In the Year 1613, on the 17th of April, in the Parish of Standish in Lancashire, a female Child was born, having four Legs, four Arms, two Bellies joyn'd to one Back, one Head with two Faces, the one before, the other behind, like the Picture of Janus.

This Year also, the 26th of June, in the Parish of Christ-Church in Hampshire, one John Hitchel a Carpenter, lying in Bed with his Wife and a young Child by them, was himself and the Child both burnt to death with a sudden Lightning, no Fire appearing outwardly upon him, and yet lay burning for the space of almost three Days till he was quite consumed to Ashes. This Year also, on the 7th of August, the Town of Dorchester was quite consumed by Fire, begun in the House of a Tallowchandler, destroying all the Houses, except a few near the Church, and all their Wares and Goods, to the value of 200000 Pounds, yet not any Man or Woman perish'd. About the same time also the Playhouse, call'd the Globe, upon the Bank-side, near London, was quite consumed with Fire, by discharging a Piece of Ordnance, and yet no man hurt: And about four Years after, a new-built Playhouse in Golden-lane, call'd The Fortune, was by neglecting of a Candle clean burnt down to the Ground. In the Year 1614, the Town of Stratford upon Avon was burnt: And, lest the Water should be behind in doing of Mischief, so great Inundations were at this time in Norfolk and Lincolnshire, that the Sea enter'd 12 miles into the Land. In the Year 1612, on the 18th of November, a Blazing-Star began to be seen in the South-East about Five a-clock in the Morning, the Flame or Stream whereof inclined toward the West. This Comet, in the Opinion of Dr. Bembridge the great Mathematician of Oxford, was as far above the Moon as the Moon is above the Earth, what it portended is only known to God, but the sequel of it was, That infinite Slaughters and Devastations follow'd upon it, both in Germany and other Countries. In the Year 1623, on Friday the 24th of October, a Roman-Catholick Priest preach'd in the Afternoon at Hunsdon House, in Black-friers in London, in an upper Chamber, where there were assembled above 300 Men and Women; when about the middle of the Sermon, a great part of the Floor broke, and fell down with such violence that it broke down the Floor under it; in the fall thereof were slain the Preacher, and almost an hundred of his Auditors, besides as many more hurt. In this King's time coarse Paper, commonly call'd White-brown Paper, was first made in England, especially in Surrey, and about Windsor.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Anne, the Daughter of Frederick the Second, King of Denmark, whose Marriage was there solemniz'd in the Year 1589, by whom he had born in Scotland two Sons; Henry, who died before him, and Charles, who succeeded him in the Crown; and one Daughter named Elizabeth, married to Frederick the Fifth of that Name, Count-Palatine of the Rhine, by whom she had many Children, both Sons and Daughters. King James had also by his Wife Queen Anne two other Daughters born in England, the Lady Mary, and the Lady Sophia, who both died young, the Lady Mary at about Three Years old, the Lady Sophia the next day after she was born; and were both of them buried with great Solemnity in the Chapel Royal at Westminster.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was of Stature somewhat higher than ordinary, of a well-compacted Body, of an auburn Hair, of a full and pleasing Visage, in his later days inclining to be fat and burly: As for bodily Exercise, he took most delight in Hunting, which (some thought) he used rather as a retiring himself from the importunity of State-affairs, than for any great Pleasure he took in it: It is said, he had such a fashion in riding that it could not so properly be said he rode, as that his Horse carried him; for he made but little use of his Bridle, and would say, a Horse never stumbled but when he was rein'd. He was of an admirable pregnancy of Wit, and that pregnancy he he much improv'd by continual Study from his Childhood, thro' which he had acquir'd such a promptness in expressing his Mind, that his extemporal Speeches were little inferior to his premeditated Writings: Many, no doubt, had read as much, and perhaps more than he, but scarce ever any concocted his Reading into Judgment, as he did; by which he became so judicious, that tho' he could not prophecy, yet he could presage, and his Conjectures were little less than Oracles. In all the Liberal Sciences he was (we may say) a Master of Arts; but in Divinity, a Doctor; as he made it appear in the Conference at Hampton-Court, and is seen still by the learned Writings he hath left behind him: And as for that part of the Politicks which concerns Monarchy, Regere imperio populos, which himself used to call Kingcraft, in this he excel'd. He knew how to take the Inclinations of the People at their first bound, and never suffer 'em to rise higher than he could well reach 'em, nor to grow stronger than he could either alter or divert 'em. He would be sure to keep his Subjects in a temper of Contentment, which if he could not do by Preventives, he would by Lenitives. He was so wise, that he could dissemble without seeming a Dissembler; be free in opening his Mind, and yet keep Counsel. He was a provident Pilot, that in a Calm would provide for a Storm; and you'd never find him committing the Fault of Non putaram. He was both Marti & Mercurio, but not tam Marti, quam Mercurio, as being of his temper who said, Cedant Arma Togæ; and indeed, seeing Peace is the End of both, 'twere not Wisdom to seek it by Arms if it may be had by the Gown, as 'tis in the Aphorism, Consilio omnia experiri prius, quam Armis sapientem decet. That which was Bounty in him, being a King, would have been Frugality if he had been a private Person, there being of both one radical Reason. Of all the moral Virtues, he was eminent for Chastity; in which the Poet seems to include all Virtue, where he saith,

Nulli fas casto scelus infistere limen:

By Nulli casto meaning no virtuous Person; it was a manifest Argument of his being an excellent Prince, that coming next to the admirable Queen Elizabeth, which was in a manner comparing them together, yet there appear'd no inequality, that it might not untruly be said, King James was but a continuation of Queen Elizabeth, the same Virtue, tho' different Sexes. And now, to express his Character in a Word, which worthily might be Matter for many Volumes; He was to his Wife a most loyal Husband, to his Children a most loving Father, to his Servants a most bountiful Master, to his Subjects a most just Prince, to all Princes near him a most peaceable Neighbour; that more justly it may be said of him, than of whom it was said, Quæ te tam lata tulerunt sæcula? A Prince after Plato's own Heart for his Learning; and, which is infinitely more worth, after GOD's own Heart for his Religiousness and Piety.

OF his Death were many scandalous Rumours spread; and some were so impudent as to write that he was poysoned, as the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Hamilton had been before; but K. James being dead, and his Body open'd, there was found no sign at all of Poyson, his inward parts being all sound, but that his Spleen was a little faulty, which might be Cause enough to cast him into an Ague, the ordinary Highway; especially in old Bodies, to a natural Death: Of this Ague, after a month's languishing, notwithstanding all Remedies that could be applied, he departed this Life at Theobalds on the 27th of March, in the Year 1625, in the 59th of his age, when he had reign'd 22 Years compleat: His Body, for the greater State, was convey'd by Torch-light from Theobalds to Denmark-House, where having rested from the 23d of April to the 7th of May, it was carried to Westminster, and there interr'd in the Chapel-Royal with great Solemnity, but with greater Lamentation, there being scarce any of the infinite Multitude that was present, of whom it might not be said.

Men of Note in his Time.

Military Men of Note, in a Time of Peace, as the whole Reign of King James was, we have no reason to expect; yet if we look amongst the Voluntaries that went to the School of War in the Low-Countries, we shall find a pair of Brothers that may stand in competition with the greatest Soldiers in the most material times; Sir Francis Vere, who was another Hannibal, with his one Eye could see more into Martial Discipline than common Men could do with two; and Sir Horatio Vere, who was another Philopæmen, contain'd in a very little Body a very great both Skill and Courage. But for Men of Note in Learning, as being in the time of a most learned Prince, there was never greater store; of whom these for example: In the curiousness of Preaching there was Dr. Andrews, Bishop of Winchester, who hath left to Posterity a Century of such golden Sermons, that shews he as well deserv'd the Name of Chrysostom as he that had it. In multiplicity of Reading, there was Dr. Reynolds, of Corpus-Christi College in Oxford, who seem'd as 'twere a living Library, and one would have thought his Memory to be a perfect Index of all the Books had ever been wrote. In knowledge of Law, there was Sir Edward Coke, Chief-Justice of the Kings-bench, who hath written such excellent Commentaries of the Law, that he seems another Bartholus or Baldus amongst us. In elegance of Writing, there was Sir Francis Bacon Viscount Albans, who, besides his profounder Books of Novum Organum, hath written the Reign of K. Henry the Seventh in so sweet a Stile, that (like Manna) it pleaseth the taste of all Palates. In the Skill of Antiquities, there was William Camden, King at Arms, who hath set forth the Description of Britain, and the Life of Queen Elizabeth, in so lively Colours that he seems to have brought Britain out of Darkness into Light, and to keep Queen Elizabeth alive after Death. And, to speak it in a word, the Trojan Horse was not fuller of Heroick Grecians, than King James's Reign was full of Men excellent in all kinds of Learning. And here I desire the Reader's Leave to remember Two of my Own old Acquaintance, the

the one was Mr. John Dunne, who leaving Oxford, liv'd at the Inns of Court, not dissolute, but very neat; A great Visiter of Ladies, a great Frequenter of Plays, a great Writer of conceited Verses, until such time as King James taking notice of the Pregnancy of his Wit, was a means that he took him to the study of Divinity, and thereupon proceeding Doctor, was made Dean of St. Pauls; and became so rare a Preacher, that he was not only commended, but even admir'd by all that heard him. The other was Henry Wotton, (mine old Acquaintance also, as having been fellows Pupils, and Chamberfellows in Oxford divers Years together.) This Gentleman was employ'd by King James in Embassage to Venice; and indeed the Kingdom afforded not a fitter Man for matching the Capaciousness of the Italian Wits: A Man of so able dexterity with his Pen, that he hath done himself much wrong, and the Kingdom more, in leaving no more of his Writings behind him.

Of the English Plantations in the Indies, that were in King JAMES's Time.

The first Plantation of Virginia; and what Country it is, and abounding with what Commodities

AND now we are come to a time, wherein we may very near say as much of King James as was said of Augustus Caesar; Super & Garamantas & Indos proferet Imperium. In this better, that where Augustus did it by the violent way of Arms, K. James did it by the civil way of Plantations; for in his Days began the great Plantation of the English in the Indies, and must be acknowledged the proper effect of his peaceable Government. The first Plantation of the English in the Indies was that which is now called Virginia, in memory of the Virgin Queen Elizabeth; but called before Wingandacoe. It was first discover'd by Sir Walter Raleigh, in the Year 1584; to whom the first Letters Patents were granted for making a Plantation there: But yet no Colony was sent thither, till the Year 1606. It is a Country in America, between the degrees of 34 & 45 of the North Latitude; but that part of it which is planted by the English, is under the Degrees of 37, 38, & 39. It is no Island, as many have imagin'd, but a part of the Continent adjoining to Florida. The first and chief Town made here by the English, is call'd James Town, in honour of the King's most Excellent Majesty. It is a Country abounding with all sorts of Fish and Fowl; so fruitful, that it yields thirty, and sometimes forty Bushels of Corn upon an Acre; and that (which is to us more strange) hath three Harvests in a Year; the Corn being sowed, is ripe and reap'd in little more than two Months. Many Plantations had been attempted here before, but came to nothing. The first to any purpose was in the Year 1607, under the Conduct of Captain Gosnoll, John Smith, and Mr. Edward Maria Wingfield, who carried a Colony thither of 100 Persons; but of these many dying of Sickness, or slain by the Savages, a new supply came in the Year 1608, of 120 Persons, under the Conduct of Captain Nelson. After which, was sent another supply of 70 Persons; and in the Year 1609, a third supply came of 500 Persons, under a Patent granted to Sir Thomas West Lord de la Ware, but conducted thither by Sir Thomas Gates, Sir George Somers, and others. In the Year 1611, was a fourth supply of 300 Men under the Conduct of Sir Thomas Gates. In the Year 1612, two other supplies were sent of 40 Men in each; and now was the Lottery spoken of before granted by the King, for further Supplies of this Plantation. After this Mr. Samuel Argall being appointed Governor in the Year 1618, the Lord de la Ware came thither with a supply of 200 People; but in his stay there died. After this, in the Year 1620, were sent thither eleven Ships, with 1216 Persons; and now they founded themselves into Corporations. In the Year 1621, Sir Francis Wyatt was sent thither Governor, with 1300 Men, Women and Children; and now they founded Schools and Courts of Justice, and the Plantation was extended a hundred and forty Miles up, on the River of both sides. But now, when the English were secure, and thought of nothing but Peace, the Savages came suddenly upon them, and slew of them 347 Men, Women, and Children. For repairing of which Loss, the City of London sent presently over a supply of 100 Men. This Massacre happen'd, by reason they had built their Plantations remote from one another, in above thirty several Places, which made them now upon consultation, to reduce them all to five or six Places, whereby they may better assist each other: Since which time they have always liv'd in good Security. And thus much for Virginia.

Upon their security, 300
of them slain
by the Savages.

Next was the Plantation of the Island called Bermudas, so called of a Spanish Ship, called Bermudas, which was there cast away, carrying Hogs to the West-Indies, that swam a-shore, and there encreased. The first Englishman that enter'd this Isle, was one Henry May, in the Year 1591; but in the Year 1610, Sir George Somers was sent thither, who dying there, in memory of his Name, the Isles have ever since been call'd Somers's Isles. In the Year 1612, one Mr. Moor landed there with 60 Persons, and then built the chief Town there, called St. George's, together with 8 or 9 Forts. The same Year a supply of 30 more Persons were sent thither, and the Year after 60 more, under one Mr. Barlet, with a shew to survey the Land; but with a purpose indeed to get from thence a great lump of Ambergrise, and no less than 80 pound weight that had been found and taken up in the Island some few Years before, and was still retain'd. A while after this, came a Ship called the Blessing, with 100 Passengers; and two Days after came the Star, with 180 more; and within fourteen Days after that again came thither the Margaret and two Frigats with 130 Passengers: So as now they began to divide the Country into Tribes, and the Tribes into Shares. In the Year 1616, Captain Daniel Tuckard was sent from Virginia to be Governor there; and now it began indeed to be a Plantation, for now they began to build them Houses: And now was sent from thence into England, a Ship freighted with 30000 weight of Tobacco, valued there but at 2 s. 6 d. the pound, tho' sold here oftentimes for Verino's at great Rates. In the Year 1619, Captain Nathaniel

Butler was sent Governor with new Supplies, in whose time they built them a Church; held Assizes for criminal Causes twice a Year, and began to have Parliaments, as in England: And now in the Ship called the Magazin, came divers Gentlemen of good fashion, with their Wives and Families; so as now their number was no fewer than fifteen hundred People, dispersed twenty Miles in length. In the Year 1622, came Governor Mr. John Bernard, bringing with him a supply of 130 Persons; but he and his Wife dying presently upon their coming, Mr. John Harrison in the Year 1625 was chosen Governor. These Isles of Bermudas are in 32 Degrees of Northern Latitude, so as they are distant from Virginia at least 500 Leagues, and from England above three thousand three hundred. This Country is of a most healthful Air, abounding with all sorts of Fowls, Birds and Fish; and where great pieces of Ambergrise are oftentimes found, which is valu'd there at no less than three Pounds and Ounce. And thus much concerning the State of Bermudas, till the Year 1624.

The Plantation of New-England; and the Commodities of the Country.

Next comes the Plantation of New-England; concerning which, we must first know, that King James in the Year 1606, granted two Letters Patents for Plantations in Virginia; one to the City of London, another to the Cities of Bristol, Exeter, and Plymouth, with power to plant Colonies any where between the Degrees of 38 and 44, provided there should be at least 100 Miles distance between the two Colonies: So as the first Colony was from the City of London, and is that which is called Virginia: The second Colony was from Bristol and the other Towns, and is that which is now called New-England, and is situate between the Degrees of 41 and 45; the very Mean betwixt the North Pole and the Line. And now to speak a little of the Country, there are on the Sea-coast, 25 excellent good Harbours, in some whereof there is Anchorage for 500 Sail of Ships of any burden. The Earth as fruitful, and the Air as healthful as any part of the World, abounding with all sorts of Grain, Fowls and Fish, many of such kinds as are to us unknown, yet excellent Meat: Many Voyages had been made for the perfect discovery of the Country, many attempts for settling a Plantation there; many Miscarriages and Disasters in making the Attempts: But all at last came to this, that in the Year 1624, (which is the Limit of our Narration) there was a Plantation settled, tho' but a small one: But a few Years after (by the sending forth of new Supplies) encreased to so many thousands, that if God continue to prosper it as he hath begun, the New-England in a few Ages may prove as populous as the Old; and the King of England likely to have as many and greater Crowns in the Indies, than he had in his Realms of Great Britain and Ireland. But seeing of these and all other English Plantations in the Indies, whereof there are many, large Discourses are written by divers Authors, it should be more than superfluous to speak more of them in this place: It is sufficient to have shew'd that King James had the honour to have them settled in his time, and under the influence of his peaceable Government.

Of the Earls and Barons made by King JAMES.

IN former Kings Reigns, the making of Earls and Barons was but rare, and therefore they are fitly set down at the several times of their making; but in King James his Reign, there were so many made, that it may not be unfit to set them down in a Catalogue together.

In his first Year were made four Earls and nine Barons; namely, Henry Howard, younger Brother of the late Duke of Norfolk; was made Earl of Northampton: Thomas Sackville Lord Buckhurst, was made Earl of Dorset; and shortly after Charles Bloant Lord Mountjoy, was made Earl of Devonshire, and Thomas Howard Baron of Walden, was made Earl of Suffolk: Henry Grey was made Lord Grey of Groby, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Stamford) Henry Danvers was made Baron of Denby, (afterwards by King Charles made Earl of Denby) Sir John Petre of Essex, was made Baron of Writtle: Sir William Russel was made Baron of Thornough: Sir Thomas Gerard was made Baron of Gerards Bromley in Staffordshire: Sir Robert Spencer was made Baron of Wormelayton in the County of Warwick: Sir Thomas Egerton was made Baron of Elsemere: Sir Robert Cecil was created Baron of Henden in Rutlandshire; and Sir John Harrington was made Baron of Exton.

In his second Year on the 20th of May were made four Barons and one Viscount: Sir Robert Sidney was made Baron of Penhurst: Sir William Knowles, Baron of Grays: Sir Edward Wotton Baron of Marley; and Mildmay Fane Lord de Spencer; and in August the same Year, Sir Robert Cecil Baron of Essenden, was created Viscount Cranburn.

In his 3d Year, on the 4th of May, were created three Earls and one Viscount, and four Barons; namely, Sir Robert Cecil Viscount Cranburn, was created Earl of Salisbury: Sir Thomas Cecil his elder Brother, Lord Burghley, was created Earl of Exeter; and Sir Philip Herbert younger Brother to the Earl of Pembroke, was created Earl of Montgomery: Robert Sidney Baron of Penhurst, was created Viscount of Lisle: Sir John Stanhope was made Baron of Harrington; Sir George Carew Baron of Clopton; Mr. Thomas Arundel of Devonshire, Baron of Warder; and Mr. William Cavendish Baron of Hardwick.

In his 4th Year, on the 4th of July, Sir Thomas Knevet was called by Writ to the Parliament, by the Name of Baron of Estrick, and was thereby Baron of that Title; and on the seventh of September, Sir Jervis Clifton was likewise called by Writ to the Parliament, by the Name of Baron of Layton Bromsensfold, and was thereby Baron of that Title.

In his ninth Year, upon Easter-Monday, Sir Robert Carre was created Viscount Rocheſter; and

In his tenth Year, on the fourth of November, was created Earl of Sumerſet.

In

In his Eleventh Year, Lewis Steward Duke of Lenox was made Earl of Richmond, and after Duke of Richmond.

In his Thirteenth Year, on the 29th of June, Sir James Hay of Scotland was created Baron of Sawley, and about three years after was made Viscount Doncaster; and Sir Robert Dormer was created Baron of Wyng (afterward by K. Charles made Earl of Caernarvon.)

In his Fourteenth Year, on the 9th of July, Sir John Hollis Kt. was created Baron Haughton of Haughton in the County of Nottingham; and Sir John Roper, of Kent, was made Baron of Tenham: And on the 17th of August Sir George Villars was created Baron of Wadham, and Viscount Villars; and on the 7th of November, Thomas Egerton Lord Elsemere was created Viscount Brackley; but he dying soon after, his Son John was created Earl of Bridgewater; William Lord Knowles was created Viscount Wallingford; and Sir Philip Stanhope was created Baron of Shelford: On the 5th of January the Viscount Villars was created Earl of Buckingham, and on the 3d of March, Sir Edward Noel, of Rutlandshire, was made Baron of Rydington.

In his Fifteenth Year, on Newyears day, Sir George Villars Earl of Buckingham was created Marquis of Buckingham; and on the 12th of July Sir Francis Bacon, Lord-Chancellor of England, was created Baron of Verulam, and not long after Viscount St. Albans. Also in the Summer of this Year, the King created four Earls and one Countess, namely, the Viscount Lisle was made Earl of Leicester; the Lord Compton was made Earl of Northampton; the Lord Rich was made Earl of Warwick; the Lord Cavendish was made Earl of Devonshire, and the Lady Compton, Wife to Sir Thomas Compton, and Mother of the Marquis of Buckingham, was created Countess of Buckingham.

In his sixteenth Year, on the 25th of November, Sir John Digby Vicechamberlain to the King, was created Baron of Sherbourn, by Patent to him and his Heirs male.

In his seventeenth Year, in the Month of June, Esme Steward Lord d'Aubigny, younger Brother to the Duke of Lenox, was created Earl of March; James Marquis Hamilton was created Earl of Cambridge; and Sir John Villars, Brother to the Marquis of Buckingham, was created Baron of Stock and Viscount Purbeck.

In his Eighteenth Year, William Cavendish was created Viscount Mansfield, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Newcastle;) and on Monday the 4th of December, Sir Henry Montague, being first made Lord-Treasurer, was created Baron of Kimbolton and Viscount Mandevile, and not long after Earl of Manchester; and Sir John Ramsey Viscount Haddington of Scotland, was created Earl of Holderness; and William Fielding was created Baron of Newenham, and Viscount Fielding.

In his Nineteenth Year Henry Carew was made Lord Carew of Leppington, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Monmouth;) Sir Edward Montague, elder Brother to the Viscount Mandevile, was made Baron of Bolton; the Lord Darcy of Essex was created Viscount Colchester (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Rivers) the Lord Hunsdon was created Viscount Rochford, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Dover) Sir Lionel Cranfield, Master of the Wards, was created Baron Cranfield in Bedfordshire; and Sir Thomas Howard, second Son to Thomas Earl of Suffolk, was created Baron of Charleton and Viscount Andover, (afterward by King Charles made Earl of Berkshire.)

In his Twentieth Year, in the Month of September, the Viscount Doncaster was created Earl of Carlisle; the Viscount Fielding was created Earl of Denbigh; the Lord Digby was made Earl of Bristol; the Lord Cranfield was created Earl of Middlesex; and Sir Henry Rich was made Baron of Kensington.

In his One and twentieth Year, the Marquis of Buckingham being then in Spain with Prince Charles, had his Patent sent him to be Duke of Buckingham; William Gray was created Baron of Werk; Elizabeth, Widow of Sir Moyle Finch of Kent, was created Viscountess Maidstone, afterward by King Charles made Countess of Winchelsea.

In his Two and twentieth Year, the Earl of Clanriccard, of Ireland, was created Viscount Tunbridge in Kent (afterward by King Charles made Earl of St. Albans); Sir John Hollis, Kt. Baron Haughton of Haughton, was created Earl of Clare; Sir Henry Rich, Baron of Kensington, was created Earl of Holland; the Lord Fines, Baron Say and Seal, was made Viscount Say and Seal; Sir Francis Fane was created Earl of Westmoreland; Oliver Lord St. John, of Bletsoe, was made Earl of Bullinbrook; Sir Christopher Villars, Brother to the Duke of Buckingham, was made Earl of Anglesea; and Sir James Ley was made Lord Ley (afterward by K. Charles made Earl of Marlborough.) Also this Year Sir Francis Leak was made Baron of Deincourt, and Sir Richard Roberts was made Lord Roberts of Truro in Cornwall.

And this is the number of all the Earls and Barons made by K. James: But in his time also began another sort of Nobility to be made in England, which had none of the Privileges of English Barons, but had only Title to be call'd Lord of some place either in England or Ireland, tho' they possess'd not a foot of Land in either; of which sort the number being great, I forbear to rehearse them, lest I should be tedious, or otherwise bethought to encroach too much upon the Heralds-Office: 'Tis sufficient to have shewn, that King James advanc'd so many in Honour, that in a kind it might be said of him as was said of Augustus Caesar, That he left Rome of Marble, which he found but of Brick.

THE REIGN OF King CHARLES the First.

proclaim'd.

KING James being deceas'd on the 27th of March in the Forenoon, the same Day, in the Afternoon, Charles Prince of Wales, his only Son then living, was proclaim'd King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, with the general Acclamations of all sorts of People, as being a Prince of admirable Endowments both of Mind and Body. He was now about the Age of 25 Years, whereof the most part of One he had spent in Spain, where altho' he was frustrated of the End for which he went, yet it gave him a tincture of Travel and Experience, more worth perhaps than that he went for.

The Celebration of the Funeral of King James.

The Funeral of the deceas'd King was celebrated on the Seventh of May, his Body being brought from Somerset-House to Westminster, where in St. Peter's Church he was with great Magnificence interr'd, the King himself being principal Mourner; which, tho' it was contrary to the Custom of his Predecessors, yet he rather chose to express his Piety in attending the Body of his Father at his Funeral, than to stand upon any old Niceties and Points of State.

The King and Queen's Espousals at Paris.

The first thing he did after the Celebration of the Funeral, was to hasten the coming over of the Queen, to whom, on Sunday the First of May, he was by his Proxy the Duke of Chevreux espoused at Our Lady's Church in Paris, where the Espousals were perform'd by the Cardinal of Richelieu.

The Queen arrives at Dover.

On Trinity-Sunday, late at Night, she arriv'd at Dover; which being signified to the King, (then at Canterbury) he went to her early the next Morning, and receiv'd her with the greatest Demonstration of Affection; and the same Day they came to Canterbury, where their Nuptials were with all possible Magnificence compleated, and the Duke of Chevreux furrunder'd his Royal Charge to the King.

The King and Queen come to Somerset-House.

On Wednesday the 15th of June they went by Coach to Gravesend, and the next Day they came from thence to Somerset-House in their Royal Barges, attended with a very numerous train of Lords and Ladies, and welcomed as they pass'd by the great Ordnance from several Ships in the River and the Tower of London, and accompanied or met by most of the Barges and Boats that could be found on the River of Thames.

The Third Day after their arrival, their Marriage was declar'd at Whitehall with great Acclamations of Joy, the King and Queen presenting themselves in that Ceremony on Royal Thrones before the Nobility. But the Pestilence began to rage in London at this time, which abated much of the Pomp of the Solemnity, tho' neither that nor any thing else did divert the King from the consideration of the other Concernments of the Kingdom; for having summon'd a Parliament to meet on the 18th of June, at the first assembling thereof he set before them the Necessities he was under on account of the War, into which his Father, by their persuation, had enter'd for the recovery of the Palatinate; and demanded a Supply.

The King's Marriage declar'd.

His Speech was very well receiv'd, and tho' it did not produce so great a Supply as the exigence of Affairs requir'd, yet the Commons gave two Subsidies without any Condition, and the Clergy three; and in the Grant of the Laity, the Papists were to pay double.

The King very graciously accepted the Gift, as an Earnest of the good Affections of his People, in reference to greater Sums which he expected to follow: But the Plague encreasing in London, the Parliament, on the 11th of July, was adjourn'd to Oxford, to be held there on the first of August. The Commons had sent up a Bill for Tonnage and Poundage to the Lords before the adjournment; but because 'twas limited to a Year, they thought it unfit to pass, for that most of the former Grants to the King's Predecessors were for term of Life. The Cause of this Restraint was, because the Customs had been rais'd by King James, by Advice of his Council in the eighteenth Year of his Reign, and the Commons had a Purpose to reduce them to the Rate that was settled in Queen Mary's time.

August

The King's Speech to the Parliament.

August the First the Parliament assembled at Oxford, and on the Fourth of the same Month both Houses, by the King's appointment, attended him in Christ-Church Hall, where he briefly acquainted them with his Wants for fitting out the Fleet, adding, That the Eyes of the Confederates were fix'd upon it.

The Commons, upon their return from the King to their House, had several long Debates upon the substance of his Speech and the present Condition of the Kingdom, all tending to an Arraignment of the Government; Some urg'd, that our Necessities arose by Improvidence; That the King's Designs were guided by evil Counsel; and, That tho' a former Parliament engag'd the King in a War, yet if things were manag'd by contrary Designs, and the Treasure misemploy'd, this Parliament was not bound to be carried blindfold in Designs not guided by sound Counsel; and, That it was unusual to grant Subsidies upon Subsidies before Grievances were redress'd: And before they would agree to any Answer to what the King propos'd (upon some Jealousie that the Popish Religion was too much countenanc'd) they framed a Petition against Popish Recusants, which was presented to him by their Speaker, attended by all the House of Commons. The King seem'd not displeas'd at this delay, and the Parliament receiv'd from him a very gracious and satisfactory Answer to their Petition, nevertheless this kindness did not produce answerable Effects; for when the Matters of Supply came to be again debated by the Commons great Division arose, some would give, others would not, and the majority were prevail'd on by many passionate Instances of Misgovernment, to insist on Redress of Grievances before Supply, and to have a Remonstrance of it drawn up and presented to the King, inveighing in their Speeches against the Duke of Buckingham, as the chief occasion of all Miscarriages in Government. Nothing more than this could shew the mutability of human Affairs, and how little dependance is to be laid on the Affections of the People; for, in the last Parliament of King James, this Duke of Buckingham, against whom they now exclaim'd, was extol'd for the Great Ornament and Honour of the English Nation, and the chief Preserver of the Kingdom from the Spanish Practices; nay, no Honour's thought large enough to requite his Merit. The King, from those of his Council in the House of Commons, had Advice from time to time of the Matter of this Remonstrance in the Debates on it, which tended chiefly to discredit the Duke, and remove him from his Counsels and Affection, but the Expressions were so sharp, and the Stile so unusual from Subjects to their Prince, that the King determin'd rather to dissolve the Parliament than admit of it, and thereupon he came to the Lords House to put an end to it. The House of Commons were resolv'd into a Grand Committee, when the Usher of the Black-Rod came to call them up to the Lords House, in order to a Dissolution, but before they would admit the Speaker to resume the Chair, to sit as a House, one Glanvil stood up, and declar'd the Sence of the House in these words:

First, To give His Majesty Thanks for his Gracious Answer to our Petition for Religion.

Next, For his Care of our Health, in giving us Leave to depart this dangerous time.

Lastly, A dutiful Declaration of our Affection and Loyalty, and propose to supply His Majesty in a Parliamentary way, in a fitting and convenient time.

This being done, the Usher was call'd in, and declar'd his Message, and the Dissolution of the Parliament immediately ensued.

Soon after this a Proclamation was set out to put the Laws in execution against Popish Recusants, commanding the return, by a prefix'd time, of Children of Noblemen and others, sent to be educated in Popish Schools or Seminaries abroad; and all the King's Subjects under the Pay of the Emperor, the King of Spain, and the Archduchies, who then govern'd the Spanish Netherlands, were speedily enjoin'd to return to their native Countries, to be employ'd in the King's Service.

The Term, because of the Plague in London, Term kept at Reading, and special Instructions were given to the Judges, to put the Laws in execution against Recusants. Term kept at Reading in Berkshire.

And now the War with Spain for the recovery of the Palatinate, which was resolv'd on in the last Year of his Father's reign, was vigorously prosecuted, and the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Holland were sent Ambassadors to the United Provinces, where they met at the Hague the Ambassadors of France and Denmark, and concluded a League with them and the States, for restoring the Liberties of Germany. The K. of Denmark, in conformity with the League, took up Arms, but was unfortunate therein, which he imputed to the King's not performing what was promised on his part, and that was occasion'd by the Parliament's failure of Supplies of Money. And for the same reason the Fleet, which should have been set out in the beginning of Summer, to attempt something on the Coast of Spain, were not out till October following: In which expedition the Viscount Wimbleton was General of the Land-Forces, and the Earl of Essex Vice-Admiral of the Navy.

The Fleet, with the addition of some Dutch Vessels, consisted of 80 good Ships. At their first setting forth they were encounter'd by so violent a Storm, that the greatest part were disperfed and scatter'd for 7 days together, and a gallant Ship, call'd The long Robert of Ipswich, with 170 Persons in it, was lost. After this Tempest the Fleet met at the Southern Cape, where they enter'd into consultation what they should attempt; the Earl of Essex, out of a great Desire to equal the Glory his Father got at Cadiz, propos'd the assailing of the Spanish Fleet, which then lay in that Harbour but there were so many Difficulties attending it, and so much Time spent in the Debate of it, that the whole Coast of Spain was thereby alarm'd, and the Spaniards had Opportunity to prepare for their defence; so that when it was concluded, that they should sail to Cadiz, they landed their Men there with great Danger and Opposition. The first place they attempted was Puntal Castle, under shelter whereof the Spanish Ships rode, for the taking of which, 20 English and 5 Dutch Ships were order'd; but they, after the spending 2000 great shot against it to little purpose, came off again. This not succeeding, Wimbleton sent Sir John Burroughs with a select Regiment of Foot to attack the Fort on the Land-side; but these, at their first appearance, were encounter'd by some Spanish Forces, which were drawn together for the defence of the Country, and after a sharp Engagement they worsted the Spaniards in sight of the Castle; whereupon the Commander within it hung out a white Flag, and after a short parley surrender'd the place, with 15 Barrels of Powder and 8 pieces of Ordnance: But whilst this was doing, the Spaniards haul'd most of their best Ships under the Port-Royal, so that Sir Samuel Argale, who was set to fire the Ships, was disappointed of his purpose. But that which might have been very fatal therein, was the misgovernment of the Soldiers, who by the Avarice or Negligence of their Commanders, were permitted to fill themselves so much with the Wine they found in the Cellars, and other places they plunder'd, that they became more like Beasts than Men; and if the Spaniards had had good Intelligence, they might have been all cut off; for by this means they were so ungovernable that the General, fearing the consequence thereof, speedily caused them to be embark'd, and left behind him the Hopes only of Renown and Victory. From thence they sail'd to the Southern Cape, where they staid 20 days in expectation of the Plate-Fleet, but by the inclemency of the Air and intemperance of the Soldiers and Mariners, so great a Contagion hapned in the Fleet, that they wanted Men to manage the Sails, and as some Ships had a greater number of infected persons than others, to remedy this a most pernicious course was taken, for every Ship was order'd by Lot to take in two sick, in exchange for so many sound Men, which propagated the Pestilence, and forced the General to an untimely return four days before the Plate-Fleet came.

The unprosperous Success of this Fleet displeased the King very much, and Wimbledon was some time prohibited his presence, but he excused himself, laying great part of the Miscarriage on the stubbornness of the Earl of Essex; yet tho' all were blamed, none were punish'd for the ill managery and conduct of the Expedition.

Money borrow'd by Letters of Privy-Seal.

To be repaid in 18 months.

The War became now very chargeable, and since the King could not be supplied in a Parliamentary way, he was advis'd by his Council to use other means; so it was resolv'd to borrow what Money could be got by Letters of Privy-Seals sent to several of the ablest persons in all parts of the Kingdom; in each of which Letters the King promised, in the Name of himself and his Successors, to repay the Money in 18 months after the payment thereof to the Collector, and the Collectors of this Loan were order'd to pay the Sums receiv'd into the Exchequer, and to return the Names of such as went about to delay, or excuse the payment of the Money required of them.

This manner of proceeding was thought very improper, unless it had been resolv'd not to call a Parliament so soon after; for if the King in that conjuncture had clapt up a Peace with Spain, (which the Spaniard had as much reason to accept as he to offer) he might have freed himself from the necessity of calling Parliaments, (till by the goodness of his Government he had no necessity for a Parliament to work upon) and likewise prevented a following unlucky Rupture betwixt him and France. The King however was resolv'd to try his fortune in another Parliament, which was summon'd to meet at Westminster on the 6th of February; but first the Solemnities of the Coronation were to be perform'd, which was celebrated on the 2d of February, (commonly called Candlemas-day) in the external pomp whereof the King omitted his triumphant riding thro' the City, from the Tower to Whitehall, partly to save the Charge thereof, and partly to prevent the danger of popular Concourse, for the Plague was not quite decreased, but some Dregs remained of it. In the sacred part there was a Clause added which had been pretermitted in the time of K. Henry the Sixth, which is this that followeth, viz. Let him obtain Favour of the People, like Aaron in the Tabernacle, Elisha in the Water, Zecharias in the Temple; Give him Peter's Key of Discipline, and Paul's Doctrine. Which Clause had been omitted in time of Poverty, as intimating more Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction to be given to our Kings than the Popes allowed of.

The Coronation Oath, tho' the contrary was suggested, was the same which had been taken by his Predecessors, as appears by the Records of the Exchequer.

The Solemnity being over, he began his second Parliament on the 6th of February, in which he had no better Success than in his first. Sir Heneage Finch was chosen Speaker by the Commons, and approv'd by the King, a Person of great Prudence and Moderation. The House of Commons began where they left at Oxford, with Matters of Religion and publick Grievances: They made strict Enquiry into what Abuses had been of the King's Grace since that time, and who were the Authors and Abettors thereof; for they had been inform'd of many Pardons and Reprieves to Jesuites and Priests: And their Grievances were stated under four Heads.

1. The state of the King in the constant Revenues of the Crown.
2. The Condition of the Subject in his Freedom.
3. The Cause of the Nation's good Success in former Times.
4. The present Condition of the Kingdom.

Under the First Head was consider'd the great Disposall of Lands and Pensions mero motu, and other exorbitant Expences: In the Second, the bringing in of new Impositions, the multiplying of Monopolies, and the levying of Tonnage and Poundage without an Act of Parliament: Under the Third, they ascrib'd the great Renown and Reputation of our Nation in former times to the Wisdom and Gravity of the Counsellors, when nothing was order'd but by publick debate, whence rose a readines in the Subject to assist their Sovereign in Purse and Person: In the Fourth was represented the loss of the Nation's wonted Reputation in the Expedition of Cadiz, and others, which was imputed to the want of such Councils as were heretofore used; forasmuch as Men, thro' difference of Success, were backward to adventure either their Persons or their Purses.

Whilst these Debates were agitated by the Commons, the Earl of Arundel was by the King committed to the Tower, because of a Marriage con-consummate betwixt the Lord Maltravers, his eldest Son, and the eldest Sister of the Duke of Lenox, one near ally'd in Blood to the King; for the King had design'd to marry her to the Lord of Lorne, eldest Son to the Earl of Argyle, a Man of great power in Scotland, meditating thereby to reconcile those two Families, who had been anciently in Feuds.

The Earl besought the King's Pardon, and protested his Innocency, as no way privy to the business, being contriv'd by the Dutchess-Dowager and his Countess, without his knowledge; but the King would not hear him.

This Commitment of the Earl was resented by the House of Peers, who petition'd the King, That it is their undoubted Right, that no Peer sitting in Parliament is to be imprison'd without Order from the House of Peers, unless it be for Treason, Felony, or refusing to give Security for the Peace. And they insisted the more on this Privilege at this time, because the Earl had six Proxies deputed to him, which would be of no validity during his restraint.

Upon this Petition many Debates pass'd in the House of Lords upon several Messages of the King about this Privilege, which lasted from the 14th of March to the 8th of June ere he was satisfied with Reasons of the Peers; and then the Earl was releas'd from his Imprisonment.

Whilst these Matters were agitated at home, to make the Difference greater between the Dutch and the Spaniard, and for further promoting that War, the King of France did conclude a little Treaty at the Hague by the Baron of Couper, concerning the equipping of a Fleet of 10 Ships, under the Admiral Hautain, upon a Design to straiten Genoua by Water, whilst the Constable des Diguees should be able to do the same by Land; and the French Ambassador then Resident at London had obtain'd of the King the Vanguard, one of the Navy-ships, and 16 Merchant-ships, to be employ'd in the same Expedition; but, shortly after, these English Ships were receiv'd into the Pay of France: Monsieur de Soubise, taking advantage of the French Army's advance towards Italy, incited those of Rochel to stir against the King, and he, with some Ships he had got together, seiz'd on the Isle of Rhee and some of the King of France's Ships in the Harbour: At this the King was so incens'd that he turn'd his Design for Italy upon Rochel, and that occasion'd another Treaty at the Hague with the Hollanders, betwixt d'Especes the French Ambassador and them, which was concluded the 12th of April N.S. whereby the 20 Ships under Hautain were agreed to be employ'd against Soubise, and against Rochel. In the mean time many of the French Protestants took great offence at this assistance from Holland against Rochel, but their Alliance with France, and Interest of State, prevail'd above all other Considerations. Mornancy the French Admiral being thus strengthened by the Dutch Fleet, and the seven English Ships, quickly chased Soubise into the Isle of Oleron, and repriz'd most of the Ships he had taken, freighting Rochel by Sea whilst the French Army was marching to block it up by Land. The King was much offended that the English Ships were employ'd in this Action, having not consented they should be used in any other Expedition than against Genoua; and thereupon he sent an expostulatory Message to the King of France, to have a reason thereof; and to demand restitution of the Ships; and when satisfaction was not given herein, the King caused a rich French Ship of Newhaven to be seiz'd on. This occasion'd great Clamour in France, and the French, by way of retaliation, arrested the English Merchants Ships and Goods in their Harbours; but after a while a Reconciliation was made, the King had his Ships again, the French Ship was restored, and the Merchant-ships and Goods were deliver'd back; and thus all was calm for the present.

The Traverses in the House of Peers about the Earl of Arundel rather heightned than allay'd their Intention towards the Duke of Buckingham, and Encouragement is given to all that would to inform against him. One Dr. Turner, a Physician, propos'd six Queries in the House of Commons touching his ill Conduct in affairs, which reflected much upon the King's Government, and was so resented by him,

1. Whether the King hath not lost the Regality of the Narrow Seas since the Duke became Admiral?
2. Whether his not going as Admiral in this last Fleet was not the Cause of the ill Success?
3. Whether the King's Revenue hath not been impair'd thro' his immense Liberality?
4. Whether he hath not engross'd all Offices, and prefer'd his Kindred to unfit Places?
5. Whether he hath not made Sale of Places of Judicature?
6. Whether Recusants have not dependance upon his Mother and Father-in-law?

Neither was this the only thing that displeas'd the King at this time in the Proceedings of the Commons: They had sent Committees to the Signer-Office, to search for Originals of his Letters for reprieving some Priests condemn'd at York, and when Sir Richard Weston, Chancellor of the Exchequer, brought a Message to them from him for Supply, acquainting them, that the Fleet was return'd, Victuals spent, and the Men in great necessity, and ready to mutiny for want of Pay; and, that a Fleet of 40 Ships, which were ready to go out, could not move without Money; and, that the Army on the Sea-Coasts was in want both of Victuals and Clothes; they were not prevail'd on, but one Mr. Clement Cook, among other Invectives, said, 'Twas better to die by a foreign Enemy, than to be destroy'd at home.

This high Temper of the Commons House was a Subject of much Discourse at this time; 'twas said, The Parliament is a very necessary Constitution, but is not without its Inconveniencies, as all others are; and among these, the great license of Speech in the House of Commons is not the least; for tho' it be even necessary that they should not be debarr'd Liberty, yet that in the Intention seems not to be boundless, for at all times the Zeal for Reformation of Abuses in that House being very great, those amongst them that have a facility of eloquent Speaking may do great hurt, if they be not well inclin'd to the Government. But those who thought the Court, by long Plenty and Ease, somewhat too exorbitant, believ'd this freedom of Speech very necessary.

Dr. Turner's Queries.

Sir Richard Weston's Message for Money.

1625.

And at this time, whether it were out of a general Envy against the Duke because of his sudden exaltation to Greatness, or a particular Disgust of some that thought they merited (as well as he) a greater share than they had in the King's Favour, the Tide against him, in both Houses, (but especially in the House of Commons) ran so high, that nothing would be granted to the King at a lower rate than his Ruin. In the mean time the King manifested a great displeasure at those Proceedings, and sent Sir Richard Weston to demand satisfaction; in which they not answering his expectation by so sudden an Inquisition as he requir'd, he call'd the Lords and them together, and by the Lord-Keeper Coventry (who lately had the Seal given him upon the disgrace of Williams Bishop of Lincoln, who was displaced) he spake sharply to them of their Proceedings: First, in suffering the Words spoken by Dr. Turner and Mr. Cook to pass without Punishment: Secondly, in sending a Committee to search his Signet-Office: Thirdly, in their violent prosecuting the Duke of Buckingham, who, he said, had done nothing, but by order from himself: Fourthly, in delaying the Supply, and not granting it in the necessary proportion: Fifthly, in having order'd, that the Bill should not be brought in till their Grievances were redress'd. In conclusion he told them, That if their Supplies were answerable to his expectation, he would continue their Session, otherwise he should be oblig'd to dismiss them.

This Speech caused great emotion in the House of Commons, and produced a Remonstrance to this effect; That concerning Mr. Cook, true it is, he let fall some few Words that might admit an ill construction, and the House was displeas'd therewith, as they declar'd by a general Check at the very time he spoke them; and tho' Mr. Cook's explanation of his Mind more clearly did somewhat abate the Offence of the House, yet were they resolv'd to take it into further consideration, and so have done, the Effect whereof had appear'd ere this, had they not been interrupted by this his Majesty's Message; and the like Interruption befel them also in the business of Dr. Turner.

As concerning the examination of the Letters of his Secretary of State, as also of his Majesty's own, and searching the Signet-Office and other Records, they had done nothing therein not warranted by the Presidents of former Parliaments upon the like occasions.

That concerning the Duke, they did humbly beseech his Majesty to be inform'd, that it hath been the constant and undoubted usage of Parliaments to question and complain of any Person, of what Degree soever; and what they should do in relation to him, they little doubted but it should redound to the honour of the Crown, and safety of the Kingdom.

Lastly, as to the matter of Supply, That if addition may be made of other things, importing his Service then in consultation among them, they were resolv'd so to supply him, as might evidence the truth of their Intentions, might make him safe at home, and formidable abroad.

The King's Answer.

To this the King answer'd briefly, That he would have them in the first place consult about matters of the greatest importance, and that they should have time enough for other matters afterward. But this stay'd not their Progress against the Duke, to which the Earl of Bristol also contributed in the Lords House.

This Earl had been secluded from the presence of both King James and King Charles ever since his return from his Embassy in Spain, and taking advantage of the Time, he petition'd the Peers; That whereas being a Peer of the Realm, he had not receiv'd a Writ of Summons to the Parliament, he pray'd he might enjoy the Liberty of a Subject, and the Benefit of Peerage, after two years restraint, without being brought to Trial; and if any Charge were brought in against him, he might be try'd in Parliament. Upon reading this Petition, the Lords refer'd it to their Committee of Privileges; from whence, after due consideration thereof, a Report was made to the House by the Earl of Hertford, That it was the Opinion of the Committee, that his Majesty should be moved to grant a Writ of Summons to the Earl; which was agreed to by the House: And upon request made to the King, a Writ was issued accordingly, but accompanied with a Letter from the Lord-Keeper to him, That tho' his Majesty had given way to the awarding of the Writ, yet notwithstanding his Pleasure was, that his Lordship should continue still under the same restraint as he did before; and, that his personal attendance was to be forborn.

The Earl sends this Letter to the House of Lords, and a second Petition with it, offering to them how much this might trench upon the Liberty and Safety of the Peers, to be in this sort discharg'd by a Letter missive of any Subject without the King's Hand, beseeching them he might be heard, both as to his wrongful restraint, and what he hath to say against the Duke.

This alarm'd the Duke to begin first with him, and by his persuasion the King commands the Attorney-General to summon the Earl to the Lords Bar as a Delinquent.

Bristol appearing May the first, the Attorney acquainted the Peers, that he came to accuse him of High-Treason, and exhibited eleven Articles against him, but before they were read the Earl said, My Lords, I am a Free-man, and a Peer of the Realm unattainted, I have somewhat to say of high consequence for his Majesty's Service, and I beseech your Lordships give me leave to speak.

The Lords upon this bid him go on. Then, said he, I accuse that Man, the Duke of Buckingham, of High-Treason; and immediately he presented twelve Articles against him.

The House, after having read these Articles, committed the Earl of Bristol to the Custody of the Usher of the Black-Rod, and order'd that the King's Charge against the Earl should be first proceeded on, before that of the Earl against the Duke; which the King took very well.

The Articles on both sides concurr'd in one Design, which was to render each other suspected in matters of Loyalty and Religion, tho' by so doing they made good sport to their Enemies, and the World besides, but in neither of them was any Fact that amounted to Treason; and because no proceeding was made on them, it it is not very requisite to describe them at large. But there being an endeavour to take the Earl's Cause out of the House of Lords, and to proceed by way of Indictment thereon in the King's Bench, the Lords resented this, and gave five Reasons why they could not give way to that manner of proceeding; which were these following, (viz.)

1. He could have no Council.
2. He could use no Witness against the King.
3. He could not know what the Evidence against him would be in a convenient time, to prepare for his defence.
4. The Liberties of the House would thereby be infringed.
5. This Earl being indicted, it would not be in their Power to keep him from Arraignment, and so he might be disabled to make good his Charge against the Duke, and therefore it was judg'd the most proper, and most legal way of proceeding, First to have the Charge deliver'd into the House of Peers in Writing, and the Earl to set down his Answer to it in Writing, and that the Witnesses might be examined, and Evidence on both sides heard; and if upon full hearing the House should find it to be Treason, then to proceed by way of Indictment; if doubtful in point of Law, to have the Opinion of the Judges to clear it; if doubtful in matter of Fact, then to refer it to Regall fait.

The Commons to load heavier upon the Duke did also, about this time, send up some of their Members, (viz.) Sir Dudley Diggs, Sir John Eliot, Mr. Selden, Mr. Glanvil, Mr. Pym, Mr. Wansford, Mr. Herbert, and Mr. Sherland with thirteen Articles of high Offences and Misdemeanours against him, containing several Encroachments on the Royal Favour, and some Miscarriages, which at another time, and in another Man might have been conniv'd at: Nevertheless, he put in his Answer to them, which was inlay'd with so much Modesty and Humility, that many who expected a more disdainful defence, were converted to a good Opinion of him; and in regard there was nothing considerable in them, but what was acted and happen'd in the time of King James, and not legally cognoscible at this time, he claim'd the Benefit of Pardon in the 21st of King James, and the present King's Coronation Pardon. But this being contrary to the Expectation of the Commons, upon the 14th of June they had drawn up a Declaration of the same Mould of their Impeachment, which was not without difficulty prefer'd before a Bill of Subsidy, then ready to be read; at which the King was so dissatisfied, that the next Day, by a Commission under the Great Seal, directed to certain Lords, he dissolv'd the Parliament. No sooner was he freed from this, but the necessity of his Affairs involv'd him in another Imbroylment. The French Priests and Domesticks of that Nation, which came into England with the Queen, were grown so insolent, and put so many Affronts upon the King, that he was forced to send them home; in which he did no more than what the French King had done before him, in sending back all the Spanish Courtiers which the Queen brought with her. But that King not looking on his own Example, and knowing on what ill terms the King stood, both at home and abroad first seized on all the Merchants Ships, which lay on the River of Bourdeaux, and then the Peace lately patcht up was turn'd into an open War, so that the King was fain to make use of those Forces against the French, which were design'd to have been used against the Spaniard, and to comply with the Desires of the Rochellers, who humbly sued to him at this time, for their Protection and Defence. But the Fleet which he design'd for their Assistance, not going out till after Michaelmas, found greater Opposition at the Sea, than they fear'd from the Land, being encounter'd with strong Tempests, and thereby necessitated to return, without doing any thing, but only shewing the King's Good-will, and Readiness to help them.

Whilst this Dispute betwixt the two Kings continu'd, very sad News came hither from Germany, That the King of Denmark, who had arm'd (as was before mentioned) on behalf of the Elector Palatine, and the Protestant Princes of Germany, notwithstanding the late Aid sent from England of six thousand Men, under the Conduct of Sir Charles Morgan, had on the 17th of August receiv'd a total Overthrow by Tilly, and was reduced to such distress, that if present succour came not, he was ruin'd for ever: That the Sound was like to be lost, the English Garrison at Stood straightly besieg'd, and our East-land Trade and Staple at Hamborough almost given up for gone.

The King was much perplext at this, and the more because of his Inability in the Condition he was to send further Succours to him.

That which chiefly was wanting, was Treasure, and the present use of it could not admit of so much delay as to call a Parliament, which is the ordinary means of Supply. The King was therefore in this straight advis'd by his Council, That forasmuch as the Commons in Parliament, at their late Sitting, had pass'd a Bill of Subsidies, and that the Parliament was dissolv'd before the Bill pass'd into an Act, he might require these Subsidies of the Subjects, which the House of Commons in their Names had assented to, and yet not by the name of Subsidies, but in the way of Loan, till the next Parliament should enable him to make payment of it, or to confirm the levying thereof by a subsequent Act. In pursuance of this Advice, Commissions were issued out under the Great Seal to divers Commissioners in all parts for levying these Moneys, who had the Instructions following, to direct them in the Execution thereof.

1. That for a good Example to others, they should themselves lend His Majesty the several Sums required.
2. To go according to the Rates at which People were assessed in the Book of the last Subsidy.
3. To stir up every Man to a cheerful lending, by declaring the unavoidable necessity of taking this Course, and using other the most prevalent Arguments they could devise; as, the Honour of the Nation, the Defence of True Religion, the Safety of Prince and People.
4. That they appoint the Day of Payment to be within fourteen Days.
5. That they treat with every one apart, and not in the hearing of others.

And besides these private Instructions, they were to represent to the People the deplorable estate of Rochel, then closely besieged by the Duke of Guise, which if not speedily relieved, would fall into the Hands of the Enemies of the Protestant Religion. But tho' these Commissioners brought in good Sums of Money, yet many, and some of good Quality refused, and were therefore committed to several Prisons.

This Year died two of the most eminent Men for Learning that ever the Nation had, Dr. Andrews Bishop of Winchester, and Sir Francis Bacon Viscount of St. Albans.

It was now the third Year of His Majesty's Reign, when the Action was agreed on; and tho' Money came not so plentifully as was hoped, yet the Duke of Buckingham, High Admiral of England, desirous to wipe away the Imputation of Negligence, in relation to his Admiralship, had, with much ado, compleated his Naval Forces, consisting of six thousand Horse and Foot in ten Ships-Royal, and ninety Merchant-men; with which he sets Sail from Portsmouth the 27th of June, and publish'd his Manifesto the twenty first of July following, declaring at large the King's Affection to the Reformed Churches in France, and his Displeasure at his misemployment of his Ships against the Rochellers. The first design of this Fleet was intended against Fort Lewis, wherein being prevented by the Duke of Angoulesme, they resolv'd upon the Isle of Rhe; twelve Ships therefore were sent to guard the Entry of Port Breton, the rest sail'd on to a Fort of the Isle of Rhe, called De la Price, making their approaches with their Cannon so near, that Toiras, Governor of the Citadel of St. Martin, perceiving their Intention, sent out his Forces to the number of one thousand, in seven partitions, Horse and Foot, to impede their coming on shore: These were encounter'd by twelve hundred English, whom Sir John Burroughs, Sir Alexander Brett, Sir Edward Conway, and Sir Charles Rich, had landed by the advantage of their great Ordnance. The Fight was sharp and quick, wherein many brave Gentlemen lost their Lives on both sides; the Victory uncertain. The English General remov'd his Camp, and intrenching, dispatcht Soubise, and Sir William Beecher to Rochel, who return'd with five hundred Foot, and found the Duke before St. Martin's Castle, (the chief strength of the Island) notwithstanding the dissuasion of his Council, who advis'd him first to attempt the other Castle, called The Mede, which they might in all likelihood have carried, and would have prov'd an handsome and safe place of retreat in their future necessity. Buckingham falls to circumvallation ordering the Ships to encompass the Island without, to hinder all provision and supply from Toiras; by which means the besieged were for the space of two Months greatly distress'd, in which time there happen'd a hot Conflict between both Parties, and that with equal success; and by a Letter of Toiras to Monsieur Bellamount, their Extremity appear'd to be such, that (as he there said) the Mills could not long stand, all their Corn was spent, which enforced their Soldiers to feed on their store of Biskets, not lasting above ten Days: Hereupon the Duke of Buckingham did summon Toiras, who refusing to falsify his Trust, the English, now strengthened with fresh Auxiliaries from England and Ireland, under the Command of Sir Ralph Bingham, and Sir Pierce Crosby, set themselves to invent new sorts of Engines to batter the Citadel; all which were rendred fruitless by Wind and Waves. And one Abbot Marsiliane procured Monsieur Vulme to undertake the conveying of twelve Pinnaces laden with Provision to the Relief of Toiras and his Soldiers, which he prosperously achiev'd, and at his return carried back with him their sick and wounded.

In the mean time scarcity affects the English Camp, and Sir John Burroughs viewing the Works, was shot through, whereof he shortly died. The French King came from Court to the Camp, and thrice in ten Days attempted to send over some Aids to the Castle, but the English Ships repelled them, and three Days after another Brother of Toiras was slain, and his Squadron put to flight. And now the Soldiers of the Castle were reduc'd to greater Hardship than before, not being furnish'd with Bread for above four Days; wherefore having no other way left, Toiras resolv'd to win time by treating with the Duke of Buckingham about surrender, hoping in the interim to have some better News from the Associates, which accordingly fell out; for Monsieur Manpaile, who with other Pilots, heretofore had founded the Shelves, and resign'd the Station for some Ships, for the relief of the Island, contriv'd a way to bring them, in despite of the English. It was now the Winter, and the Nights long and dark, by which advantage he had opportunity to pass by them with a Fleet of 35 Sail, and 150 Mariners, 300 Soldiers, 160 of the chief Nobility, and many noble Commanders, with great store of all sorts of Provision, having before sent some dissembling Renegadoes, to tell the English that he passed a contrary way; so that when the Duke of Buckingham expected a surrender, they boldly shew'd him their Rundlets of Wine, and Turkeys and Capons upon the Points of their Pikes and Spears.

The Duke hereat dismay'd, spends the Night in Council, and determines with all speed to raise the Siege, and be gone, but the Rochellers Entreaties, and Dolbire's arrival from England, with assurance of Auxiliaries, unhappily prevail'd with him for a longer stay, during which, the fame of fresh Supplies to the Besiegers publish'd over all France to be coming, under the Command of the Earl of Holland, hastened the French to send forth another Fleet, consisting of fifteen good Ships, and other smaller Boats, part to St. Martins, and the rest to the Meadow-Castle, besides seven others which got to the Meadow-Fort, under Bellamont's Command. And now the French King resolv'd to dislodge the English, dispatch'd over for the Service an Army of four thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse, besides Volunteers, under the Command of the Marshal of Schomberg, with Marillac his Lieutenant General, to whom came all the besieged, and greatest part of the Islanders, being in all above eleven thousand Men: After which another Party under command of Bassompierre and Halliere, consisting of eight hundred of their King's Lifeguard, an hundred and fifty of the Country thereabout, thirty of the King's Horse, and three great Brass Pieces, landed at the Meadow-Castle. Against these last the Duke of Buckingham march'd with five hundred Foot, and forty Horse, and forced them to retreat to the Castle, but returning to his Camp, he finds the Trenches possessed by another Party of the French Army: Stanley is order'd to beat them out again, which he doth by main force, tho' not without loss; and the Lord Montjoy seized a small Troop of French: Him they endeavour'd to surprize with six Horse in shew; whom he chased so far, that he had almost come in danger of their Ambuscade. One dark Night a Party of the English fell upon a Party of the French, and not well discovering one another, so mingled, that by mistake the English falling into the French Camp, became a prey to them.

Nor did War only afflict the English, but also Sickness and Want, whereby their Soldiers and Seamen were generally enfeebled, which put the Duke upon his final Resolution of taking his farewell of the Island, with one more Assault to St. Martin's Castle. Toiras had intelligence of it, and therefore he managed his Business accordingly, and gave them so hot a welcome, as, being oppress'd and fell'd to the Ground with Shot, they dropt in heaps: So that after a great Loss receiv'd, the Duke commanded a Retreat to be sounded, and soon after demolish'd his Works, filled his Ditches, and levelled his Trenches, in order to his departure. Schomberg and Marillac pursued, hollowing to them in a Bravado, and brandishing their Swords. The English thinking the Enemy would then have charged them, drew up in Battalia; but they knowing what advantage the way would shortly give them, made a halt, whereupon the Duke march'd on in Military Order, until he came to the Village Curda, where they made another stand, and by an Ambuscade of Musqueteers placed behind the old Walls, Walks, Hedges, and Ditches, compelled the French to retreat; but the whole Army coming up, followed them slowly for three Miles, till they came to a Causeway, which was so narrow, that they could only march six abreast, with Ditches on either side, mostly ending in Salt-pits: And now Schomberg espying his expected Opportunity, pour'd forth a great volley of Shot against them, and then the English began to march as fast as possible; for the Lord Montjoy's Troops unable to endure the charge of the French Horse, turn'd tail, and riding in amongst the other Ranks, put them into such a Disorder, as enabled the French easily to break in upon them and rout them, with no small slaughter, overthrowing some into Ditches and Salt-pits, and piercing others as they lay in the Dirt. Nor was flight any whit more auspicious to them, for those who confusedly ran away, and casting away their Arms, leaped into the Water, were also cut off. Cunningham's Horse fought it out nobly unto the last Man. The Lord Montjoy was taken Prisoner, and civilly used. Some Reformadoes, by uneven and turning Paths, made their way to the further Bridge, with much danger, where joining with Conway, Crosby, Fryar, and Hackswil, and their Forces, they made good that Pass by the Repulse of the Enemy, and leaving a Guard of Musqueteers there all Day, set the Bridge on fire, and lodg'd that Night straglingly up and down. The next Day the Duke demanded, and obtain'd the dead Bodies, and went on board. Great was this Day's loss, viz. about fifty Officers, among whom were Sir William Cunningham, Sir Charles Rich, and Sir Alexander Brett, and near two thousand common Soldiers were slain, thirty Prisoners of note, and forty four Colours were taken: Of the French not above three hundred were lost. The Duke hoisted Sail, and met the Earl of Holland, with his unseasonable Recruits, near the Western Coast of England; and at his return, finding a favourable Reception at the King's Hands, he laid the loss of the Design upon the Earl's not timely seconding the Expedition. But at Sea things went somewhat better; where Captain Trettor, in his return from Hambrough, seized by Command a great French Ship at the Texel in Holland, named the St. Esprit, with twenty Brass Culverins, two Brass Semi-culverins, two other Brass Guns, sixteen large Iron Guns, and two lesser, and in the Hold for Ballast twelve great Guns, and Arms for eleven hundred Soldiers, and eighteen Barrels of Powder. And Sir John Pennington, Vice-Admiral, took thirty four of their rich Merchant-men homewards bound; all which were safely brought into England, to sweeten, tho' not countervail, the Loss receiv'd at Rochel. The ill Success of this Enterprize did much incense the People against the Duke of Buckingham, but the King did not discover any Discontent towards him; only he told him, That Sir Sackville Crow had written to him of a far greater Loss than he acknowledg'd. During this Expedition, Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, by Letters Patents of the 9th of October, was suspended from all his Metropolitan Jurisdiction, and confin'd to his House at Ford in Kent, and the Exercise thereof was committed to the Bishops of London, Durham, Rochester, Oxford, and Bath and Wells, or to any four, three, or two of them. The occasion of this Commission was not discover'd otherwise than by what was express'd in the Commission it self, (viz.) That the said Archbishop could not at that present, in his own Person attend those Services, which were otherwise proper for his Cognisance and Jurisdiction, and which as Archbishop of Canterbury, he might and ought in his own Person have perform'd and executed.

He returns unsuccessful.

The Archbishop of Canterbury is suspended and confin'd to his House.

But

But the true reason was, the King was persuaded that the Non-conformists to the Discipline of the Church too much encreas'd thro' the remifness of his Government.

This Michaelmas Term there was a great Debate in the Kings-bench concerning some of those imprison'd for refusing the Loan, who mov'd for an Habeas Corpus, and had it. The Attorney-General, Sir Robert Heath, upon their appearance alledg'd, they were not bailable, but their Counsel the contrary, and the Court agreed with the Attorney, so that they were continued in Prison till an Order pass'd in Council for a general Release, which was shortly after.

A Barricade to be made cross the Chanel leading to Rochester.

Monf. Soubise and others come from Rochel to England for Relief.

The French King, encourag'd by the Success he had against our Forces, resolv'd upon a more formidable Siege against Rochel; and having made a Line about it on the Land-side, with three Forts, by the Advice of Cardinal Richelieu, and the Loan of many Merchant-ships belonging to the Subjects of the United Netherlands, he attempted a Barricade 1400 yards in length cross the Chanel, to hinder all Relief by Sea, whereby the Rochellers expected nothing but ruin, unless they could prevent it; so that they with great haste sent Monf. Soubise and their Deputies to England, to sollicite the King for Supplies before the Work should be compleated, who was so affected with their Miseries, that he promis'd them all the Assistance he could; and to enable him thereunto, he borrow'd 120000 Pounds of the City of London, for which and other Debts they had Lands, to the value of 21000 Pounds a Year assured to them. He also borrowed of the East-India Company 30000 Pounds, and what Money else he could get by Privy-Seals. Moreover, it was resolv'd to levy Money by Excise, and a Commission under the Great Seal was pass'd on the 3d of February to authorize it, but the execution thereof was suspended by the King, who never was guilty of any irregular Action by the impulse of his own Nature, nor persuaded by others, but by extream Necessity, and at this time in compliance with his own good Inclinations, he chose rather to call a Parliament, which was summoned to meet on the 17th of March, than proceed in extraordinary ways, for he was much troubled at the general Discontent of the People, and he hoped by their Counsels to beget a good Understanding betwixt himself and them.

On the 17th of March the Parliament assembled at Westminster, and the King having sent for the Commons to the Lords House, moved for a Supply with a strong and patherick Brevity, but insinuating, that if they did not comply with his Request, he would take some other Course.

But the Parliament pass'd over that Insinuation, and the Commons freely voted to grant him Five Subsidies, whereof when Secretary Cook inform'd the King, he ask'd him by how many Voices 'twas carried, who reply'd, by One; at which perceiving the King's Countenance to change, Sir, said he, Your Majesty hath the greater Cause to rejoice, for the House was so unanimous therein, as they made but One Voice. At which the King was exceedingly pleas'd, and bid the Secretary tell them he would deny them nothing of their Liberties which any of his Predecessors had granted. But whilst a Bill was in preparation for these Subsidies, they consider'd of the publick Grievances of the Kingdom.

The King's extraordinary Wants put him, as you have heard, upon some unusual courses for levying of Money, not very warrantable by our ancient Laws; and some that were unwilling to countenance such courses, or otherwise disaffected to the Government, upon refusal were imprison'd; and because no legal Cause could be assign'd for such restraint, the Warrants whereby they were imprison'd had no Cause specified in them; which was exclaim'd against as not legal, and a great Grievance.

Upon the return of the Fleet after the late Actions at Sea, the Soldiers, for want of Pay, were billeted in private Houses, which was alledg'd to be against the Law: And, to aggravate this, the rudeness of their Persons and their Country (being Scotch and Irish) did much contribute. Nevertheless, tho' their Actions were bad, and their Persons worse, the Commons liked not that they should be punish'd by Law martial: For there being a Commission issued to try Offences of the Soldiers by martial Law, they exclaim'd at it, and it was urg'd as a Grievance; yet, till that time, the King's Prerogative in making and establishing martial Laws was never question'd, tho' since the Petition of Right there is no doubt of it. Magna Charta, and six other Statutes explanatory of it, were expressly against illegal Levies of Money and Imprisonments; and tho' those Statutes were in force, (whether the Parliament thought them antiquated, and therefore less regarded, or for what other reason, it is not said) to provide against the Grievances complain'd of, they drew up that memorable Law call'd The Petition of Right, and presented it to the King, to which he gave the Royal Assent in full Parliament, to the very great liking of the People: And 'twas now thought there was so sweet a Harmony betwixt the King and Parliament, that nothing could hinder the Nation of as much Happiness as it could be capable of; but this concession inflamed the Zeal of many of the House of Commons to press a little further, and they immediately framed a Remonstrance of several late Miscarriages in Government, in the conclusion whereof they said, The excessive Power of the Duke of Buckingham, and the Abuse of that Power, is principal Cause of all the Evils and Dangers therein mention'd; and therefore they humbly submit it to his Majesty's Wisdom, whether it can be safe for himself, or for his Kingdom, that so great Power, both by Sea and Land, as rests in him, should be trusted in the hands of any one Subject whatsoever.

On the 17th of June this Remonstrance was presented to the King, with the Bill of Subsidies, in the Banqueting-house at Whitehall, who when he had heard it read told them, he little expected such a Remonstrance, after he had so graciously pass'd the Petition of Right; and for the Grievances specified therein, he would consider of them as they should deserve.

The King had levied the Duties of Tonnage and Poundage ever since the first of his Reign, which the House of Commons alledg'd he ought not to have done, or at least that they could not now be taken, since the passing of the late Petition of Right, and and they prepar'd a Remonstrance against it; but the King, unwilling to hear of any more Remonstrances of such a strain, resolv'd to frustrate it by proroguing the Parliament from the 26th of June to the 20th of October.

The Duke of Buckingham slain at Portsmouth.

During this Session the Duke was not discourag'd by the former Remonstrance, so as to hinder his Activity in preparing anew for the relief of Rochel both by Sea and Land; but being ready to set sail, he was suddenly cut off, being slain at Portsmouth, in the 36th Year of his age, by the hand of one John Felton, a discontented Officer of the last Year's Army.

The first news of this Fact came to the King (then about 4 miles distant) at his publick Devotion, whose Intentions were so steady upon that sacred Duty, that he receiv'd it without the least emotion of Spirit or discomposure of Countenance. He sent Dr. Hutchinson (one of his Chaplains in ordinary, and then in the course of his attendance) to try if he could learn out of him by what Inducement he committed that horrible Murder, who told him, His only Motive was, that the Duke had been declar'd an Enemy to the Commonwealth in the late Remonstrance tendred to the King by the Parliament; and afterwards said the same again and again, both at the time of his examination before the Lords of the Council, and at his execution. Nevertheless, when he was made sensible of the foulness of the Act, he manifested great Sorrow and Contrition for it. But that which excited this miserable Man to so great a Mischief, had likewise influenc'd the People in general, who rejoic'd at his Death, as one of the greatest Enemies of their Country.

His Character

But those that knew him, and observ'd his Actions, deliver him to Posterity as one of the most generous and accomplish'd Persons of that time. His outward Form was a great Master-piece of Nature, exact in every Part: Nor was his Mind without its Ornaments, being of a very affable and courteous Disposition, and tho' advanc'd to as great Dignity as a Subject could be capable of, he did not leave those Qualities. He was said to be addicted more than was fit to the love of Women, but it is not said that his Passion that way reach'd to the Ruin or publick Defamation of any particular Person or Family. He had less studied Books than Men, and if he had lived a few more Years, to have seen thro' the Temptations of Greatness, he might have proved as great a Pillar of this State as any that went before him. He was very bountiful to his Kindred and Servants, most of which he advanc'd to Honour and Wealth; and to all to whom he profess'd Friendship: He was constant in it, insomuch that there rarely passed a day in Court (whilst he was there) wherein he did not some good Office to one or other; and every Morning, before he went to the King, he collected in Paper what publick Matters he had to acquaint him with, and the Suits he had to make in behalf of those that solicited him. But as he was kind to his Friends and Dependants, so he was formidable to his Enemies, especially to such as deceiv'd him under a guise of Friendship. His Courage was very great, and did too much transport him; for if he had a little yielded to the Times, and withdrawn from those Storms he could neither prevent nor allay, he might perhaps have found a milder Fate.

His Bowels were interr'd in Portsmouth, and his Body was brought to York-house, from whence after some time 'twas entomb'd at Westminster in St. Edward's Chapel, and a stately Monument was erected over it by his Executors: But Felton being arraign'd and found guilty at the Kings-bench Bar at Westminster, was hang'd at Tyburn, and afterwards his Body was sent to Portsmouth, where, without the Town, it was hang'd in Chains till it was consumed.

The sad Accident of the Duke's Death made little or no stop in the Proceedings of the Fleet, which at the last set forward under the Earl of Lindsey; but, before he could get to Rochel, the Haven was so barr'd that 'twas impossible for his Ships to force their way (tho' it was often gallantly attempted) so that the Rochellers seeing this Hope to fail, sent out some of the principal of the Town to make their Submission to the King, and set open the Gates to receive him.

The time now drawing near for the meeting of the Parliament, the King, for many weighty Reasons, put off their assembling to the 20th of January, and in the mean time Archbishop Abbot was admitted to kiss his Hand, and commanded not to fail of his attendance at the Council-Table; which was done at this conjuncture to moderate the Heats of certain Ecclesiasticks, who made great disturbance in the Church by some Scholastical Controversies on the Points of Predestination, Grace, and Perseverance. Both Parties were abetted by several Bishops, and each of them would pretend the Opinions they held to be the Doctrine of the Church, when in truth they were but the Opinions of private Men; (for nothing can be called the Doctrine of the Church, that is not so declar'd by the whole Clergy lawfully assembled in Convocation :) These were distinguish'd by the Names of Calvinists and Arminians; the first countenanc'd by the Commons in Parliament, and some few of the Bishops; the latter justified by most of the Bishops, and not discountenanc'd by the King. The first of these were likewise somewhat remiss in exacting a rigid Conformity to the Ceremonies; the latter perhaps more earnest than was needful therein at this time, but withal they were great Asserters of the Prerogative-Royal. The King was very intent for the Peace of the whole, and caus'd the 39 Articles of the Church to be publish'd, with a Declaration to restrain all Disputes in the Points controverted. And now also a Book, writ by one Mountague in King James's time, of these Controversies, call'd Appello Casarem, was called in, and Dr. Potter, a Calvinist, is made Bishop of Carlisle: But these Acts did not mollifie the Minds of those for whom they were intended; for a while after (viz. the 20th of January) the Parliament assembled, and the grand Committees, which are usually the first things settled at the opening of that Assembly, were very busie and active: That of Religion made great Complaints of the Invasions upon Religion, which they pretended was much endanger'd by the encrease of Popery and Arminianism, and many Instances were made to heighten the Apprehensions of the People there-

in;

1628. In; whilst the House was not less active in their Inquisitions into the Miscarriages in Civil Affairs, concerning which divers Petitions were presented, importing, that many Merchants had their Goods seiz'd, and Informations prefer'd against them in the Star-chamber for refusing to pay the Custom of Tonnage and Poundage against the tenour of the Petition of Right: And one of these Merchants, named Rolls, being a Member of the House of Commons, what was done towards him was judg'd a Breach of Privilege, for which the Customers were summon'd to the House, to answer their Misdemeanour therein. The King interpos'd in this matter, and informed the House, That what they did was done as by Men addicted to his Command; adding, He did not commissionate them to take it as of Right belonging to him, but out of a firm Presumption that the House of Commons, suitable to their large Professions, would grant it him by Bill, which he desir'd they would dispatch, to put an end to the Dispute. This gave no satisfaction, but Debates in the House ran very high, and they resolv'd to proceed to a Remonstrance against levying the Subsidies of Tonnage and Poundage, not being granted by Act of Parliament: In which Point they were so earnest on the second of March, that fearing they should be dissolv'd before they had vented their Passion in it, they lock'd the Doors of the House, and gave the Key to Sir Miles Hubbard, one of their Members, to keep; and refus'd to admit the Usher of the Black-Rod, whom the King had sent with a Message to them: Whereat he was so offended, that he sent for the Captain of the Pensioners, and the Guards, to force an entrance: In the mean time the Heads of a Remonstrance were offer'd to Sir John Finch the Speaker to be put to the Question; which he refusing, because the King had given Order to adjourn to the Tenth of March, and to put no Question, nor admit of any Debate, Mr. Denzil Hollis, and Sir Peter Heyman, held him in the Chair till by one of them the Protestation was read; and then they arose before the Pensioners and Guards came, and the House was adjourn'd to the 10th of March.

The Commons lock the Door of their House, and refuse to admit the Usher of the Black-Rod.

The Protestation of the Commons.

1. Whosoever shall bring in an Innovation of Religion, or by Favour seek to introduce Popery, or Arminianism, or other Opinions disagreeing from the True and Orthodox Church, shall be reputed a Capital Enemy to the Kingdom and Commonwealth.
2. Whosoever shall counsel or advise the taking or levying of the Subsidies of Tonnage and Poundage, not being granted by Parliament, or shall be likewise an Actor or Instrument therein, shall be likewise reputed a Capital Enemy to this Commonwealth.
3. If any Man shall voluntarily yield or pay the said Subsidies of Tonnage or Poundage, not being granted by Parliament, he shall be reputed a Betrayer of the Liberties of England, and an Enemy to this Commonwealth.

Two Days after, a Proclamation was issued to declare the Parliament dissolv'd, tho' the Dissolution was not formally executed till the 10th of March, at which time the King came to the Lords House, and being sat on his Throne, with his Crown on his Head, and in his Robes, and the Lords in their Robes also, he spoke very severely to that House of the Misbehaviour of the Commons, to which, he said, the Dissolution of the Parliament was entirely owing; adding, That as he attributed those Disorders to the Malice of some Vipers among them, they should have their due Reward of Punishment.

The King was highly provoked, as appear'd by this Speech, at the Disorder and tumultuous Carriage of many of the Members of the Commons House of Parliament, who strained all things beyond their natural length; a little moderation and obsequiousness might have obtain'd of him whatsoever was desir'd; and if he had not had better Intentions towards his Subjects, than some of those discontented Spirits would have made the World believe he had, the dissolution of this might have been the end of all Parliaments, and we might have been depriv'd of that Spring from whence the Blessings of Peace and Happiness have formerly been deriv'd on this Church and State. And this there wanted not some to infuse into him, by the Example of the King of France then reigning: For whereas in an Assembly of the Three Estates (which is in the nature of our Parliament) some Years before this time, the Commons being their third Estate, entrench'd too busily upon the Liberties of the Clergy, and some Privileges which the Nobility enjoy'd, by the favour of the former Kings, it gave the King so great Offence, that he dissolv'd them and their Constitution together, and ordain'd another kind of Assembly instead thereof, which he call'd l'Assemblée des Notables; that is to say, The Assembly of Principal Persons, which are compos'd of select Persons out of all Orders of Estates of the King's nomination, to which is added a Counsellor out of every Court of Parliament in France, and the Acts of this Assembly are no less obliging to the People than the others were. The King would receive no Impressions of this nature, but yet he was very earnest to vindicate his Authority and Commandment, which in his Proclamation before mention'd he alledg'd to have been so contemned, as his Kingly Office could not bear, nor any former Age parallel. He had on the 4th of March, six days before his coming to the Lords (by the Advice of the Privy-Council, and their Warrant) sent for several Members of the Commons House, to appear next day at the Council Table, viz. Denzil Hollis Esq; Sir John Elliot, Sir Peter Hayman, Sir Miles Hubbard, John Selden, William Coryton, Benjamin Valentine, William Stroud, and Walter Long, Esquires, who were the principal Authors of the late Disorders, at which time Hollis, Elliot, Coryton, and Valentine appearing, and refusing to answer out of Parliament what was said and done in Parliament, they were committed to the Tower: The rest not then appearing, were afterward apprehended, and committed to several other Prisons.

But lest those distemper'd Spirits that had by Imprudence caused so much Disquiet at Westminster, should to excuse themselves disperse abroad in their Countries some of their Malignities, to asperse the Government, and alienate the Hearts of his good Subjects from the King, he he published a Declaration, setting forth his Reason and Motives for dissolving the Parliament, with Breviates of all Transactions, in this and the former Session. The Purport of it was to shew, that the Duties of Tonnage and Poundage, concerning which the Dispute was, had been enjoy'd and receiv'd by many other Kings, at their entrance into Government, before they were granted by Parliament. But that notwithstanding this, the House of Commons had refused to grant him those Duties, unless he would disclaim his Right to them; which he could not do; tho' he declar'd that he did only enjoy the same de bene esse, and did not challenge them as a matter of due. He observ'd, that formerly the Duke of Buckingham used to be the Mark; but that since he was dead, the same Disorders continuing, it appear'd that the Aim was against the King's Ministers as such, in order to abate the Power of the Crown, and to bring all things into confusion. He then concluded with appealing to all, Whether the publick Peace and Happiness of this Kingdom was equalled, or to be paralleled by that of any other of the neighbouring Nations; and therefore how unjust those Rumours and Fears must be that had been so maliciously spread abroad.

On the 7th of May the Attorney General prefer'd an Information in the Star-Chamber against the Imprison'd Members. They demur'd to the Process issu'd out against them, and moved for Writs of Habeas Corpus. Nevertheless, they were kept in Prison till Michaelmas Term, when an Information was exhibited against them in the King's Bench, for Words spoken by them in the foregoing Parliament, and for assaulting the Speaker. They demur'd to the Jurisdiction of the Court, alledging, that they were not to be question'd out of Parliament. But this Plea was over-ruled, and they were by the Court ruled to plead farther. But they still insisted upon their Privileges, and refused to put in any other Plea; upon which Judgment was granted against them, and they were sentenced to be imprison'd during the King's pleasure, and none to be releas'd till he found securities for his good Behaviour, and made Submission and Acknowledgement of his Offence, and paid the Fine impos'd. Sir John Elliot died afterwards in Custody, refusing to pay those Fines, or to be bound in such Obligations; and some who were equally inflexible continu'd in Prison till the sitting of the next Parliament: But the Hardships of Imprisonment induced the others to enlarge themselves by Compliance.

In the Spring of this Year the Queen being affrighted, aborted of a Son, which added something to the King's Trouble at home; tho' abroad Matters succeeded well: For the King of France being in a transalpine Expedition at Susa, for the Relief of Casal, was so intent on that War, that he was very inclinable to Peace with us; and, by the Intervention of the States of Venice, a Peace was concluded. And for a Confirmation of this Peace, in September following, the Marquis of Chasteau Neuf was sent in Embassy from France, and Sir Thomas Edmonds was sent thither from hence.

About the Month of July there happen'd a great Fray in Fleetstreet, upon the rescue of one Captain Bellingham (an Officer in the late Expedition to the Isle of Rhee) which was attempted by some Students in the Temple, wherein some were hurt and carried to Prison. But this drew together many of the Gentlemen to rescue the Prisoner, who made a Barricade against St. Dunstan's Church, and beat back the Sheriffs Officers, and released their Friends; of which the Lord Mayor being inform'd, he and the Sheriffs with a Band of train'd Soldiers came down to keep the Peace, and disperse them; who were now encreas'd to the number of 500, and arm'd with Swords and Pistols: The Lord Mayor made Proclamation, That on pain of Rebellion they should dissolve themselves; but prevail'd not, he then try'd other means, and the Soldiers fired their Muskets on them, charg'd with Powder only; but the Gentlemen provok'd at this, shot Bullets, and very fiercely attack'd the Train'd-bands, kill'd five outright, and wounded near a hundred; yet the City Soldiers were so re-inforced, that in the end, the Gentlemen were subdu'd, and one Asburs and Stamford two Captains, with some others, were taken and committed. The King was much offended at the Uproar, and immediately sent for the Lord Chief Justice, by whose Advice a special Commission of Oyer and Terminer was issued out, and about a Fortnight after, the Malefactors were arraign'd in Guild-Hall, London, and Asburs and Stamford being found guilty of Murder, were condemn'd and executed at Tyburn. Stamford was a Relation and Servant to the late Duke of Buckingham, and much Intercession was made for him; but the King would not pardon him, but said, he had murder'd a Watchman before, and was pardon'd, and he hath now kill'd another, and he would take order he should not kill a third.

In the Month of January Don Carlos de Coloma, sent Ambassador from Spain, arriv'd at London, and had Audience six Days after: His Business was to treat of a Peace betwixt the two Crowns, which was a while after concluded; all things being left on both sides in the same Condition in which they were before the War, and the Spaniards did engage that he would make use of all his Interest with the Emperor for restoring the Prince Elector Palatine to his lost Estate.

This Peace, and that with France, brought a great encrease of Trade to us, the Spaniards sent hither yearly on English Bottoms, no less than 600000 Crowns in Bullion, for the use of the Army in the Netherlands, redounding very much to the King's benefit in the Coinage, and no less to the profit of the Merchants also, most of the Money being return'd into Flanders in Leather, Cloth, Lead, Tin, and other the Commodities of this Kingdom. The Dutch and Easterlings, being great Traders, look'd upon London as the safest Bank, not only to lodge, but encrease their Treasure; so that in a short time, the greatest part of the Trade of Christendom was driven upon the Thames.

This Summer the King had a Son born on the 29th of May, who on the 27th of June following, was with great Solemnity baptized, and named CHARLES; the Godfathers were the the King of France, and the Prince Elector, represented by the Duke of Lenox, and the Marquis of Hamilton; the Godmother was the Queen of France, whose Substitute was the Dutches of Richmond. After this joyful Ceremony was perform'd, the King was intent on the Business of the Prince Elector, and having intelligence of a Dyet to be kept this Summer at Ratisbon, he sent Sir Robert Anstruther his Ambassador to the Emperor, taking that opportunity, when the Estates of the Empire were assembled, to treat of his Brother's Restitution to the Palatinate.

The Emperor and Estates did not answer the King's Expectation; for besides the Complements which the Ambassador receiv'd, all the Answer to this business was, That the present Affairs of Germany, which call'd them thither, were of that important Concernment, as would not admit of any foreign Debate: But when leisure serv'd, His Master should have such Satisfaction, as they hoped would give content. The Emperor was the colder in this Matter, because he had some intimation of the King's Correspondence with the King of Sweden, who was at this time ready to enter into Germany with an Army. And he was not much deceiv'd in his intelligence, for ever since the King of Denmark was by Count Tilly driven out of Germany, the Eyes of all this part of the World were upon Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, as the fittest Person to check the Greatness of the House of Austria: Him therefore, two Years ago, the King elected into the Noble Order of the Garter, wherewith he was solemnly invested in the midst of his Army, at the Siege of Darfaw, a Town of Pomerella, belonging to the Crown of Poland, and then the grounds were laid, which, (being seconded by the French, the States of the United Provinces, and the distressed Princes of the Empire) brought that King into Germany; for which Expedition, on the 13th of June, he imbarqued himself and all his Army in seventeen Men of War, and two hundred lesser Barques. He had made great preparations the Year before for this Design, and had entertain'd many Scottish and English Commanders and Soldiers, lately in the Service of the King of Denmark, (after the Peace at Angole in Holstein, made the Year before with that Crown) and had dispatch'd some of them to raise Recruits, to compleat their Reigments in Scotland and England; and likewise he entertain'd Germans, who had return'd from the Cæsarean Army, and from that Army which was sent to assist the King of Poland, under the Conduct of Harven, and from those who had been oblig'd by Wallestein, the Emperor's General; he receiv'd good intelligence of the State of the Empire, and gave them Commissions to raise Forces with all speed: So that with some of these, and the remainder of the Army which was brought from the Wars of Livonia, he had got together above 12000 Horse and Foot of old Soldiers: But Time was very favourable to the Enterprize, for the Princes of Germany had been much oppress'd by the late Military Government, which Wallestein had introduced amongst them; who had under his Command 100000 Foot, 30000 Horse of divers Nations, dispers'd over all Germany, whereby the Princes of Germany were not treated as free Princes, but Subjects. Whereupon, for that the excessive Authority of private Men, and over-greatness of neighbouring Potentates is never lik'd by great Ones, the Electors, which pretend to keep the Imperial Condition within its limits, could not suffer either the burthen they lay under upon this former occasion, nor that so many Soldiers should be maintain'd in Germany in the time of Peace, to the Peoples so great Grievances; nor that the Throne of Caesar should be raised so high. They therefore privately sought all opportune means how they might unarm him, and take from his Empire such a Support: To which the Spanish Ministers at Vienna willingly concur'd to moderate the Greatness of Wallestein, and prevail'd with the Emperor to the disbanding of the supernumerary Forces, to please the Electors, and to oblige them thereby to adhere to favour the King of Hungary at the Election of King of the Romans. Wallestein was hereupon immediately laid aside, which made him exclaim, that the Emperor was betray'd; and certainly there was some grounds for it. But if he had been more complacent in his Behaviour, his Authority had not been so easily taken away, nor so many of the Forces disbanded, which whilst they were kept together, made the Emperor so powerful, that the King of Sweden could never have made that Impression he did into his Dominions. Wallestein thus remov'd, retir'd into Bohemia, and liv'd there till he was called again to Employment.

Thus Germany became weakned, being not only divided by the dissonancy of Religion, but exasperated by the late pressures upon them, whereby the King of Sweden had a very easie entrance into Pomerania; for in a very little time he had taken the Islands of Rugen and Usedom, and all the Forts therein, and Wolghast, and the strong Town of Stetin in Pomerania, and restored Bogislaus Duke of Pomerania to his Authority.

The News of the Success of the King of Sweden made our King very willing to send Aid to him; and the Marquis of Hamilton had Commissions to levy 6000 Men for the Service against the next Spring, which were most of them to be of the Scottish Nation: For the Encouragement of the Marquis in the Expedition, the King gave him the Impost of Wines in Scotland, which amounted to 20000 Pounds Sterling a year; but for the raising of those Men, and an intended Supply of Moneys to the King of Sweden, greater Sums were requir'd: And therefore the King, by the Advice of his Attorney-General, and other his Council learned in the Law, was forced to use ways, which he was told were allowable, to furnish himself.

By the Common Law, every Man of full Age that could dispel a Knight's Pay, was compellable, by the King's Writ, to take the Order of Knighthood, or else to make Fine for the discharge or respite of the same: But because of the uncertainty of the quantity of Lands that made a Knight's Fee, King Edward the Second, in the first Year of his Reign, granted a Writ in the time of Parliament, and caused it to be there enter'd on Record (which is therefore stiled by some a Statute) wherein no Man was thereafter to be dittrain'd for Knighthood, that had not 20 Pounds a year in Fee-Simple or Fee-Tail, or for term of Life, which Sir Edward Coke explains to be Tenant by courtesie: And almost in every King's Reign, till the Time of Edward the Fourth, Men were summon'd by Proclamation to take the Order of Knighthood, but the value of Land was seldom limited so low as 20 Pounds a year; for in the 18th of King Henry the Sixth, which perhaps is the last time before this, wherein Proclamations of this kind were issued, the same was express'd to be 40 Pounds a year. The King having this way to supply his Necessities, did cause several Writs to be issued out of the Chancery for Proclamations to be made in every County, to summon all Persons of full Age, and not Knights, being seised of Lands or Rents of the yearly value of 40 Pounds, or more, to appear in the King's presence at a certain Day therein limited, to take upon them the Order of Knighthood, upon return of which Writs, and transmitting the same with their returns in the Exchequer, and upon other Writs, for enquiring of the Names of such as did not appear, Process by Distingas was made against them, and they were fined for the same, which brought 100000 Pounds, or more, into the Exchequer.

But this Money would not answer the King's Occasions; wherefore Mr. Walter Montague was sent over to negotiate the Payment of the Moiety of the Queen's Portion (being 400000 Crowns) behind, and to require Satisfaction for some rich Ships taken from us by the French, since the last Peace concluded; and with him Philip Burlamach, a Merchant, was sent to receive the Money, and make it over by Exchange, or otherwise. The French King receiv'd the Message with kindness enough, but complain'd, that one Captain Kirk had, two Years before, taken the Fort of Quebec in Canada, which was in possession of the French, and put an English Garrison into it. This, after a little consideration, was found so equitable, that the King gave order to have the Fort deliver'd, and thereupon his full and just Demands were satisfied. During the sitting of Leighton, a Scotch-man, writ a Book called Zion's Plea, which he presented unto them: It was of a very fiery nature, exciting the Parliament and People to kill all the Bishops, and to smite them under the fifth Rib; bitterly inveighing against the Queen, calling her a Daughter of Heth, a Canaanite, an Idolatress; for which he was this Year sentenc'd in the Star-Chamber, to be whipt and stigmatiz'd, to have his Ears cropt, and Nose slit: But betwixt the pronouncing and inflicting of this Censure, he made his escape into Bedfordshire; but by the diligence of the Warden of the Fleet, he was quickly recover'd, and the punishment to which he was sentenc'd inflicted upon him. The Romish Recusants were about this time very active in England, and their Religion began to encrease by the industry of their Priests, who needed not now to fetch their Ordination from abroad, by reason that the Pope had sent hither Dr. Smith, the Titular Bishop of Calcedon, to ordain Priests, who took upon him to approve of such Regular Priests as were to be standing Confessors, which the General of the Jesuits thought an usurpation upon his Jurisdiction; and that Order, by their Insinuation, being most powerful in England, prevail'd with many of the most eminent of their Religion to remonstrate against his Authority, asserting all sufficient Power in the Regulars to whatever was pretended by the Bishop, and the no-necessity of having a Bishop in England: The Spanish Ambassador favour'd the Jesuits in this Contest, to which the King's Proclamation for the Bishop's Banishment concurring, he was frighted into France. Nor were these sort of Men insolent in England only, but in Ireland also; for at Dublin, whilst the Lords Justices were hearing Divine Service in Christ Church, they had as publick resort to Mass, as is sometimes in London, to the Houses of Ambassadors of that Religion; which the Lords Justices taking notice of, they sent the Archbishop, the Mayor, Sheriff, and Recorder of the City to apprehend them; which they did, taking away their Crucifixes, Chalices, and Copes, and delivering the Fryers and Papists into the Hands of the Pursuivants, whom the People threw Stones at, and had rescu'd them, but that a Guard was sent to defend them: Nevertheless, the Justices were so careful to prevent the like Disorders, that most of their Houses of Religion were immediately seiz'd into the King's hands, and such Inquisition after the rest, that two Priests hanged themselves at the apprehension of this (as they then call'd it) Persecution.

The Marquis of Hamilton was at this time under some Umbrage at Court, tho' his power with the King soon broke thro' it; the Occasion whereof was this: He had sent a Creature of his own, David Ramsay, into Germany, on pretence to notifie his coming thither to the King of Sweden, and to inform himself of the condition of the Scots then in that Service; but, by what appear'd after, 'twas suspected he had another Intention than the K. of Sweden's assistance. There were at this time 28 Colonels of the Scotch Nation in the Swedish Service, amongst which were 4 of the Name of Hamilton, with whom Ramsay had made a near acquaintance, for he lived at a great expence: He had also endear'd himself to Colonel Alexander Ramsay, Governor of Creutznach, a Person of good Esteem and Interest, both with the Swedes and those of his own Nation: Among these Officers there was the Lord of Rhées, Mackay, who commanded a Brigade of Scots, a Person of great Honour and Reputation, who having discover'd by some Expression of Ramsay, that the Marquis had a deeper Design than the present Expedition to Germany, he insinuated into him, to find out the bottom of it, and was told by him, in much secrecy, that the Marquis would convert these Forces, which he was by the King's Authority to raise in Scotland for foreign Service, against England; that their Friends had provided Arms and Ammunition, and more were expected from Sweden and other parts, and he and Colonel Alexander Hamilton solicited him to be of their Party. To this the Lord of Rhées made a cold Answer, but thought himself bound in Duty to come into England, and make it known to the King, which he did the rather because Ramsay was then return'd also; but he, upon this Accusation, denied the whole matter, and the Lord having no Proof thereof (as in such secret Practices it could hardly be) more than a confident Asperſion, and the engagement of his Honour, the King thought good to refer the Controverſie to the Tryal of the Conſtable and Maſhal, with the aſſiſtance of other Lords in Commiſſion with them, according to the ancient Law of the Land, the Earl of Lindſey being made Conſtable to that end and purpoſe. Many Days were ſpent accordingly in purſuance of it, but when moſt Men expected the Matter would be try'd by Combat, as had been accuſtom'd in ſuch Caſes, the Buſineſs was huſh'd up at Court, the Lord Rhee is diſmiſs'd to his Employment in the War, and the Marquiſ did not only continue in the King's great favour, but Ramsay was permitted to hold the Place of Gentleman of the Privy-chamber, which had formerly been procur'd for him.

On the 25th of April this Year, Mervin Touchet, Lord Audley, was indicted and arraign'd of Rape and Sodomy before his Peers in Weſtminſter-hall; Thomas Lord Coventry, Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal, was for that Day conſtituted Lord High-Steward of England; and the Peers with him were, the Earl of Portland Lord-Treaſurer, the Earl of Mancheſter Lord Privy-Seal, the Earl of Arundel Lord Maſhal, and the Earls of Pembroke, Kent, Worceſter, Bedford, Effex, Dorſet, Salisbury, Leiceſter, Warwick, Carlisle, Holland, Berkſhire, and Denbigh; the Viſcounts Wimbleton, Conway, Dorcheſter, Wentworth; the Barons Piercy, Strange, Clifford, Petre, North, Goring; where divers unnatural and beſtial Actions being prov'd againſt him, he had Sentence to be hang'd; but by the Clemency of the King to him, that Sentence was chang'd to a beheading, which was executed on him at Tower-hill, on the 14th of

And in the ſame Month Sir Giles Allington of Cambridgeſhire married his own Neice, the Daughter of one Mr. Dalton, for which he was queſtion'd in the High-Commiſſion Court, but he declin'd the Jurisdiction, and mov'd the Court of Common-Pleas therein, from whence he obtain'd two Rules, one requiring the Commiſſioners to ſhew Cauſe why a Prohibition ſhould not be granted; the other, that if they proceeded further before Cauſe ſhewn, a Prohibition ſhould be awarded. This gave great Offence to the Biſhop of London, who complain'd to the King thereof; and he, by the Lord-Keeper, ſignified his Diſpleaſure to the Judges for their proceeding herein; whereat they deſiſted, and the Court, conſiſting of eight Biſhops, and four other Commiſſioners, gave the Sentence following againſt him; to be fined to the King 12000 pounds, to ſtand oblig'd in the Penalty of 20000 pounds never to cohabit or come near his Neice any more, and to be committed to Priſon, or put in ſufficient Bail, till both he and his Neice ſhall have done Penance at Paul's Croſs, and at Great St. Mary's in Cambridge, at a Day appointed by the Court.

The Marq. of Hamilton's arrival with his Forces in the Oder.

About the miſt of July the Marquiſ of Hamilton arriv'd in the Oder with 6000 Foot well array'd, and furniſh'd of Artillery, for the ſervice of the King of Sweden, and with 300000

Dollars in Money: He himſelf came to the King at his Leaguer at Werben on the Elbe, who receiv'd him very reſpectfully, and ſhew'd him all the Fortifications, and the Preparations he had made againſt Count Tilly, who was march'd as far as Wolmeſtadt towards him; ſo that he had no leiſure to entertain him as he would: But after he had form'd his Inſtructions, he was diſmiſs'd, and his Forces were appointed to join General Banier. The King told him, He was ſorry his Army arriv'd in ſuch parts of the Country as were ruin'd, for both Armies had lain there above a Year before, but in a while, he ſaid, they ſhould have better Quarters; but the Men were almoſt all loſt whilſt they were there, finding not only Famine to conſume 'em, but the Plague alſo, which did ſo rage that 200 a Week died, and ſo much weaken'd; but thoſe who ſurviv'd did good ſervice, and their coming at this time was great furtherance of the King of Sweden's Cauſe, for thereby a good part of the Enemy's Forces were for fear of them diverted towards Sileſia, and this Diverſion aided much to the conjunction of the King's Army with that of the Duke of Saxony, and conſequently of his further advance into Germany, and his Victory obtain'd at Leipſick on the 17th of September following: Likewise the Reputation of this Supply, and the King of England's Friendſhip and Concordance, brought in the Landgrave of Heſſe and Duke Bernard Weymer to offer their Service to the King; and moſt part of the Towns of the upper Circle of the Empire were deſirous to joyn in Confederacy with him.

Our King, immediately after the diſpatching the Marquiſ of Hamilton, ſent Sir Henry Vane his Ambaſſador to the K. of Sweden, who arriv'd at Wertzburg on the Main a fortnight after the Battle of Leipſick, about which time Magdeburgh was block'd up by the Forces under the Command of Marquiſ Hamilton and General Banier, who had a little before took the Town of Vauſleber in Pomerania. The Ambaſſador, after ſome reſreſhment, went to the King of Sweden at Frankfort on the Main, which had open'd its Gates to him: On the 17th of November hither alſo came the Marquiſ of Hamilton, with a very magnificent Train, and the French Ambaſſador; and a little before them the Palsgrave arriv'd, and the Queen of Sweden alſo came thither attended by the Rix-Chancellor Oxenſtern, and Sir Patrick Ruthen eldeſt Colonel of the Scottiſh Nation. Here the King gave Audience to our Ambaſſador, and many Treaties were in agitation both for the proſecution of the War the next Year, and the reſtitution of the Palatinate, but the ſhortneſs of the King's ſtay hinder'd the bringing of any Counſels to maturity; for he was not here a Week when (upon advice that divers Troops of Spaniards and Flemings rais'd in Luxemburg were marching towards the Palatinate to recruit the Garriſons of Mentz, Wormes, Frankendal, Heydelburg, and other Towns in thoſe parts) he broke off the Negotiations for that time, and haſten'd to his Army, with a Purpoſe to paſs over the Rhine; in order whereunto he firſt lay down before a Sconce lying on the Rhine over againſt Oppenheim: It was a place very well fortified with deep and broad Foffes full of Water, with a Drawbridge over, and well provided of Viſuals and Ammudition, and was so situated that the Men had free passage to the Town, and back again, without any danger. After the Batteries were made, the King left the old Scottish Brigade commanded by Colonel Hepburn, and the blue Regiment commanded by Colonel Winkles, before it, and gave order to have some Boats that the Spaniards had sunk taken up and emptied of Water, by which means he passed over 2000 Scots of the Lord Rhee's Regiment, Sir James Ramsey's Regiment, and old Spence's Regiment, and with these he secur'd the landing place till he passed over a good part of his Army, and unexpectedly came before Oppenheim: The next day those in the Sconce (hearing the King had pass'd the Rhine) capitulated, and surrender'd the place to Colonel Hepburn: Oppenheim was also after a while surrender'd to the King of Sweden, and from thence he made a farther Incursion in the Palatinate with so great Success that he quickly took in all the Cities and Towns thereof, except Heydelburg and Frankendal, where we shall leave him victorious, and return to domestick Affairs.

About five Years since, certain Feoffees were entrusted to purchase in Improvements with their own, and the Money of other well-dispos'd Persons, and with the Profit thereof to set up and maintain preaching Ministers in places of greatest need, where preaching was much wanted; whereupon in a short time many great sums were advanc'd. There are in England 9284 Parish-Churches, endow'd with Glebe and Tythe, but of these, when these Trustees enter'd on their Work, 3845 were either appropriated to Bishops, Cathedrals, and Colleges, or impropriated as Lay-fees to private Persons, as formerly belonging to Abbeys; to purchase which last sort, they had made such progress, that it was believ'd in 50 Years rather Purchases than Money would have been wanting to them. The King was persuaded that this Project would prove dangerous to the Church, and and Noye, the Attorney-General, at the latter end of the Year, exhibited a Bill in the Exchequer-Chamber against the Feoffees.

It was charg'd against them, that they diverted the Charity wherewith they were entrusted; for, being by their Feoffment directed to settle preaching Ministers in distant obscure places, where Preaching was most wanting, they first settled a Morning-Lecture at St. Antholins in London. To this they answer'd, That London being the chiefest place from whence their Charity deriv'd, it was fit they should have some benefit of their own Bounty; and, that they were not so confined to the Uses of their Feoffment, but that in their choice they might reflect as well on the eminency as necessity of the Place; That they expended much of their own, as well as other Mens Charity, and hoped they might do with their own as they pleas'd. It was urg'd against them, That they generally prefer'd Non-Conformists to the Lectures of their erection; to which they said, None were placed therein but such whose Sufficiency and Conformity was approv'd by the Ordinary; and moreover, That one of the Feoffees acquainted the Bishop of London at his House at Fulham, That if he either disliked the Persons who manag'd, or the order they took in the Work, they would submit the alteration to his Discretion. In conclusion the Court condemn'd their Proceedings, as dangerous to the Church and State, pronouncing the Gifts and Feoffments to be illegal, and so dissolv'd the same, confiscating the Money to the King's use: Their criminal part was refer'd to the Star-Chamber, but never prosecuted, because many discreet and devout Men were rather desirous of the Regulation, than Ruin of so pious a Design.

Duke Hamilton, in September this Year, came from Germany, his Men being by Famine, Plague, and the Accidents of War, drawn to so small a number that they were not fit for his care. The King of Sweden had many communications with the Palsgrave and our Ambassador, about the Affairs of the Palatinate, in which the French Ambassador, and de Pauch the Ambassador of the United Provinces, did mediate so, as matters were near drawn to a good conclusion, when all was again made desperate by the Death of the K. of Sweden, which hapned at that memorable Battle of Lutzen, on the 6th of November O. S. The Palsgrave was in hopes of recovery when News came to him of the Death of the K. of Sweden, which resent'd him with so intense a passion that he died the 29th of the same Month; nor could the condition of Frankendal, then ready to be surrender'd to the English Officers then before it, any whit moderate his Grief. The Earl of Leicester was now sent Ambassador to the King of Denmark, to condole the Death of our King's Grandmother Sophia Queen-Dowager of Denmark, and to demand the Dividend of a 6th part of what she left, as due to him and the Queen of Bohemia, in right of Queen Ann their Mother, which 6th part amounted to 15000 l. Sterling. The K. of Denmark told the Ambassador, when the Account was stated what was due to him in arrear of 30000 l. a Month from the Crown of England, upon the Contract made in the Year 1625, towards the support of his Army, he would make up the rest; so that the Earl was fain to return re infecta. The King having had great experience of the ability and faithfulness of the Lord Wentworth (whom he had lately raised to that Honour, and made him Lord-President of the North) made him Deputy and chief Governor of the Realm of Ireland, where affairs were in much disorder thro' the Insolence of the Roman-Catholicks, who did not use moderately the King's Clemency to them in relaxation of the Rigour of some Penal Statutes: They are indeed a People that cannot bear any Indulgence towards 'em with temperance, but are too apt to be alienated in the apprehension of Favour to their own detriment and scandal of the King's Protestant Subjects. On the 2d of December this Year the King fell sick of the Small-Pox, but there was so little malignity in the Distemper, that he soon recover'd. The same Month the Earl of Arundel was sent to the Hague in Holland to the Queen of Bohemia, to condole the Death of her Husband, and sollicite hers and her Childrens Journey into England, which at this time she refus'd, because of the Grief she lay under, and an indisposition of health that made her unfit in the Winter season to take such a Journey.

The King had this Year a great check to the prosperity of his Government, which first appeared in Scotland, where some factious and seditious tious Malecontents began to sow some Seeds of Discontent, which afterwards encreas'd to that degree, as well near destroy'd the Prosperity and Happiness of three flourishing Kingdoms on this occasion.

In the minority of King James, the Lands of Cathedral Churches and Religious Houses that had been settled on the Crown by Act of Parliament, were shar'd among the Lords and Great Men of that Kingdom (by the connivance of the Earl of Murray, and some other of the Regents) to make them sure unto their side. And they being thus possess'd of the said Lands, with the Regalties and Tythes belonging to these Ecclesiastical Corporations, lorded it with Pride and Insolence enough in their several Territories, holding the Clergy to small Stipends, and the poor Peasants under miserable Vassalage and Subjection to them.

King Charles engag'd in a War at his first coming to the Crown, and having little aid from thence for the maintenance of it, by the Advice of his Council of that Kingdom, was put upon a course of resuming those Lands, Tythes, and Regalties into his own hands, to which the present possessors could pretend no other title than the unjust Usurpation of their Ancestors. This he endeavour'd first by an Act of Renovation, but that course being not like to speed, he follow'd in the way of a legal Process, which drew on a Commission for surrendring of Superiorities and Tythes, to be retaken from the King on such Conditions as might bring some profit to the Crown, some augmentation to the Clergy, and far more ease and benefit to the Common people: But these Occupants chose rather to expose their Country to the danger of a publick Ruin, than to part with any of that power which they had exercis'd on their Vassals, (as they commonly call'd their Tenants) and thereupon conspir'd together to oppose the King in any thing that should be offer'd in the following Parliament which had relation to the Church or to Church-affairs.

But because Religion, and the care thereof, is commonly the best Bait to catch the Vulgar, they must find out some other Means to divert the King from the prosecuting of that Commission, than the consideration of their own personal and private Interest; and they found Means to do it on another occasion, which was briefly this:

K. James, from his first coming to the Crown, had a Design to bring the Kirk of Scotland to an Uniformity with the Church of England, both Government and Form of Worship; and he proceeded so far as to settle Episcopacy among 'em, naming 13 new Bishops for so many Episcopal Sees, as had been anciently in that Church, three of which receiv'd Consecration from the Bishops of England, and conferr'd it on the rest of their Brethren at their coming home; which Bishops he also arm'd with a power of High-Commission, the better to keep down the insolent and domineering Spirit of the Presbyterians. In order to the other, he procur'd an Act to be pass'd in the Assembly at Aberdeen, Anno 1616, for composing a Liturgy, and extracting a new Book of Canons out of the scatter'd Acts of their old Assemblies: And in an Assembly held at Perth, Anno 1618, he obtain'd an Order for receiving the Communion kneeling, for administering Baptism and the Lord's Supper in private Houses in cases of extreme necessity, for Episcopal Confirmation; and finally, for the celebrating the Anniversary of our Saviour's Birth, Passion, Resurrection, Ascension, and the coming down of the Holy Ghost: All which he got confirm'd in Parliament.

So far that Wise King had advanc'd the Work of Uniformity before his engaging in the Cause of the Palatinate; his Breach with Spain, and the War which did issue upon it, had took off his Thoughts from prosecuting that Design, which his Son, being more entangled in Wars abroad and Distempers at home, had no Time to finish till he had settled his Affairs, and attain'd to some measure both of Power and Glory: But being it was a Business which was to be acted leisurely, and by degrees, he deferred the execution of his Purpose till he came into Scotland, towards which he went this Year about the middle of May, and arriv'd at Edinburgh the Tenth of June, and on the Eighteenth following his Coronation was celebrated with great Solemnity. He had before summon'd a Parliament to meet at Edinburgh, which assembled a while after the Coronation, and he caused an Act of Ratification of all that had been done by his Father to be propos'd to them, determining, as soon as that was pass'd, to go in hand with introducing a publick Liturgy, in effecting whereof he found a stronger Opposition in the Parliament than he had reason to expect, but carried it at last by a far major part of that Assembly.

This gave him the first Taste of their Disaffection to his Person and Government, but he went forward notwithstanding in pursuit of those Purposes which he brought thither with him: For, not long after his return into England, he gave order to the Dean of his Chapel Royal in Edinburgh, for Prayers to be read therein according to the English Liturgy, a Communion to be had every Month, and all Communicants to receive the Sacrament upon their Knees: That he who administred it, if he were a Bishop, should perform it in his Rocket, and other Episcopal Robes, and in his Surplice if a common Presbyter; and, That not only the Lords of his Council, but the Lords of the Session, and as many of the principal Magistrates of that City as could conveniently, should not fail of their attending Divine Service there on Sundays and Holy-days; for, by this means, he gave himself no improbable hopes that the English Liturgy passing a probationship in the Chapel Royal, might find a plausible entertainment in the Churches of Edinburgh, and be retain'd by degrees in all the rest of the Kingdom.

But the Presbyterian Scots, not ignorant of the King's Intentions, insinuated into the Minds of the common People, that this was a Design only to subject that Kirk to the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church of England, which they said was superstitious; and therefore, That it did behove them to stand together, as one Man, to oppose their entrance.

The King takes a Journey into Scotland, to be crown'd there.

The King commands the English Liturgy, with its usual Ceremonies, to be used in his Royal Chapel at Edinburgh.

Presbyterians beget a dislike of it in the Minds of the Vulgar.

The

1632.

The Lords and Gentry of that Realm, who fear'd nothing so much as the Commission of Surrenders, before mention'd, laid hold of this Occasion also; and they being seconded by Malecontented Spirits, who had not found the King to be as prodigal of his Favour to them as his Father had been before, endeavour'd to possess them with Fears and Jealousies that Scotland was to be reduced to the form of a Province, and govern'd by a Deputy or Lord-Lieutenant, as Ireland was. The like was done also by some Lords of Secret-Council, who before had govern'd as they list'd, and thought their Power now dwindling, and their Persons under some neglect, by the placing of a Lord-President over them, to direct in chief.

The Dislike is further promoted by the Insinuations of the Lords and Gentry,

So that the People generally being fool'd into this Opinion, that both their Christian and Civil Liberties were in no small danger, became capable of any Impression which the Presbyterian Faction could imprint upon them, which visibly appear'd by a virulent and seditious Libel, publish'd in the Year 1634, wherein the King was not only charg'd with altering the Government of that Kingdom, but traduced for very strong Inclinations to the Religion of the Church of Rome; the chief Abettor whereof (for the Author was not to be found) was the Lord Balmerino, for which he was legally committed, and condemn'd of Treason, but pardon'd by the King's great Goodness, tho' by his following Actions he deserv'd not that Favour.

The Fire thus breaking out in Scotland, it was no marvel if it laid hold on England also, the Discontented of both Nations working themselves about this time into a body, and from henceforth communicating their Counsels and Designs unto one another; as will hereafter appear.

And occasions the like Stirs in England.

This Year ended with some Stirs in Somersetshire, where some of the Justices were much offended at the keeping of Wakes, Church-ales and Bride-ales on the Lord's Day, which occasion'd many Disorders and Misdemeanours to be committed; and therefore they moved the Lord Chief-Justice Richardson, and Baron Denham, then in their Circuit in the Lent Vacation, to make some Order therein: These, in compliance with their Desire, make an Order on the 19th of May, founded on former Presidents sign'd by the Chief-Justice Popham in the latter end of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, therein suppressing such Revels, in regard of the infinite number of Inconveniences daily rising by means thereof; injoining the Constables to deliver a Copy thereof to the Minister of every Parish, who on the first Sunday in February, and likewise the two Sundays before Easter, was to publish the same every Year. This was look'd on by the Bishops as an Usurpation of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, and they thereupon procured a Commission, directed to the Bishop of Bath and other Divines, to enquire into the manner of publishing this Order, and the Carriage of the Judges in the Business: Notwithstanding which, the Chief-Justice, at the next Assizes, gave strict charge against these Revels, and requir'd an account of the publication and execution of the former Order, punishing some Persons for the Breach thereof: After whose return, the Archbishop of Canterbury sent for him, and told him, it was the King's Pleasure he should revoke his Order as he would answer it at his peril; which he did at the next Assizes, (but with this limitation, as much as in him lay.)

But this ended not here; for the Justices of that County hearing of this dealing with the Chief-Justice, made an humble Supplication to the King for suppressing the aforesaid Assemblies, which induced the King to renew his Father's Declaration about lawful Sports on the Lord's Day, publish'd in the 16th Year of his Reign, hoping thereby, thro' the restriction therein directed, to hinder the Abuse of those Recreations, and to free the Consciences of his Subjects from those servile Yokes which some Divines about that time endeavour'd to introduce, maintaining the indispensable Morality of the Fourth Commandment, and consequently the necessary Observation of the Jewish Sabbath; for it was in the Declaration prescribed,

1. That these Pastimes should be no Impediment or Lett to any publick Duty of the Day.

2. That no Recusants should be capable of the benefit of them.

3. That none should use them that were not diligently present at all divine Offices which the Day required. And,

4. That the Benefits should redound to none but such as keep themselves in their own Parishes.

The publication of this, however piously intended, gave great offence; and the rather, because, tho' there was nothing express'd in the Declaration, that the Minister of the Parish should be press'd to the publishing, yet some Ministers, for refusing the reading thereof, were suspended ab Officio & Beneficio, some deprived, and more molested in the High-Commission: The truth is, the ill reception it had among the People, in the former publication of it in the time of the King's Father, might have deterred the like at this time, for that the strict observation of the Lord's Day was much encreased since that time, tho' it was not known in England till the Year 1595, when Dr. Bond first publish'd it in his Book of Sabbath Doctrines; nor in Ireland till just Twenty Years after, when it was inserted in the Articles of Religion there establish'd; nor in Scotland, till above Twenty Years after that: And at this day, in Geneva, shooting in long Bows, Tennis, Bowling, and other Sports of that kind, are used; and the like in all foreign places where the Protestant Religion is profess'd; but it was generally disliked here, many complaining that Man's Badness took occasion to be worse under the protection of those Sports permitted to them: For tho' liberty on the Lord's Day may be so limited in the Notions of learned Men, as to make it lawful, it is very difficult so to confine it to the Actions of the People, but that they will degenerate into licentiousness: So that the Declaration after a while died of it self, and it was wish'd by many prudent Men of that time it had never lived.

The Merchants of London, and other Parts, made great Complaints at the end of the last Year, of the Obstructions of Trade for want of good Convoys to secure them against the Turks and other Pyrates that infested our Coast, which made the King very earnest in making Preparations to make himself strong by Sea, to which he was the more inclined for the vindication of his just Authority of the Sovereignty of the British Seas, which was not only actually usurp'd by the Hollanders, but the Right it self disputed by a Tract written by Hugo Grotius, a learned Man of that time, call'd Mare Liberum: But whilst the King, to his Power, omitted not to maintain his Right, our Learned Selden by his Pen encounter'd Grotius, in a learned Book call'd Mare Clausum; wherein he did not only assert the Sovereignty (or Dominion) of the British Seas to the Crown of England, but clearly prov'd by constant and continual Practice, that the King of England used to levy Money from the Subjects, for the providing of Ships and other Necessaries to maintain that Sovereignty which did of Right belong to them: But before the writing of this Tract, the King had well advis'd how to enable himself with Treasure to support his Authority, and defend the Kingdoms, by the Industry of Noy his Attorney-General, a most indefatigable Inquisitor into our ancient Records, who had found many Presidents for levying a Naval Aid upon the Subjects by the sole Authority of the King, whensoever the Safety and Preservation of the Kingdom did require it of him; and, that such Aid had been heretofore levy'd in the same Year in which the Kings that took it had receiv'd Subsidies in the way of Parliament; for which he gave this Reason: When a King of England wants Money to support his Expence, or for the enlarging his Dominions in foreign Conquests, or otherwise to advance his Honour in the Eye of the World, he ought to be beholden to his Subjects for it by Aid in Parliament; but when the Kingdom is in danger, and the Safety of the Subject concern'd therein, he may by our Lands raise such Sums of Money as he thinks expedient for preventing of the Danger, and providing for the publick Safety of himself and his. And hereupon, by this Advice, Writs were issued and directed to all the Port-Towns and Maritime Counties of the Kingdom, to fit out a certain number of Ships, furnish'd with Mariners, Ammunition, Victuals, and all other Necessaries for defence of the Realm, whereby the King quickly had equipp'd a very good Fleet, tho' not great enough for the End intended; which occasion'd the like Writs to be issued out to all the Counties in the Kingdom, in the Year 1636. Of which more hereafter.

The Swedish Success declining in Germany.

This Year was unfortunate to the Swedes in Germany, where General Arnheim was constrained to retire out of Bohemia into Saxony: The City of Ratisbon was regain'd by the Imperialists, General Albringer slain near Lansbut, and the whole Army totally routed by the King of Hungary, and the Cardinal Infante, at the Battel of Northingen; after which ensued the surrender of that Town, and the Conquest of the Dukedom of Wirtemberg, whose Duke fled to Stras- burg: But tho' this gave a great stop to the Swedish Greatness, yet it brought a little Repose to Germany; for shortly after this Success a Peace was concluded, tho' it lasted not long.

In Ireland the Lord-Deputy Wentworth was very busie in settling the Quiet of that Nation; and because Popery was chiefly encreas'd for want of able Ministers, and that occasion'd by the poor Maintenance they had in most places, he procur'd of the King, by the mediation of Archbishop Laud, that all the Impropropriations then in the Crown should be restor'd to the Church, to a great diminution of the Royal Revenue, tho' the King was never sensible of any Loss to himself, if thereby Gain might redound to God thro' his Ministers.

On Candlemas Night the Gentlemen of the four Inns of Court presented a Masque to the King and Queen at Whitehall, riding in stately Chariots from the Temple thither; 'twas indeed a pompous and magnificent Shew, but made more glorious by a long train of Christian Captives, who having been many Years enslav'd in the Chains of Bondage, were sent for a Present to the King, by the Xeriffe or Emperor of Morocco, in testimony of the Assistance receiv'd from our King, whose Fleet assisted in the taking of Sallee, then in Rebellion against him, and in Enmity to all the World, it being a Nest of Pyrates, by whose Destruction Commerce was very free in those parts.

This Year dy'd Sir Richard Weston Earl of Portland, Lord High-Treasurer of England, a great Statesman, but suspected to be too much a Favourer of the Religion of Rome, in which he was reputed to have dy'd, some of his Children being educated therein. His Place, for the present, was entrusted to Commissioners, till a fit Person could be found on whom to bestow it.

It was now the Year 1635, when a gallant Fleet was sent out, by Aid of the Ship-money, under the Earl of Lindsey Admiral, and the Earl of Essex Vice-Admiral; whereby our Trade was not only made secure by scouring the Seas of Pyrates, but the King became very formidable to all his Neighbours: And by his Interposition this Summer Flanders was preserv'd, which had else probably been swallow'd up by the French and Hollanders; for the King of Spain could not bring 8000 Men into the Field, and leave his Garrisons provided; and the French King and they were in confederacy for that purpose, by which 'twas agreed, that he should invest Dunkirk with an Army whilst the Hollanders did block it up with their Navy, that so all Passages into the Country being secured, they might the more easily subdue the inward Parts; which Design had taken effect if the English Fleet had not dislodg'd the Hollanders from before the Town, and reliev'd it: And the French, by their Insolencies at Diest and Tellemont, inflam'd and encourag'd the Peoples Heats against them; for before they had been so practis'd on by the Holland Faction, that few or none would arm to repulse their Enemies.

of his Age; he had almost reach'd to the Hundred and sixtieth Year, and in all likelihood had outliv'd that time some Years, had not so tedious a Journey, and the over-violent agitation of his Body, together with the change of his wonted course of Diet, accelerated his End.

Charles Prince Electoral-Palatine came into England at this time, to visit his Uncle, and to consult with him for his restitution to the Palatinate; and, a while after his arrival, his Brother Prince Rupert came also.

The King's Reputation was now very high, and the Hollanders, a crafty and industrious People, took all Occasions to endear themselves to him: At this time they sent an Ambassador over, to congratulate with the King and Queen for the Birth of their second Daughter the Princess Elizabeth; and, to ingratiate themselves the more, they sent by him a very rich Present, a massy piece of Ambergrise, two huge Basons of China, a noble Clock the Workmanship of Rodolphus the Emperor, and some exquisite Pieces of Painting of Titian and Tintoret, which were well accepted.

The King finding some Inconvenience in the managing of his Treasure by Commissioners, gave the Office to the Bishop of London, which was a very good Choice; for whereas most of the Treasurers of these latter Times had rather serv'd themselves in that Office than the King, raising themselves to great Estates and Dignities thereby, he thought fit to chuse this Churchman, who having no Family to raise, nor Wife and Children to provide for, might better manage the Incomes of the Treasury to his advantage, than they had been formerly: And so it prov'd, for by his Care of the Revenue, the King began to be rich; and he was of so well-temper'd a Disposition, that he gave exceeding great Content to all the People.

sent out under the command of the Earl of
land.

The King's Naval Preparations were very great this Year, the Fleet consisting of 60 good Ships, under the command of the Earl of Northumberland, now made Lord High-Admiral of England, who sailing Northward, and finding a great number of Dutch Busses fishing on our Coast, he seiz'd on many of them, and dispers'd the rest. This made a great Consternation amongst the People of the United Provinces, many of whose Subsistence depended on this fishing; wherefore, upon a Supplication from the States to the King, they had Permission granted by him; for he was more displeas'd at their Presumption in doing it as in their own Right, and in contempt of his Authority in the Dominion of these Seas, than at the thing done. As the Navy was greater this Year than before, so the Charge of it was much augmented; wherefore, whereas the last Year the Ship-writs had been sent only to the Maritime Counties, they were now issued to all the Counties in England; and the People generally paid what Rates and Assessments were set upon them in pursuance thereof; but some refus'd, and many of the Clergy complain'd that they were unreasonably rated by their Neighbours, some of them at a sixth, and others at a fourth part of the Tax of the Parish. For Satisfaction of the Refusers, the King writ to the Judges for their Opinion, who are by their Oaths his proper Counsellors in all Difficulties concerning the Law; and, to ease the Clergy, he writ to all the Sheriffs of England, requiring that the Clergy possess'd of Parsonages should not be assess'd above a tenth part of the Land-Rate of their several Parishes; and, that Consideration should be had for Vicars accordingly.

The Judges gave their Opinions, That the King might, by Writ under the Great Seal of England, command all his Subjects to provide a number of Ships for the defence of the Kingdom, and in case of refusal, compel the same; and, That the King was the sole Judge of the Time and Proportion in which such Levies were to be made.

These Opinions being subscrib'd by all the Judges, were enroll'd in all the Courts of Westminster-Hall, and the King thought he had now Warrant sufficient to proceed against the Defaulters, the chiefest whereof was one Mr. Hambden, a Gentleman of Buckinghamshire, who being summon'd by Process, appear'd, and requir'd Oyer of the Ship-Writs; which being read, he demurr'd in Law thereunto, and demanded the Opinions of all the Judges upon the legal Sufficiency thereof. This great Case came to be argued in the Exchequer-Chamber, and the major part of the Judges deliver'd their Opinions in favour of the Writs, and accordingly the Barons gave Judgment against Mr. Hambden: Yet did not the Question altogether so repose, but Mr. Hambden observing that Two of the Judges (viz. Crook and Hutton) were of a contrary Sense, held up the Contest still, tho' all in vain, all his Inquietude not gaining him the least Acquittal, until an Higher Power interposed.

There was an Imperial Dyet held this Year for the electing of a King of the Romans; and King Charles sent thither the Earl of Arundel, his Ambassador, to treat with the Emperor and the Princes for the Restitution of the Palatinate to the Palsgrave; but that Embassy could effect nothing: For the Duke of Bavaria, who had in his possession the Upper Palatinate, and the Electoral Dignity, would by no means hear of any Propositions to part with either: But the Lower Palatinate he might have had upon some Terms which the Emperor propos'd, but our Ambassador was not instructed to accept of any thing in diminution of the Elector's Right; so that the Palsgrave had no fruit of this Embassy, yet were his Hopes a little rais'd by an Overture of Marriage made at this time betwixt the King of Poland and one of his Sisters, which was almost effected by the Legation of Prince Radzevil, here in England; but the Emperor privately obstructed it, and by the Insinuation of the Jesuites so instigated the Clergy of Poland against it, because of her Religion, that the Treaty was broke off, and the King afterwards married the Lady Cecilia, second Sister to the Emperor.

On the 14th of January, Mr. William Prynne, an Utter Barrister of Lincolns-Inn, Dr. John Bastwick Doctor of Physick, and Henry Burton a Minister, were censur'd in the Star-Chamber. The Offence of Prynne was, for writing and dispersing Libels against the establish'd Discipline of the Church

Church of England; that of Bastwick, for inveighing against the Proceedings of the High-Commission against him, before which he had been accus'd for writing a Book, call'd Flagellum Pontificis & Episcoporum Latialium, and committed to the Gatehouse, in which time, besides his arraigning the High-Commission Court, he publish'd a Latin Apology (call'd by the Court a Libel) ad Prasules Anglicanos, and a Litany very virulent against them: That of Mr. Burton was, for publishing a Sermon which he preach'd on the Fifth of November before, wherein the Prelates were charg'd for introducing several Innovations into Divine Worship, which was deem'd a Libel. For these Offences the Judgment of the Court was, That they should lose their Ears in the Palace-Yard at Westminster, be each of them fined Five thousand Pounds to the King, and imprison'd during Life in three remote places. Finch the Chief-Justice mov'd the Court, that it might be added to Mr. Pryn's Censure, to be branded in each Cheek with S. L. for Slandorous Libeller, which was consented to; for they were the more severe against him, because he had been an Offender before in the like kind, having been three Years before censur'd to lose his Ears on the Pillory, for writing a Book, call'd Histrion-Mastix, or The Whip of Stage-players, wherein some indecent Reflections were taken to be on the Queen her self, as too much delighted in Masques.

The Prince-Elector, and his Brother Prince Rupert, went to Holland about this time, in order to a Design which was put in practice the next Year, to attempt something with an Army in the Palatinate. The Assistance and Credit of the King's Purse did so prevail underhand with the Prince of Orange and the States of the United Provinces, that a small beginning of an Army was rais'd, with which they advanc'd into Westphalia, and besieg'd Lemmingen: But Hausfield, one of the Emperor's Generals, came so soon upon them, that they effected nothing, but were forced to fight to a great disadvantage, having had 2000 Men slain, and most of the rest dispers'd, and many Prisoners taken, among whom were Prince Rupert and the Lord Craven; the Prince-Elector himself escap'd by flight, and retir'd to the Hague.

The Bishop of Lincoln fin'd and imprison'd for certain Misde-meanors.

Williams Bishop of Lincoln was on the 11th of July censur'd in the Star-chamber for tampering to suborn Witnesses, to be fined 10000 l. to the King, and imprison'd during the King's pleasure, being referr'd to the High-Commission for a further Censure; the Occasion whereof we shall briefly relate.

This Bishop, after the Great Seal (some ten Years since) had been taken from him, retir'd to Bugden in Huntingtonshire, wherein he liv'd very hospitably, and had great concourse, amongst others Sir John Lamb, Dr. Sibthorp, with Allen and Burden two Proctors, came to visit him, and being at Dinner with him, there was much Discourse about Nonconformists; and the Bishop knowing these to be busie Men in the prosecution of such, advis'd them to take off their heavy Hand from them, informing them, that the King intended to use them hereafter with more mildness, as a considerable Party, having great Influence on the Parliament, without whose Concurrence he could not supply his Necessities; adding, that he had communicated this unto him by his own Mouth. A few Years after, Lamb, upon some Difference with the Bishop, inform'd against him for revealing the King's Secrets; whereupon an Information was put in against him in the Star-Chamber; to which he put in an especial Answer, declaring how all was contriv'd by a Conspiracy and Combination of Lamb, Sibthorp, Allen, and Burden, out of an Intent to advance themselves, and Hatred to him, for not permitting them to poll and peal the King's Subjects in Leicestershire, in their Ecclesiastical Courts, by hauling them into Nets Ex Officio mere, without any previous Complaint under an imaginary colour of Puritanism. To this Answer the King's Attorney rejoyn'd in Issue, admitting the Bishop to prove his special matters, who proceeded to the examination of his Witnesses therein; but after a while, the Attorney being somewhat remiss in the Prosecution, one Richard Kilvert was entertain'd to be the Bishop's Prosecutor, who had found out, that one John Prigion, a Register of Lincoln and Leicester, was a most material Witness in the Bishop's defence; and the Credit of his Testimony he design'd to invalidate, by charging him with getting a Bastard on one Elizabeth Hodson: The Bishop thought it behov'd him to support the Reputation of Prigion, so he engaged himself more zealously therein than was conceiv'd consistent with the Gravity of so great a Prelate, to such as knew not that he and one Dr. Morrison were the only Persons of note present at his Table, where the Discourse above mention'd passed between him and Sir John Lamb. This Bastard was by the Sessions at Lincoln order'd to be kept by Prigion, as the reputed Father thereof, but at a Sessions following that Order was revers'd, and the Child father'd upon one Bourne, and Prigion acquitted; in the doing whereof 'tis said Powel and Owen, two Agents of the Bishop, did menace and tamper with the Witnesses: But at a third Sessions Prigion was again charg'd, and Bourne was freed: Yet this last Order being upon a Certiorari brought to the Kings-bench, was there quash'd as insufficient, and Prigion was after clear'd from the Child: Kilvert nevertheless, in the traverse of this Affair, let fall the first Information in the Star-Chamber, and proceeded upon that whereon the Sentence before-named was grounded, viz. for Subornation, and therein he succeeded. This dealing with the Bishop was very rigorous, and the Rigor of it imputed to Laud Archbishop of Canterbury, who thought him one that too much oppos'd his Intentions, in reducing the Clergy to an exact and strict conformity to the Orders of the Church in point of Ceremony, and therefore unfit to have any Government in it; for, after that part of his Sentence came to be executed which was referr'd to the High-Commission, he was by that suspended ab Officio & Beneficio, and all his Preferments in the Church sequestred to the use of the King; and the Archbishop of Canterbury, as Archbishop of the Province, exercis'd all kind of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction throughout the Diocese of Lincoln, not only as Ordinary of that Diocese, but as Visitor of

of all those Colleges which had any dependances on that See.

On the 23d Day of July, being the Day before this last part of the Sentence against the Bishop of Lincoln was executed, there was a very great Commotion in Edinburgh, about reading a Book of Common-Prayer some time before sent thither, which drew after it great Misery and Confusion to the King and all his Kingdom.

In the Year 1616 King James obtain'd an Act of the General Assembly at Aberdeen for the compiling a Liturgy or Common-Prayer, which was to be first presented to the King, and after his Approbation, universally receiv'd throughout the Kingdom. This Book, in pursuance thereof, was framed and sent up to the King, who having himself perused and considerably revised it, return'd it to Scotland, to be commended to that Church; but before a period and consummation was put to that Business the King dy'd. This pious Intention of K. James for a Unity and Uniformity in the publick Prayer, Liturgy, and Service of the Church of Scotland, was so far intended by the King, that shortly after his return from that Kingdom, he did not only enjoin a stricter Celebration of the English Liturgy in his own Chapel at Edinburgh than had been formerly, but frequently consulted how to have it universally used thro' the whole Kingdom, but the Scotts Bishops, being jealous that this might be an Argument of their Dependence on the Church of England, rather desir'd that the Liturgy framed in Scotland in King James's time might be receiv'd. To this Proposition the King agreed, and the Book sent by K. James formerly into Scotland was remitted to England, and after many serious Consultations, and some Alterations made by Advice of divers of the Bishops and Clergy of Scotland then here, 'twas perfected, printed, and publish'd, and sent into Scotland.

The Bishops and Noblemen of the King's Council, then present at Edinburgh, resolv'd, That the Book should be first read in the great Church, on the before-mention'd 23d of July; and on the Sunday before, Notice thereof was publicly given in the Church. There were present both the Archbishops, many of the Privy-Council, and others of the best Quality in Edinburgh, besides a great concourse of ordinary People. Amongst this Multitude there appear'd no sign of Trouble, but no sooner was the Book open'd by the Dean of Edinburgh, but a number of the meaner sort, with clapping their Hands and Outcries, made a great Up-roar, and one of 'em, call'd Jane (or Janet) Gaddis, flung a little folding Stool, whereon she sat, at the Dean's Head, saying, Out thou false Thief, dost thou say Mass at my Lug? which was follow'd with so great a Noise and Confusion, that not any one could hear, or be heard; whereupon the Bishop of Edinburgh stept into the Pulpit, and hoping to appease them by putting them in mind, that the place in which they were was holy Ground, and by entreating them to desist from the profanation of it, they were the more enraged, throwing at him Cudgels, Stools, and what else was in the way, even to the endangering of his Life. Upon this, the Archbishop of St. Andrews, Lord-Chancellor, call'd down the Provost and Bailiffs of the City from their Seats to their assistance, who (not without some difficulty) put the unruly People out of the Church, and made fast the Doors: This done, the Dean proceeded in reading the Book, the Multitude in the mean while rapping and pelting the Windows with Stones, to disturb the Exercise; yet notwithstanding all their clamour the Service was ended, but not the Peoples Rage, who waiting the Bishop's retiring to his Lodging, so assaulted him, as (had he not been rescued by a strong hand) he had probably perish'd by their Violence.

The Flame being once kindled, went on with resifless Fury: Tho' in the Hubbub of this Day no considerable Persons appear'd on their Side, yet soon after they shew'd themselves by degrees, till the Bishops came to be in danger of their Lives; and any Persons, tho' of the highest Quality, who seem'd to favour or protect them, were affronted and assaulted. All the Kingdom flock'd to Edinburgh, as in a general Cause, and erected there four Tables or Councils; one of the Nobility, another of the Gentry, a third of the Burgesses, and a fourth of the Ministers; out of which was a general Table of several Commissioners, chosen from the other four, who consulted of what was proposed to them by the other Tables; and what they order'd was put in practice with strict Obedience all over the Kingdom; the Regal Authority being as it were transferred to those Illegal Assemblies.

The first Act of this General Table was, the renewing of a Confession of Faith subscrib'd by King James and his Household, in the Year 1580, taken after by all Persons 1581, by Ordinance of the Lords of the Privy-Council and Act of the General Assembly, and subscrib'd again 1590, by a new Ordinance of Council, at the desire of the General Assembly. This Confession was call'd The Negative Confession, wherein the Authority of the Pope, Transubstantiation, Images, Relicks, Opus operatum, Merits, Auricular Confession, Prayer for the Dead, and all the Corruptions of the Church of Rome, as well in Doctrine as outward Rites, are enumerated at large, and particularly abjur'd. To this was added a Covenant, by which they swore mutually to defend the same against all Persons whatsoever. Besides this, this Confession was so interpreted as to extend to the renouncing as well the late Innovations, as those expressly contain'd therein; and in this Sense every one was to declare they took it.

This Confession and Covenant was first taken by the Tables, and afterwards imposed on all sorts of People, wherein great Violence and Menaces were used in many places, with beating, tearing of Clothes, drawing Blood, and exposing to thousands of Injuries and Reproaches, at Edinburgh, St. Andrews, Aberdeen, Glasgow, Lanerick, and many places more; all those Professors in Colleges, and Ministers, who out of Conscience towards God, and Loyalty to the King, did either dissuade others, or could not by their Entreaties or Threatnings be persuaded ded to it themselves: The Laws were positive against this manner of leaguings, it being expressly declar'd in two Acts of Parliament, That all Leagues of Subjects amongst themselves, without the Privy and Approbation of the King, was Sedition; and the Authors and Abettors of them to be punish'd, as Movers of the same: But so great was the Transport of Zeal in the People, inflamed by the Insinuations of the Chiefs of the Confederates, that the Law could take no place: All Professors in Colleges, and Ministers, that refus'd to subscribe their Covenant, were remov'd; for many good Men, that disliked the tumultuary way of offering it, were also scandaliz'd at the Interpretation by the Tables upon it.

Professors of Colleges and Ministers remov'd on the same account.

The Marquis comes into Scotland, to compose the Differences.

The King being much displeas'd with these Indignities upon his Royal Authority, intended to do that by Power which Persuasion could not effect; but the Marquis of Hamilton, then very prevalent with him, diverted that Course, offering his Service to compose the Differences: The King, being in his nature always prone to Lenity, was quickly induced to condescend to this Motion, and sent him down in the quality of High-Commissioner, authorising him with large Power to settle the Peace of that Kingdom. The Marquis at his first arrival finding the City of Edinburgh fill'd with extraordinary numbers of Persons from several parts of the Kingdom, because of the sitting of the Tables, went to a place call'd Dalkeith, where the Magistrates of Edinburgh coming to him, the Marquis demanded of them, first, what they expected from him for Satisfaction to their Complaints; and next, what might be expected from them for returning to their former Obedience, especially in renouncing and delivering up their late Covenant: To which, after some time, they made answer, That they requested a General Assembly of the Church; and then a Parliament, in which two Judicatures they would discuss their Grievances: To the second they said, they could not acknowledge that they had ever parted from their Obedience; and for their Covenant, they would rather renounce their Baptism than abate one Word or Syllable thereof. And presently after they had given their Answers, they possess'd the People with many Misreports, and the Sermons of the Preachers at Edinburgh were fill'd with Admonitions, that they should take heed of crafty Compositions, or yielding in the least Point of their intended Reformation.

The Marquis seem'd much troubled at these Actions, and thought the best Expedient he could use to reclaim the People, was to publish a Proclamation, which he had brought with him from the King of his Grace and Favour toward them, for relieving their Grievances, and satisfying them with his Forwardness for the maintenance of the True Religion, and his Averseness to Papery: But before he did this, by advice of the Privy-Council, he wrote a Letter to the King, to desire him to sweeten it by a Favour of restoring to the City of Edinburgh the Sitting of the Session, and all Courts of Justice, as a thing very acceptable to the Judges-Advocates, and all Dependants upon the Law, and to all others that had Business depending in the Courts, but chiefly to the City of Edinburgh, which complain'd much of being impoverish'd by their absence. To this the King return'd a very gracious Answer, consenting the Courts of Justice should presently begin again to sit at Edinburgh; and in pursuance thereof, Proclamation was made for the first sitting down of the Session on the Third Day of July, which was receiv'd with great Joy by the Judges-Advocates and the Magistrates and Citizens of Edinburgh.

Proclamation made for the first Sitting.

The Session being settled, the Marquis caus'd the King's Proclamation to be pronounc'd at the Cross at Edinburgh, wherein the King took notice, that many Disorders had lately hapned upon the Introduction of the Service-Book, Book of Canons, and High-Commission, many thereby fearing an Innovation of Religion and Laws, wherefore he assur'd his good Subjects, That he was resolv'd to maintain the true Protestant Religion, and not thereafter press the practise of the Canons and Service-book, nor any thing of that nature, but in such a fair and legal way as shall manifest he never intends Innovations in Religion nor Laws: That he will reform the High-Commission, so as it shall not be grievous to the People; and what is further fitting to be done, shall be agitated in a General Assembly and Parliament, which should be indicted in convenient time; concluding, That he would not have them misled by any disaffected Persons, who, under pretext of Religion, would draw them to Disobedience, to his grief and their ruine. This Proclamation was no sooner read, but the Confederates arraign'd it in a Protestation; which they caus'd to be publickly read, importing, That they never doubted the Sincerity of the King in defence of the Protestant Religion; That what he granted them was not a sufficient Remedy for their Grievances, in that he did not wholly abolish the Service-book, nor the High-Commission, which was impos'd upon them contrary to the Laws of the Land; That no Proclamation can secure them from the re-entry of the Innovations which this seem'd to discharge; and, That an Assembly and Parliament are the only Remedies of their Evils, and Means to prevent the like; and, That their Proceeding ought not to be interpreted a drawing to Disobedience under pretext of Religion, and running headlong into Ruine.

The Marquis having in vain expostulated with them about this seditious Behaviour, return'd to the King, to whom he related the Particulars of all past Transactions. The King was offended at the Insolences of the Confederates, but was persuaded to try a little further if he could reduce them by gentle means, wherefore he dispatch'd the Marquis with new Instructions, and gave him order to call a General Assembly, and after that a Parliament, but so as he should be first satisfied, by all Informations he could conveniently receive, of the Constitution of a General Assembly, none having been kept for divers Years.

1638.

As soon as he came into Scotland he deputed some of the Lords of the Council to confer with some of the chief of the Confederates of all Orders, but he found their Behaviour still so unsuitable to these Condescensions from the Throne, that he was oblig'd to go back to the King again for new Instructions; upon which they told him, that if he did not return from the King by the 21st of September, to indict a General Assembly by the King's Authority, they would themselves call one; for they had about this time publish'd a Book, wherein amongst other things 'twas asserted, That the Power of convoking an Assembly, in case the Prince was an Enemy of the Truth, or negligent in advancing the Good of the Church, was in the Church it self.

The Marquis hasten'd with all Diligence to the King, and inform'd him of all Occurrences that pass'd, which occasion'd many Debates of the Way to be used to bring that Kingdom to Peace and Quietness.

The Scots about the King advis'd, that he should not have any recourse to Arms, but in an unavoidable Extremity; the Lords of the Privy-Council in Scotland were many of them in private League with the Confederates, so that nothing could be rely'd on from them: And therefore that which was thought the best Expedient, was, to take an exact view of all the Petitions, Remonstrances, and Protestations of the Confederates, which they had since the beginning of the Troubles exhibited either to the King, or the Marquis, or Privy-Council, and to grant them all. And besides all these, because the heads of the Confederates had made it a principal Motive to alienate the Minds of the People from the King, that he was inclin'd to Papery, and had an aversion to the Reform'd Religion, 'twas adjudg'd and consented to by the King, to command and urge the renewing of that Confession and Covenant by his Authority, which they had taken without it, which Legitimation was to save the People who were to swear it from incurring the Danger of those Laws, which made it very criminal to enter into any Covenant without his Authority: And instead of that unjust Band of Confederacy, which they added to the Confession, to bind themselves to mutual maintenance and defence against all Persons whatsoever, the King caused a general Band for maintenance of the true Religion and the King's Person, to be added in the same Words as 'twas express'd and taken in the Year 1590 by an Ordinance of the Privy-Council, at the desire of the General Assembly.

With these Concessions all drawn up in a Proclamation, the Marquis return'd to Scotland within 8 days after his first coming to Oatlands to the King, and arriv'd there before the time limited for his return: And shortly after the Proclamation was publish'd at the Market Cross, which was to this effect; That the King did annul and rescind all Acts and Proclamations that had been made concerning the Service-

Book, Book of Canons, and High Commission, and the practise of them: He also dispens'd with the practise of the five Articles of Perth; and 'twas declar'd, That all Persons, Ecclesiastical or Civil, of what Quality, Title, or Degree soever, should be liable to the Tryal and Censure of Parliament, General Assembly, or any other Judicatories competent; and, that no other Oath should be administred to any Minister, at his Entry into the Ministry, but that which is contain'd in the Act of Parliament: Likewise, in manifestation of the King's Integrity to Religion, all Persons should be enjoin'd by his Authority to subscribe the Confession of Faith, with the Band annex'd: And, that no Doubt may be left in the Minds of the People of the King's Intentions, 'tis declar'd, That the Marquis, the King's Commissioner, has a Warrant to summon a Free General Assembly, to be holden at Glasgow the 21st of November, and a Parliament at Edinburgh the Fifteenth of May.

All moderate Persons receiv'd full Satisfaction from this Proclamation, and readily subscrib'd the Confession and Band or Covenant, which was call'd The King's Covenant: But the Confederates at the Tables, seeing their Reign was at an end unless they could keep alive the Flame they had kindled, publish'd a seditious Protestation against it, tending to continue the present Fears and Jealousies, and dehorting all Persons from subscribing any new Covenants, till the Assembly should be convened, and determine the Differences now on foot.

The Marquis and the Lords of the Council perceiv'd by this Protestation that the Confederates endeavour'd all they could to blast the King's Intentions: They saw also, by what the Confederates did, that little Good was to be expected from the approaching Assembly (which was summon'd to appear at the time express'd by the King's Proclamation) for they had used great Industry, that all that should be chosen thereunto should be of the most rigid and most affectionate to their Covenant; and, to exclude the Bishops from having any place there, they publish'd, That any Persons cited as Criminals before the Assembly, could have no Voice there: And, in pursuance thereof, they drew up a Libel against the Archbishops and Bishops, which they exhibited on the Four and twentieth of October, to the Presbytery of Edinburgh, who (after some short consideration of the Libel, which was full of Scandal and Reproaches of the Bishops) order'd, that it should be referred to the next Assembly, and that the Libel and their Order of Reference should be read in all Churches, with a publick Warning and Citation to the Bishops, to be present at the Assembly, to answer to the Complaints against them.

The Fears that had been entertain'd of the little Profit that would arise from this Assembly, soon appear'd to be too well ground-

A Libel drawn up against the Archbishops and Bishops, who by this Means being made Criminals, are excluded from having Place in their Assembly.

On the very first Day of their meeting, they not only excluded the Bishops, but refus'd to admit Six Lords of the Privy-Council, who were appointed by the King to be Assessors to the Commissioners; and affirm'd at the same time, that were the King himself present, he should have but one Voice, and that no Negative Voice neither.

This Temper shewing it self so soon, was look on by the Commissioner and the Council as prognosticating so much Mischief, and so little Good, from the Continuance of the Assembly, that it was agreed in Council to dissolve the same, and a Proclamation to that purpose was sign'd by all the Council, except the Earl of Argyle; whereupon the Commissioner went immediately to the Assembly, and said to them,

The Marquis's Speech to the Assembly.

"You are now about to settle the Lawfulness of this Judicature, and the competency of it against Bishops, neither of which I can allow: I am glad I have seen this Assembly met, a thing which 'twas supposed His Majesty never intended: And for the further clearing the Integrity of his Intentions, let this Paper, which I deliver to the Clerk to be read, bear witness.

The Paper being read by the Clerk, was a Declaration, the same in every substantial point with the Declaration discharging the Service-Book, Book of Canons, &c.

The Confederates Protestation.

And now the Proclamation was no sooner publish'd than it was encounter'd with a Protestation of the Confederates, That it is Lawful for them to Sit still, and continue the Assembly; and, That they would still adhere to all their former Protestations. And accordingly pursuing the Tenour of their Protestations, presently declared Six former General Assemblies (which they thought would discern them) to be null, and depriv'd all the Bishops; some they excommunicated, and soon after abolish'd Episcopacy it self, as inconsistent with the Laws of that Church.

Episcopacy abolish'd by the Assembly.

Annual Assemblies ordain'd.

The Marquis seeing all things tending to a present Rupture, sent to desire Leave of the King to return into England, which he obtained; but, before he went, he saw an end of the Assembly which made many Acts, not necessary here to be related, and by their own Authority ordain'd Annual Assemblies, the first whereof was assign'd to meet at Edinburgh the First of July 1639.

Their Declaration to justify their Actions suppress'd by the King's Authority.

As soon as the Marquis was gone, the Confederates drew up a Declaration, address'd to all good Christians of England, to justify their Intentions and Actions, which had so many Undutiful Reflections in it upon the Government, that it was suppress'd by the King's Authority; and he publish'd a Declaration, to satisfy all his faithful Subjects of the vile and seditious Practices of those in Scotland who had, under pretext of Religion, design'd the Subversion of his Royal Authority, which was commanded to be read in all Churches.

On the last of October this Year, Mary de Medecis, the Widow of Henry the Fourth, King of France, and Mother to the Queen, came into England, and was very honourably entertain'd. Whilst she staid here, she was lodg'd at the King's Palace of St. James, but she finding the King likely to be involv'd in Troubles, to reduce his Subjects of Scotland to Obedience, after some Months stay, return'd into Holland.

Mary de Medecis, the Queen's Mother, comes to England.

The Scots having made all things desperate to Accommodation, made vigorous Preparations for War, and sent for Succours to such of the neighbouring Princes and States from whom they could expect any Assistance: They also invited home many eminent Commanders of their Nation, from Sweden and Holland, to take Employment in their Armies, many of which were at the beginning of the Year come to them.

The Scots prepare for War, invite home their Commanders abroad, seize on divers Castles, and the King's Arms and Ammunition.

They seiz'd on the Castles of Edinburgh and Dunbarton, and all other places of Strength in the Kingdom; and took out of Dalkeith all the King's Arms and Ammunition, laid there the Year before by the Marquis of Hamilton: Next they chose Alexander Lesley, an old experienc'd Officer, to be Captain-General of their Armies, to whom all the Chiefs of the Confederates (who took Arms) solemnly swore Obedience in all Orders of War; and he swore in like manner faithfully to exercise his Charge.

Alex. Lesley their Captain-General.

The Marquis of Argyle was sent to take care of those places Frontier of Ireland, and the Earl of Montrose had the charge of Aberdeen and the more Northern Parts; and Colonel Monroe was sent towards the Borders of England, to keep all things quiet till the Levies were perfected.

The King in that mean time was not idle, but made very great Levies in all places; and having got his Army together, he gave the command thereof in chief to the Earl of Arundel as General, under whom the Earl of Essex was Lieutenant-General, and the Earl of Holland General of the Horse; the rest of the Officers were many of 'em Persons of the best Quality: And the Army in general consisted of the flower of the Nobility, Gentry, and Commonalty of the Nation.

The Earl of Arundel General of the King's Army.

With this Army the King sets out upon the Twenty-seventh of March, and comes by easie Marches within two Miles of Berwick on the Twenty-eighth of May, where he encamp'd: And likewise, about the same time, General Lesley march'd with the Scotch Army to the Borders towards England, and encamp'd at Dunee, within Four Miles of Berwick.

The

The Marquis of Hamilton sent with a Fleet to Leith.

The King, when he began his March, had sent the Marquis of Hamilton with a Fleet of Ships well furnish'd with Soldiers to Leith, to attempt that place, and make what Impression he could in those Parts, to hinder any new Levies, and reduce Edinburgh, Leith, and whatever other Forts and Strengths he could, to Obedience.

He arriv'd in the Month of May with his Fleet in the Road before the Town call'd The Fryth; where, after some stay, he landed some of his Men in a little Island, to give them Breath and some Refreshments; and there he receiv'd a Visit from his Mother, a most rigid Covenanter, which made many of the King's Friends suspect his Integrity; and the Scots which were upon the Shore that saw this, were heard to say, They knew the Son of such a Mother would not do them Hurt.

The Army under Lesley was but ill arm'd, for they had not Three thousand Musquets amongst them; so that though they put a good Face on the Business, they were better prepar'd for a Treaty than a Battel; nevertheless, those of that Nation about the King were not wanting on their part to make the Preparations of their Country-men very terrible: And the Earls of Traquair and Roxborough, and other Noblemen of Scotland, who had Permission to repair to York to the King, as he was on his March, for mediating an Atonement, did so practise upon the English Lords, by their Insinuations, that they mitigated much the Displeasure of some, and quite took off the Edge of others; so that after the King had been a while in his Leaguer, near Berwick, he was very easily dispos'd to receive Overtures from them, to be receiv'd into his Grace and Favour, which they made with great Protestations of their Resolution, upon his gracious Assurance of the preservation of their Religion and Laws, to give Example to others of all Civil and Temporal Obedience which could be requir'd or expected from his loving Subjects.

This produced a Treaty, for which on the King's part were appointed, the Earls of Pembroke, Salisbury, Berkshire, Sir Henry Vane, and Secretary Cook: And for the Scots, the Earls of Roths and Dumferling, the Lord Loudun, the Lord Dowglas, Alexander Henderson, and Archibald Johnston: These having had several Debates, at length (June the Seventeenth) concluded upon a Pacification, which on the King's part was express'd by a Declaration of that date; so much whereof as is pertinent for the better understanding of these Transactions, is here inserted.

A Pacification made by the King and the Scots.

" We are pleas'd to confirm and make " good whatsoever the Marquis of Hamilton,
" our Commissioner, hath granted:
" And, that all Matters Ecclesiastical shall " be determin'd by the Assemblies of the " Kirk, and Matters Civil by the Parlia" ment, and other inferiour Judicatories
" establish'd by Law; which Assembly " shall be kept once a Year, or as shall be " agreed upon by the General Assembly
" and our Commissioner for the Time " being.

" That a Free and General Assembly
" be kept at Edinburgh the Sixth of August
" next, where we intend (God wil" ling) to be personally present; and also " thereafter a Parliament the Twentieth
" of August, and there an Act of Oblivion " to be pass'd: And that, upon their " Disarming and Disbanding of their For" ces, dissolving and discharging all their " pretended Tables and Conventicles, and " restoring to the King all his Castles, " Forts, and Ammunition, as also his " Royal Honours, and to every of his " good Subjects their Liberties, Lands, " Houses, Goods and Means whatsoever,
" taken and detained since the late preten" ded General Assembly; the King will " presently thereafter recall his Fleet, and " retire his Forces, and make restitution
" of their Ships and Goods taken since the " aforesaid time.

The ARTICLES of Pacification were these, the Seventeenth of June, 1639.

- I. THE Forces of Scotland to be disbanded and dissolv'd within Twenty-four Hours after the Agreement of the King's Declaration. Articles of Pacification.
- II. The King's Castles, Forts, and Ammunition to be deliver'd after the said Publication, so soon as he should send to receive the same.
- III. His Ships to depart presently after the delivery of the Castles; and in the mean time no Interruption of Trade.
- IV. All Persons, Goods, and Ships detained by the King since the First of November, to be restored.
- V. No Meetings, Treatings, Consultations, or Convocations of any of the Scots, but such as are warranted by Act of Parliament.
- VI. All Fortifications to desist, and to be remitted to the King's pleasure.

1639. VII. To restore to every one their Liberties, Lands, Houses, Goods, and Means whatsoever, taken and detained from them by whatsoever means since the First of November last.

The King sign'd the Declaration on the Eighteenth of June, and the same Day the Commissioners on each part sign'd the Articles, and the Scots Commissioners subscrib'd a short Declarative Submission in these words :

A declarative Submission subscrib'd by the Scots Commissioners.

" In obedience to His Majesty's Royal Commands, We shall upon Thursday next, the Twentieth of June, dismiss our Forces, and immediately thereafter deliver His Majesty's Castles, &c. and shall ever in all things carry our selves like humble and loyal Subjects.

Roths, Dumferlin, Loudun, Dowglas, Henderson,
Johnston.

The Pacification being thus agreed, the King sent for some of the Scotch Lords, and inform'd them, That he had given Orders to the Marquis of Hamilton to draw off the Fleet, and did intend to be at Edinburgh at the opening of the Assembly, but that he had receiv'd Letters from the Queen, which intimated a Necessity of his Presence at London, about some pressing Affairs, but he would depute the Earl of Traquayr, with full Power and Authority, as his High-Commissioner, to hold the Assembly and the Parliament.

The Earl of Traquayr deputed the King's Commissioner.

Most Men thought these Graces of the King towards his Scotch Subjects would have obliged them to an entire Submission to his Authority, but the Confederates had some further Designs of Trouble : For no sooner was the King's Declaration publish'd, but at that instant they encounter'd it with a Protestation of several Heads.

The Scots Protestation against the King's Declaration.

" First, Of adhering to the late General Assembly at Glasgow, as a Free and General Assembly of the Church, and to all Proceedings there, especially to the Sentence of Deprivation and Excommunication of the Bishops.

" Secondly, Of adhering to their Solemn Covenant, and Declaration of the Assembly, whereby the Office of Bishops is abjured.

1639. " Thirdly, In regard many of the Gentry, and the Ministers, who had long attended at Edinburgh during the discussion of the Pacification, and the Preparatives to it, were to repair to their own Homes, whereby such of them as had Suits depending at Law could not stay at Edinburgh to attend them, they declared, That if any Members of the College of Justice should attend the Session or Term, all their Acts and Sentences of Judgments should be void and ineffectual.

The King could not but resent this Ingratitude, but was forced to temporize, in hopes that at the meeting of the Parliament some moderate Counsels might temper the Minds of the People : He had been so just to those Conditions of Peace which he had granted them, that he immediately discharg'd his Army ; which if he had kept together, or any considerable part of them, until he had seen their Soldiers disbanded, their Officers cashier'd, their Forts and Castles deliver'd up to him, and some good Issue of the Assembly and Parliament to be held at Edinburgh, he had preserv'd his Honour among Foreign Princes, and crush'd those Practices at home which afterward undermined his Peace, and destroy'd his Glories.

The Scots did not punctually perform any one Article ; the Castle of Edinburgh was indeed put under the Command of Sir Patrick Ruthen, by the King's Orders, but they did not slight or demolish their Fortifications at Leith ; they still kept their Officers in Pay, and still continued their Meetings and Consultations, disquieting, molesting, and frightening all of different Inclinations : And, the more to stir up the People, they dispers'd a scandalous Libel, entituled, Some Conditions of His Majesty's Treaty with the Subjects of Scotland before the English Nobility, are set down here for a Remembrance.

The Scots Breach of Articles.

This Paper consisted of eight Heads, which were pretended to be drawn out of Notes taken upon the several Discourses with the King about the matter of his Declaration : This was put into the hands of the Earl of Pembroke, at his coming from Berwick, who pretended not to have read it, but seal'd it up till he had presented it to the King : The Matter of it was very scandalous, and derogatory to the King's Honour ; for all the Substance of the Declaration was so qualified thereby, that the whole Sense and Intention of it was perverted. The King therefore summoned all the English Lords that were privy to these Transactions, to meet in Council, who difdisavow'd any such Consent of His Majesty, as in this Paper was expressed, and therefore both they, and all the rest of the Council became Petitioners to the King, that it might be burnt by the common Hangman, as a false and scandalous Paper; which was done accordingly.

The General Assembly conven'd at Edinburgh.

Upon the Sixth of August (old Stile) The General Assembly conven'd at Edinburgh according to the King's Indiction, and sate till the twenty-fourth: The chief matters that passed, were the Confirmation of the Act of the Assembly at Glasgow, the abolishing Episcopacy, the five Articles of Perth, the High Commission, the Liturgy, and the Book of Canons, and ended with rendering thanks to the King for his Indulgence towards them, in the assent of his Commissioner to their Acts, and assigned another to meet at Aberdeen the next Year, in the Month of July.

The Parliament met again.

The Assembly now ended, the Parliament which was prorogued till the last of August, did again come together: The first four Days produced a high debate about settling their constitution to determine what Estate should supply that of the Bishops now abolish'd, which being at last agreed, they fell upon other matters concerning Rescissory Acts of former Parliaments, and several Consultations tending rather totally to eclipse the King's Regal Power, and to new model his Government, than to reform Abuses; so that he sent an Express to the Earl of Traquair to Prorogue the Parliament again, till the second of June following.

The Lords Dumferlin and Loudon, presenting a Remonstrance to the King without Warrant from his Commissioners, are sent back without Audience.

To this Prorogation they very unwillingly submitted, declaring, that the King had no Power to Prorogue them without their consent; and they appointed some of every of the three Estates to continue in Edinburgh till they had made a Remonstrance thereof to the King, which before the separation they perfected, and the Earl of Dumferlin and the Lord Loudon were sent to present it to him: These coming to the Court without warrant from the King's Commissioner, were sent back again without Audience, and after a while the Commissioner himself comes up to inform the King of the present Condition of Scotland, which being reported to the Council, it was resolved, That the Disobedience of that Nation was not reducible but by force.

And thus matters stood between the King and them about the beginning of December; which, for the better connection of the Relations of that Affair, we have drawn thus far in time; but we must now look a little back to Affairs of England.

The Prince Elector, in July this Year, arrived at the Court of England in prosecution of a design he had got to get the Command of the Army of Duke Bernard Saxe-Weymar lately Dead, which consisted of a gallant number of Swedes, Germans, and other Nations.

The King did like very well of the business, and propos'd it to the French Ambassador, offering, that the Prince should joyn in perpetual League with France, and that he would contribute what he could to his Assistance.

The Ambassador seemed to be very well pleased with the Offer, and told the King, that he doubted not but his Master would approve of it, and that Cardinal Richelieu, the Chief Minister of that State, would be willing to serve the King and the Prince therein; and thereupon he dispatched a Messenger to Paris, to acquaint the French King with the matters: But in the mean while, it was suggested to the King, that Richelieu underhand fomented the Troubles of Scotland, whereby the Conederate Covenanters had been encouraged to Write a Letter to that King for Assistance; so that the reality of Richelieu was so much suspected, that the Prince was advised to go privately thro' France to Duke Bernard's Army, of which it was believed he might by his Appearance easily get the Command. The Prince therefore in November pass'd over to Bullen, and from thence endeavour'd to pass by Disguise through France, but at Lyons he was discovered, and taken Prisoner: And the King of France interpreted this Action of the Prince of no fair Intentions towards him, because it was done in a time of Treaty, so that he was kept under a strict Guard.

The great Business of this Summer was a Sea Fight betwixt the two Navies of Spain and Holland in the Downs, which we shall here insert in the Words of Sir John Pennington, the King's Vice-Admiral, who made this following Narration thereof.

A Sea Fight between the Spaniards and Hollanders.

The Spanish Fleet consisting of near seventy Sail, bound and designed for Dunkirk in Flanders, with a recruit both of Men and Money, met with the Vice-Admiral of the Holland Fleet, having in his Company seventeen small Ships, September the seventh, and entred into a fierce Dispute with them, until the Hollander perceiving himself too weak, got to Windward, sailing along towards Dunkirk, and continually firing their Ordnance to give warning to their Admiral, who lay before that Town with the residue of the Fleet.

In the first Encounter the Hollanders had two Ships sunk, and the next Morning by two of the Clock the Admiral came up, and joyning with the Vice-Admiral between Dover and Calais, they set upon the Spaniards, and continued a very sharp Fight till past Noon, wherein they had much the better, having taken two Galleons, sunk another, and much shattered the rest, though they were but twenty-five Sail to the Spaniards sixty and upwards, and at length forced them upon the English Coast near Dover, where they left them, and bare off for the Coast of France, not willing to attempt any thing against them within the King of England's Liberties.

The Spaniard's being now got, as they thought, under the Lee of England's Protection, began to Plot how to get rid of their bad Neighbours; and the Spanish Resident importuned the King, that he would keep the Hollanders in Subjection two Tydes, that in the interim they might have the opportunity of shipping away for Spain; but the King being in Amity with them both, was resolved to stand Neuter; and whereas the Spaniards had hired some English Ships to transport their Soldiers to Dunkirk, the King upon complaint of the Dutch Ambassador, strictly commanded that none should take in any Spaniards, nor pass beyond Gravesend without License, but the Spaniards and Hollanders Plotting a great while counter the one to the other, the Spaniard at length somewhat outwitted his Enemy, and by a Stratagem in the Night conveyed away Fourteen of the Dunkirk Ships, and in them Four thousand Men.

In the beginning of October, the King sent the Earl of Arundel to the Admiral of Spain, Don Antonio d'Oquendo, desiring him to retreat upon the first fair Wind, because he would not they should Engage within his Seas; but the Wind continued Eastwardly so long (a thing not usual in that Season) that the Hollanders got daily fresh supply from Zealand, so that at length their Fleet was compleated to an hundred Ships, wherewith they encompassed their Enemies within Pistol-shot for four Days: But that which was so long an interview of these two Fleets, at last turned to an Engagement.

On the Eleventh of the same Month, Van Trump, the Dutch Admiral, charged the Spaniards with Cannon and Fireships so furiously, as made them all cut their Cables, and being fifty-three in number, twenty-three ran on shore, and stranded in the Downs, whereof three were burnt, two sunk, and two perished on the shore.

One of these was a great Galleon, the Vice-Admiral of Gallicia, commanded by Don Antonio de Castro, which had fifty-two brass Pieces of Ordnance: The remainder of the twenty-three stranded, and deserted by the Spaniards, were man'd by the English, to save them from the Dutch: The other thirty Spanish Ships under the Command of the Admirals Don Antonio d'Oquendo, and Lopez Admiral of Portugal, went to Sea and kept in close Order until a great Fog fell upon them, when the Dutch taking the Advantage thereof, interposed betwixt the Admirals and their Fleet, and fought them valiantly till the Fog cleared up, when the Admiral of Portugal began to flame, being fired with two Holland Fire-ships, which d'Oquendo perceiving, he presently took his Course towards Dunkirk with the Admiral of that Place, and some few Ships more, for most of the rest were taken. Of these thirty, eleven were sent into Holland, three perished upon the Coast of France, one near Dover, five sunk in the Fight, and only ten escaped.

We are now coming to give the Relation of a new War, which the Restlessness of the Scotch Nation kindled immediately after the late Pacification, the Consequence of which were at last, the utter Subversion of the Church and Monarchy and Laws and Constitution of both the Kingdoms; in which it was observed that none suffered more by the spreading of the Flame, than those by whose breath it was first blown up: For it was this War that after some Time and the Intervention of some Accidents, caused the Summoning of that Parliament, which soon after set itself so violently against the King, as brought on the fatal Civil War, which engaged both Kingdoms in Blood from one End to the other. And when those unreasonable Men, who would not be satisfied with the King's equitable Concessions had by Force brought Him to consent to those which were not so, they found that by pushing on the King's Ruin, they had only brought on their own; and that by subverting Monarchy they had only Paved the Way to the Subversion of Parliaments with it. But upon none did their Retribution more signally fall than upon the Scotch Nation, which blew the first Trumpet of Rebellion; by which they raised a Spirit that in a few Years absolutely conquered, suppressed, and enflamed themselves; till the Time came that Heaven looked with Pity upon both Nations, and Restored at once their former Happiness and Constitutions of Government.

About

1639. About the 19th of November, being the Anniversary Night of the King's Birth-day, a great Part of the Walls of the Castle of Edinburgh fell down, and the King having given Order for the Repair thereof, the Confederate Covenanters would not permit any Materials to be carried in for that Use, which added much to those Resentments which the King had conceived against them, so that Preparations of War went on against them; but the King's Treasure being exhausted by the last Summer's Expedition, he consulted with the Lords of the Council of his Means of Supply, who considering the present Exigence of Affairs, advised the calling of a Parliament, as the best Expedient to assist and strengthen him, both with Money and Counsel: To this the King readily agreed, being ever ('till diverted by the Practice of intemperate Men) a great Lover of Parliaments; and in Compliance with this Advice, a Parliament was intimated to be assembled on the 13th of April. This Resolution was taken the fifth of December, and the Notice given so long before, for two Reasons; first, that the Lord Wentworth, Deputy of Ireland (being lately sent for hither on the Occasion of these Troubles) might in the mean time hold a Parliament in that Kingdom, which he did, and managed so much to the King's Advantage, that an Army of 8000 Horse and Foot were speedily raised, and Money granted to the Parliament there, to keep them in Pay, and furnish them with Ammunition and Arms, and all other Necessaries: Secondly, That by the Reputation of a following Parliament, he might borrow Money, for the carrying on of the War, which could not admit of so much Delay, as is commonly used in those great Councils, in the granting of Subsidies; which last being represented to the Lords of the Council, many of them subscribed to

A Loan for a Loan of great Sums of Money for the King's Assistance. The Deputy of Ireland, being about to return to Ireland, on the Errand before expressed, to give good Example here, first subscribed 20000 l. the Duke of Richmond as much, and most of the Lords (except the Marquess of Hamilton) and likewise the Bishops, and the Judges and Officers, and Dependants of Courts of Judicature, both of the Common and Civil Law, and generally the greatest Part of the Gentry, even the Recufants, contributed according to their Abilities.

The King thus busy in providing against the Scots, they endeavoured to remove the Storm hanging over them, by an humble Address to him, craving Leave to represent to him the State of all their Transactions: The King said, He was accountable by any Subject he had, and would not therefore deny that, which was pretended to be from a whole Kingdom, which he never refused from a private Man.

This Answer being sent, the Earl of Dumfermlin, Lord Lowdon, Sir William Douglass, and Mr. Robert Barkley, attended the King as Commissioners from Scotland; who being admitted, and their Commission examined, it was found, that the two last were not named in nor impowered by it, but the King hoping to gain upon them by Lenity, insisted not thereon.

The King appointed a select Committee of the Council, to hear the Allegations of the Commissioners, as also what could be said by the Earl of Traquayr, touching those Matters, where Things were handled with so much Acrimony, that no good Understanding could be arrived at. And at this very time of their Addresses to the King by Supplication, the Confederates in Scotland acted very different from peaceable Men; for they secured many of the Nobility and Gentry of that Nation, who stood firm to the King, and now again as they had done the last Year, invited and procured to their Service many Commanders from Holland, and other Places: But that which manifested most their bad Intentions to the King, was a Letter written to the Lord Lowdon, subscribed by himself, and several others of the chief Confederates, to the French King, to favour their Proceedings, and grant them his Assistance; of the which the Original came to the King's hands, and being known to be Lowdon's Character, he was therefore committed to the Tower.

Cardinal Richlieu was no small Incendiary in this Difference betwixt the King and Scots; for the King making it always a great Master-piece, to keep the Ballance even betwixt France and Spain, that neither of them being too strong for the other, the Affairs of Christendom might be the evenner poised; he knew the French Design of driving the Spaniard out of Flanders, and the rest of the Netherlands could not be effected, unless the King were imbroiled at Home: So that he sent his Chaplain and Almoner, Mr. Thomas Chamberlayne, a Scotchman, to assist the Confederates in advancing the Business, and to attempt all ways of Exasperation, and not to depart from them, 'till he might return with good News, in this Project. Con also, the Pope's Agent to the Queen, a Scot by Nation, and one Reed of the same Country, were very active, and many Scotch Jesuits, at this time in England, were not idle, and Hamilton's Chaplain had often secret Communication with Con; all which Practices were discovered in a great Part by one Andreas Habernsfield, a Nobleman of Bohemia, then become Physician to the King's Sister, the Palgrave's Relict, who made it also apparent, that many of the Nobility of England, and the chief Favourites at Court (among whom the Earl and Countess of Arundel, Secretary Windebanke, and Endymion Porter) were named to be acquainted, and consenting with their Transactions. To this the King, out of the Bounty of his Nature, gave not much Credit.

On the thirteenth of April the Parliament sat, and the Deputy of Ireland, being not long before created Earl of Strafford, and made Lord Lieutenant of that Realm, was led into the Upper-House by two Noblemen, where he gave an Account of his Service in Ireland, where he had obtained the Grant of four Subsidies for the Maintenance of an Army, as before was hinted. Mr. John Glanvil was chosen Speaker of the House of Commons; and generally the Choice of Members to that House was so good, that great Probabilities were given of a happy Union betwixt the King and this Parliament: But in the midst of this Expectation, some ill Instruments at Court, by their factious Contrivances, undermin'd all; and amongst these, the chiefest Imputation was laid on Sir Henry Vane, the principal Secretary of State, who bore 1640. a Grudge to the Earl of Strafford, for that he had caused himself to be made Baron of Raby, to which he aspired, it being a Mannor granted to him, together with Barny-Castle, from the Crown: And because he saw the Earl very earnest to incline the King to endeavour by all fair Means to gain the Affections of the Commons, out of a Desire to see a good Issue of this Parliament, to the Calling whereof it was generally believed none had more contributed than he had done; he resolved to endeavour that the Parliament should rather be abruptly dissolved, than any good Success be produced by the Earl's Counsels; to effect which, on the one Side Insinuations were made to some, of the Dangers to be feared by the Army raised in Ireland in order to Religion; and to others, of the Justness of the Pretences of the Scots, and the Good that might be obtained by favouring them in this Conjunction; and on the other Side, every thing was represented to the King in the worst Sense, and that so slyly, as no indirect Intentions could be perceived; the Matter of Supply gave a fit Occasion to heighten Discontents: For the King being intent to vindicate his Honour, which he thought to be trampled on by the Insolencies of the Scots, was very earnest in preparing for the War against them; and to enable him therein, he pressed hard for Supplies, and offered to the Commons in Recompence of their Assistance to him, to quit for ever his Claim of Ship-money, which at that time being warranted by a Judgment of all the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber, had as good an Establishment as our Laws could give it. The Commons were somewhat deliberate in this Affair of Money, and first they desired Security from the King for Redress of Grievances, in three Particulars:

The Commons desire Redress of Grievances.

- First, for clearing the Subjects Property.
- Secondly, for Establishment of Religion.
- Thirdly, for the Privileges of Parliament.

The Lords seemed somewhat more sensible of the King's Proposition for Supply, and after many Conferences with the Commons, did at last dispose them to a Compliance; but the Question being in that House asked, how much would serve to answer the present Expectation? Secretary Vane demanded twelve Subsidies, which drew them into such high Debates, that things became desperate, so that on the fourth of May, by an unanimous Consent of the King's Council, he was advised to their Dissolution, and the Parliament was the next Day dissolved.

The Parliament dissolved.

It is said this fatal Action was precipitated upon some Intelligence, that the House of Commons meant to Vote against the War with Scotland, which was suggested, for that the Day before, in the Debates for Money, some Glances had been made at an Inquisition into the Causes of the War, which were improved to draw on that fatal Counsel; and it was likewise reported, that the Marquess of Hamilton was a great Stickler in this Matter, and that he had privately prevailed with the King to dissolve the Parliament before it was proposed in Council, thereby to embroil his Majesty's Affairs the more, that he might confirm the Scots, and distract the English, to work his own Advantages on both.

The Convocation of the Clergy was continued to the 29th of May, and they granted the King a Benevolence of Four Shillings in the Pound, for all their Ecclesiastical Promotions, to be paid for six Years together then next ensuing; but this their Continuance, and the Acts then made by them, were censured and condemned in the following Parliament.

1640. The Convocation of the Clergy grant the King a Benevolence of 4 s. per Pound, for six Years together.

The Dissolution of this Parliament was, by some ill disposed People, wrongfully ascribed to the Advice of the Archbishop of Canterbury, so that on the 9th of May, a Paper was posted upon the Old Exchange, by one John Lilburne, exciting the Apprentices to rise, and rifle his House at Lambeth on Monday following, of which he having Notice, made Provision of some Quantity of Arms and Ammunition for his Defence; and in the dead of the Night of the Day appointed, five hundred of the Rabble beset his House, and strove to force an Entrance, but were repulsed, and made to depart, without doing much more Mischief, than asserting their Anger in seditious Language against him, and breaking the Windows of the House. The next Day, many of them upon Enquiry were apprehended and imprisoned in the White-Lyon Prison in Southwark; but within three Days after, some of their Accomplices got together, and came to the Prison and broke it open, and set them free: Nevertheless, one of the chief imprisoned Ring-leaders was taken, arraigned, condemned, hanged, drawn and quartered on the 21st of May.

The King being disappointed of Supply, by the breaking up of the Parliament, was very industrious to get Money other ways, to go on in the War; to which end, the City of London were sent to for a Loan, and all Knights and Gentlemen, who held Lands in Capite of the King, were summoned to send Men, Horses, and Arms, according to their Abilities: The Citizens pleaded Poverty by want of Trade, and refused to lend, though the City was scarce at any time richer, and the Trade greater: They were luxuriant in Wealth and Ease, by a forty Years Peace, and that made them wanton, and apt to take any Impressions. But that which was supposed at this time to be the Reason of their backwardness, was a Sentence in the Star-Chamber against the City of Londonderry in Ireland, which belonged to the City of London, whereby for some Misdemeanours, their Charter for that Plantation was declared forfeited to the King, and many Fines were imposed upon the Inhabitants planted there. But though the City refused, the Gentry generally afforded their Help to supply the King, and by that Assistance, and other before-mentioned Aids, the King had quickly raised a very good Army, whereof the E. of Northumberland was appointed General, the E. of Strafford Lieutenant-General, and the Lord Conway General of the Horse. Northumberland was sick and could not go, but the King went himself in Person, so soon as the Queen, then great with Child, was delivered of her Son Henry, who was born at Oatlands on the 20th of July: But in the mean time the Army was in their March Northward, and the Lord Conway marched with the Van some Days before the rest could come up; and as he was marching, News was brought that the Scotch Army was marched to Dunee, which was their old Quarter the last Year, not far from Berwick.

The City refuse to lend the King Money.

The Earl of Northumberland appointed General of the King's Army, but falling sick, the King goes himself in Person.

Upon

1640.

Upon this Advice, he was ordered to haste forwards towards Newcastle, but e'er he got thither, fresh Intelligence came, that the Scotch Army was march'd into England on the 20th of August: The King met this Advice in his way to York, and dispatched Orders to Conway, to do what he could to impede their Advance, 'till the Army could come up: Upon this Advice Conway calling his Officers together, the Result was, that they should keep the Pass at Newborne upon Tine, to hinder their possessing of Newcastle, where Sir Jacob Ashley had newly entred with his Regiment, but had not time to make any Fortifications: The King made all the Haste he could, but by that time he reached North-Allerton, about two Day's March on this side of Newcastle, the Lord Conway sent to him an Account of a Defeat of the Forces under his Command, which they had received at Newborne: The substance of which Action was as followeth.

The Lord
Conway's Forces defeated at Newborne.

August the 27th, the Lord Conway upon Information of the March of the Scotch Army, and their Design upon Newcastle, drew up three Thousand Foot, and above twelve Hundred Horse to secure the Pass at Newborne: The Foot he lodged behind a Breast-work newly cast up for that Purpose, and placed the Horse in convenient Posts to be ready to receive the Enemy if they came on. General Lesly marched the greatest Part of his Army that Night to the River-side, and before Morning, planted there nine Pieces of Ordnance, which he covered with Bushes, that they might not be seen by the English; the next Morning he sent a Trumpeter with a Letter to the Lord Conway, desiring Leave therein to pass towards the King with their Petition; to which he returned Answer, he would let a few pass, but not an Army: Lesly then commanded three hundred Horse to advance into the River, whom the Musqueteers from behind the Works so galled, as they were enforced to retire: Lesly then discharged his Cannon upon the English Foot, which so terrified them, that they quickly left their Station, and threw down their Arms, and fled: The Scots Horse encouraged with this Success, plunged into the River, and passed over, and were gallantly received by some of the English Troops commanded by Commissary-General Wilmot, Sir John Digby, Captain Nevil, and Captain Daniel O Neale; but they were so over-powered with Numbers, that they were forced to retreat in Disorder, three hundred of the English being killed and taken in the Encounter. Conway then deserted the Pass, and lets the Scotch Army without any farther Interruption, possess Newcastle, which was a little before quitted by Sir Jacob Ashley, as not at that time Tenable; but he first sunk his Cannon in the River: Conway retreated with his Troops towards York, to which Place the King and the Earl of Strafford, with the rest of the Army were marched before, and there by the Lieutenant-General he was accused of not doing his Duty at Newborne, which he as well as he could excused, but acquitted not himself thereby (in the Opinions of many Men) though Matters proceeded not so far as to a publick Censure judicially upon him.

Whilst the Scotch Army was on their March towards Newcastle, a Party from Berwick marched to Dunee, and drew off some Ordnance which General Lesly had left there, but the Earl of Haddington, who had some Troops near to Guard the Borders, came in so soon upon them, that they were forced to leave them and retreat hastily to Berwick: The Earl a while after with two of his Brothers was smothered in the Ruins of the Castle of Dunglass, which was blown up by an Accident of Fire, that blew up the Magazine, which was done, as the Scotch Writers say, either by Accident, or the Malice of one of the Earl's Pages.

The Scots at their being in England had so formed a way of Intelligence with some of the English Nobility and Gentry, that nothing succeeded well in the Councils or Actions of the King against them, and by this Means they took Courage to invade the Kingdom, which otherwise they durst not have done; and this Treachery was afterwards in the Usurpation of Cromwell, boasted to the Writer of these Papers by Archibald Johnston, then Laird of Warriston, who valued himself to have been the chief Contriver in it, as that which thereby gave the Occasion of Ruin to the Royal Family of the STUARTS. Mr. Frost of Cambridge, afterwards Clerk of the Council of State in the Year 1648, after the Murder of the King, was often employed in Scotland in that Correspondence, and he carried his Letters in a hollow Staff to prevent Discovery, and many others that were in those Intrigues, who are yet alive, and we have Charity to believe never intended to see such sad Effects of their Councils, as afterwards ensued to the subversion of our Government, and the desolation of one of the most flourishing Kingdoms of Europe.

Friends and Favourers

The Scots Confederates, in pursuance of what their Friends in England had agreed, declared in a Pamphlet, published at the Head of their Army, (which was dispersed in London, and many other Places) not to lay down Arms till the Reformed Religion were settled in both Nations upon sure Grounds, and the Causes and Abettors of their present Troubles brought to publick Justice in Parliament; and those Abettors they declared to be the Prelates and their Adherents, but more particularly the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Earl of Stafford: They pretended upon their March into England to take nothing from any of the English but for ready Money or Bonds, but they were no sooner seated in Newcastle, but they seized on four Ships laden with Corn, and imposed a Tax of 350 l. per diem on the Bishoprick of Durham, and 300 l. per diem upon Northumberland, which was more than their whole Kingdom could provide for some Years after, when an English Army had the Power of Scotland, though their Trade was free and greater than it had been many Years before, and when much Money was monthly brought in by the English in Specie, yet could not more than 6000 l. a Month be raised in the whole Kingdom, and that not without the extreamest Rigour.

The King having lost the Occasion of getting a Reputation in Arms, by being perswaded to the last twenty Years Treaty at Berwick, and being now in great Perplexity by the Unfaithfulness of many of those about him, could think of no Expedient so good as to call together the great 1640. great Council of his Peers to advise with them, and therefore Writs were issued to them to assemble at York on the 24th of September, but this was not very well liked by those who favoured the Scots, whose chief Design aim'd at the calling of a Parliament, which they feared the meeting of the Peers might prevent. Wherefore the Earls of Bedford, Hertford, Essex, Warwick, Mouldgrave, Bullingbrook and Bristol, and the Lords Say, Brook, Paget, Mandevile, and the Lord Edward Howard, presented a Petition to the King, representing many great Distempers, and Dangers, threatening the Church and State, and his Royal Person, for the Remedy of which, they advised him to summon a Parliament; and to compose the present War without shedding of Blood.

Many of the Citizens of London who were in Combination with some of these Lords and the Scots, did so influence the Common-Council, that a Petition was framed in the Name of all the Citizens of London, also to the same Purpose as this of the Lords.

The King saw by these Applications, what Endeavours were used to weaken him in the Opinions of his People, and was forced to comply to the necessity of the Time; wherefore he acquainted the Lords, that before the Receipt of their Petition, foreseeing the Danger that threatned himself and the Crown, he had summoned the Peers to consult with them what was fit to be done for his own Honour and Safety of the Kingdom, where they with the rest might offer any thing conduceable to those Ends.

The Scots proceeded Hand in Hand with their Friends in England, in the Substance of a Petition to the King about this Time presented, requesting that a Parliament might be called in England for settling a Peace between the two Nations: They sent the Petition to the Lord Lenerick, Secretary of State for Scotland, who delivered it to the King, but an Answer thereunto was respited to the Meeting of the Peers.

On the 24th of September, the Peers assembled at York, and the King at the Opening of the Assembly spake to them to this Effect: That an Army of Rebels being within the Kingdom, he thought it adviseable according to the Practice of his Predecessors in like Cases to call them together, that with their Advice and Assistance, he and they might proceed jointly to the Chastisement of their Insolencies, and secure him and his good Subjects from their Malice: He said, He had of himself resolved to call a Parliament to meet on the 3d of November next, and in the mean time he desired their Advice on two Points. First what Answer to give to the Petition of the Rebels (for so he now on all Occasions termed the Scots) and in what manner to treat with them: Secondly, how the English Army should be maintained till Supplies from the Parliament might be had.

The Lords entered into Consultations of these Matters, and for their better Information, the King caused a true Relation to be given to them of the state of the whole Business, and upon what Reason and Advices, the unanimous consent of the Privy-Council for this War was guided. After many Debates, to the first Point, they advised the King to a Treaty with the Scots; and to the second, they used their Mediation with the City of London, for a Loan to the King for the present

Support of his Army: A Message was hereupon sent to the Scots, to intimate his Majesty's Consent, that a Treaty should be had at York betwixt him and them. The Scots replied, They held that no Place of Security for their Commissioners, considering that the Lieutenant of Ireland, who had his Residence there, commanded his Majesty's Army, and who proclaimed them Traytors in Ireland before the King had done it in England, and against whom as a chief Incendiary they intended to complain. Hereupon it was concluded that the Treaty should be at Rippon, and the King appointed six Earls, and as many Barons to be Commissioners on his Part, and the Scots nominated as many Noblemen on theirs, and for the better understanding of the state of the Affair, the Earl of Traquayr, the King's late Commissioner in Scotland, was ordered to be present, to give Account as Occasion offered of what had passed in Scotland from the Beginning of the Troubles; the Earl of Bristol managed the Treaty for the English, and the Lord Lowdon for the Scots; the greatest part of the Demands of each side were accorded without great Difficulty: That which seemed hardest to the English, was to consent to the raising of Monies in England for the Scots, having an Army of their own at the same time in being: For the Scots notwithstanding their pretences of coming into England without a Charge to the Nation, had by this time increased their Levies to the Sum of eight hundred and fifty Pounds a Day: Nevertheless, the English Lords willing on any Condition to make Peace, agreed with the Scots; but there were many other Demands of the Scots referred to a further Treaty, which the King consented to be afterwards holden at London. The Articles agreed upon at Rippon, were in Substance, only that a Cessation of Arms should be observed, and all other things left to stand upon the same Foot as before.

The Earl of Montrose having been a while misled by the Confederates, after some time discovered, that notwithstanding their fair Pretences, they had no good Intentions to the King, and was therefore willing to leave their Party; he had in the Army two Regiments of Foot and one of Horse, and there were five or six Regiments amongst his Friends: The first Distaste he took, was a little time after the Pacification, when he perceived the Confederates to make no further Use of it, than to gain time of greater Strength to set up thereby a kind of Arbitrary Despotical Government; but finding the People so infatuated by the speciousness of their Pretences, he was forced to continue his former Vigour in acting with them, that they might have no Jealousy of him, and upon the Advance of the Scottish Army to invade England, he was the first that marched out of the Kingdom at the head of his own Regiment; but during the Treaty at Rippon, he found means to write a Letter to the King, wherein he assured him of his Fidelity, and a most ready Obedience to him: This Letter was by some of the Scotch of the King's Bed-Chamber secretly taken out of his Pocket, and a Copy thereof sent to General Lesly: He presently sends for the Earl to him, and told him he had managed a Correspondence with their Enemies, and that he had known the Heads of Princes tost off for lesser Matters: The Earl required an Instance, and there-1640. thereupon Lesly produced a Copy of his Letter to the King; to which he boldly answered, That he understood not that writing to the King was to hold Intelligence with an Enemy, but rather what became the Duty of a loyal Subject to his Sovereign: This Answer did so amuse the General, that he thought it not at that time convenient to pursue the Business farther, for fear of a Revolt in the Army, wherein Montross had a great Party.

The time now approach'd for the meeting of the Parliament, and great Endeavours were used in many parts of the Kingdom, to have such Persons chosen as shewed their dislike of the Government of the Church, or had been earnest Pretenders for Reformation in former Parliaments.

The Parliament assembled.
The King's Speech.

On the third of November, being the Day pre-fix'd, the Parliament assembled, and the King expressed himself to this Purpose: He declared his earnest desire for the happiness and prosperity of the Kingdom, desiring them, as he promised he would, to lay aside all Prejudice, and he would now clearly and freely put himself upon the Love and Affection of his English Subjects; willing them to consider the best way for the Safety and Security of the Kingdom of England, and in order to it, first to think of the chasing out of the Rebels, (for so he termed the Scots) and next for Satisfaction of their just Grievances, wherein he would heartily concur, that the World might see his Intentions were to make this a glorious and a flourishing Kingdom; freely leaving it to them where to begin; and adding, that it should not be his Fault if this were not a good and happy Parliament; and in the Conclusion he told them, for their better understanding the State of all Affairs, he had commanded my Lord-Keeper to give them a short and free Account of all Matters.

The King having ended, the Lord-Keeper gave them a summary Relation of all things relating to the Scotch Invasion, we will not say Rebellion, for it was ill resented by some considerable Persons, that the King in his Speech had represented them under that Character, whereof he having Notice, told them two Days after, he must needs call them Rebels who had invaded England with an Army.

Great was the Expectation of all People concerning the Success of this Parliament, which was much raised, upon the King's declared Resolution at the opening of it, to concur with them in satisfying all their just Grievances.

The long intermission of Parliaments had produced many Mischiefs and Inconveniencies in the Government, by the Remissness of some, and the Rigour of others in Church and State, which inflamed the Zeal of many good Men of both Houses, at this their meeting, to be very earnest in their Endeavours for the Redress of Grievances, wherein they were very much heightened by some others of the Lords and Commons House, who were in Confederacy with the Scots, and in a kind of Combination to alter the Government of the Church, and therewith to have so much influence on that of the State also, as to gain to themselves Honours and Advancement into Places of Power and Trust: The pursuit of these things, made them exceed the Method and Paths of their Predecessors, and by fomenting Jealousies, countenancing and procuring tumultuous Petitions and Assemblies by Menaces and Force, they often obtained the accomplishment of their Purposes, contriving without Doors in private Meetings, what they designed to prosecute in their Assemblies. Raising of Money by extraordinary Means, when Necessity was the best Argument for so doing, Billeting of Soldiers, Innovations in Matters of Religion, and illegal Imprisonments, were the great Grievances of the Subject now to be redress'd: But the Means used to remove these, engaged the Reformers in process of time in a bloody War, to act over all the same things with greater Excess, demonstrating thereby the extream hazard of intemperate Council.

Success in this War enlarged their Desires, and extended their Ambition, it bred thoughts in them they never thought before, and this was that which drew on the Ruin of the King, and with him for some time the subversion of our Monarchy; for many of those that were in the Beginning most active for Reformation, had not in their prospect the Calamity that ensued, and too late repented the Errors of their former actings, when they could not stem the violence of that Tide, their impetuosity had swell'd to too great a height. These matters will appear more plainly by what follows in the Course of the History, whereof the greatest part as to this King's Reign will be taken up in the Proceedings of this Parliament.

The first weeks Business was in settling the five standing Committees, for Grievances, Religion, Courts of Justice, Trade, and Priviledges in Elections, and in several declamatory Speeches against the exorbitances of Government both in Church and State. A great part whereof were ascribed to the Counsels of the Earl of Strafford, and the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.

Five standing Committees settled.

The Scottish Commissioners were now come to London, in order to the Conclusion of some things undetermined at Rippon: These had many private Conferences with their Friends of the House of Commons; and it was agreed by them, that the Earl should be immediately impeached at his first coming to the House of Peers, for he was not yet come from York, and this they resolved on to prevent, and be before-hand with him in an Impeachment he had ready against Mr. Pym, and some of the leading Members of both Houses, for holding Intelligence with the Scots, which he intended to have offered in the House of Peers as soon as he had taken his Place amongst them: Wherefore those in the Commons House that were concerned, were very industrious in their Designs, and the House had not sat many Days before he was therein declared to be guilty of High Treason, and a secret Committee of five more nominated to collect Matter for Impeachment against him: This was like to take up more time than the Prosecutors could with convenience to themselves allow of, so that the House were prevailed with, upon Assertions of particular Persons, to vote, that a general Impeachment of High-Treason should be made against him to the Lords, to endeavour thereby to have him sequestred from that House. And on the 11th of November Mr. Pym was sent from the Commons to the Lords with that Impeachment; upon which the Earl was taken into Custody immediately.

The Scottish Commissioners agree with their Friends of the House of Commons to impeach the Earl of Strafford of High-Treason.

The next Day, the Commons considering the great Pressures of the Northern Counties by the 1640. two Armies that lay upon them, resolved that a hundred thousand Pounds should be forthwith raised for their Maintenance, and till it could be regularly levied, a hundred thousand Pounds was borrowed in the City upon the Credit of some of the Members of the House of Commons: Many Petitions from all Parts were brought to them for redress of Grievances, and to be relieved against Orders and Decrees of the Council Table, Star-Chamber, and High Commission Court, which were referred to several Committees, and divers were ordered to be enlarged out of Prison upon these Petitions, especially Pryn, Burton, and Bastwick, who seemed more eminent than the rest of the Sufferers; and a while after by the Intercession of the Lords with the King, the Bishop of Lincoln also was freed from his Imprisonment in the Tower.

The King willing to be rid of the Scottish Army, hastened the Commission to the Lords who were employed in the Treaty at Rippon, or any ten of them, to treat with the Scottish Commissioners, or any seven of them, being the Earls of Rothefs and Dumfermlin, John Lord Lowdon, Sir Patrick Hepburn, Sir William Douglas, William Drummond, John Smith Bayliff of Edinburgh, Alexander Henderson, and Archibald Johnston, to take into Consideration their Demands, and compose all Differences arising thereupon, which Commission was passed under the Great Seal of England on the 23d of November, and in a while after, the Scots presented their Demands, which were eight in number, and afterwards they put in seventeen Heads, wherein One, (and that not the least considerable) was, That some Scottish Men of Respect might be in Places of Trust about the King, Queen, and Prince: This was that which all their Pretences aimed at, notwithstanding their Zeal to Reformation of Religion; and though all they desired else was granted, they never attained their Ends in this, for the Troubles which they raised, did not only bring after them a Misery to this Nation, but theirs also, and the Ring-leaders of them wanted not their Part thereof.

Sir Francis Windebanke, Secretary of State, was aimed at as one of the great Delinquents in the Opinion of the Parliament, being one suspected in his Religion, a great favourer of Priests of the Romish Church; for whom he had obtained many Reprieves, and was thought to be guilty of Misdemeanours of a higher Nature: But he thinking himself not sufficiently provided to ride out the approaching Storm, made his Escape into France, where he died a Roman Catholic.

In the Consideration of Grievances, the Charge imposed upon the Subject for providing and furnishing of Ships, and the Assessments for raising Money for that Purpose, commonly called Ship-money, are voted by both Houses to be against the Laws of the Realm, and all proceedings in the Case both at the Council Table, Star-Chamber, and Courts of Justice, declared null and void. This was thought a strange way of proceeding: First, because all the Judges had subscribed unanimously to the Lawfulness of it in time of Danger, in which Danger the King was declared to be Judge: Secondly, because being brought to a publick Test, after it had been argued by Council on both sides in the Courts of Justice, and by all the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber, they passed a definitive Sentence for it on the behalf of the King: Thirdly, because the Votes of the Houses of Parliament were passed without hearing the King's Council, or calling the Judges to shew the Reasons of their Opinions: And fourthly, because the Arguments of Justice Crook and Justice Hutton, for the Illegality thereof, were ordered to be put in Print, and those of the other Judges for the Legality of it, suppressed: But those Votes were not by the Makers of them deemed a sufficient Security against imposing the like Charge for the Future, but they took in the King's Aid to an Act of Parliament for the Confirmation of them. And they now began to consider of a Charge of High Treason against the Lord Keeper Finch, and the Judges: In the first whereof they made some Expedition, but more deliberate in that of the Judges, being willing to keep a Rod over them, that nothing should be declared for Law against their Intentions: This Debate of the Ship-money led them to consider of the first Occasion of the raising of it, which was because the Parliament immediately preceeding the last, was dissolved without those Supplies the King expected from them; and from hence they were led into an Enquiry of several Violations of the Privileges of Parliament, by the Commitment of divers Members, and a Judgment against them in the King's Bench: And then all the Inconveniencies were summ'd up that happened by the long Intermision of Parliaments; to provide against which, they resolved of a Bill for a Triennial Parliament. These Debates took up many Days: But in the meantime, whilst these Consultations were had for a Reformation of the Civil State, the Scottish Commissioners and their Friends were not idle in their Endeavours, to reform or alter the Ecclesiastical State: In order whereunto, many Petitions from all Places were delivered to the House of Commons against Ecclesiastical Discipline, the Ceremonies of the Church, and the Government of it by Bishops, amongst which, one was presented by Alderman Pennington, subscribed by fifteen hundred Citizens of London.

This Petition was very surprizing to many sober Men in the House of Commons, who were not unwilling to have the Abuses in the Government of the Church reformed, but could not approve of the Alteration of the Government it self, so that after some Debate, the Petition was transmitted to another time; but those who favoured the Business, though they were not successful in it, fell a while after upon another Argument more plausible, which was, an Inspection into the Legality of the late Convocation, which produced this Resolution of the Commons.

That the Clergy in a Synod or Convocation hath no Power to make Canons, Constitutions or Laws Ecclesiastical, to bind either Laity or Clergy without a Parliament: And that the Canons are against the fundamental Laws of this Realm, against the King's Prerogative, Property of the Subjects, the Right of Parliaments, and do tend to Faction and Sedition.

The Clergy of this Convocation thought themselves hardly used in these Votes, who thought

The Illegality of the late Convocation resolved upon, and their Canons and Constitutions voted down.

1640. thought to have been called by themselves or their Council to have justified their Proceedings, alledging that it was never known before, that the Convocation had dependance upon the Parliament, either in the calling or dissolving of it, nor in the Confirmation and Authorising of the Acts thereof, but only on the King himself, as appears by the Statute made in the 26th of Henry the Eighth, and the constant Practice ever since; and it is certain, that before the Canons were subscribed they were imparted to the King, and by him communicated to the Lords of the Privy-Council, the Judges, and the King's Council learned in the Laws of this Realm, being then attending: In the Hearing of all which they were read, and by all approved, which had been strange, if any thing tending to Faction and Sedition, or to the Diminution of the Subjects Property, and the King's Prerogative; or otherwise against the known Laws of the Land, had been found in them: But the Reputation of the Commons was at this time so great, it was not safe for any to dispute their Actions. The very same Day that the Canons were thus voted down, the Scots Commissioners had presented a Paper to the Parliament, wherein they named the Archbishop of Canterbury an Incendiary, and promised to bring in a Complaint against him the Morrow after. This produced an Order in the House of Commons for a Committee to draw up a Charge against him; but the Scots failing to bring in their Complaint the next Day, Mr. Hollis the Day after, was sent up to the Lords from the Commons, with a general Impeachment of High Treason against him, praying that he might be sequestred from Parliament, and in a few Days they would resort to them, with the particular Ground of their Accusation. Immediately upon this, the Scots Commissioners sent in their Charge, upon reading whereof, he was committed to the Custody of the Usher of the Black Rod, where he continued ten Weeks before any particular Charge was brought against him. The Lord Keeper Finch was the next great Delinquent against whom the Commons designed to proceed, whereof he having gained Intelligence, he moved by his Friends in that House, that he might be permitted to clear himself before them of several Imputations that lay upon him; which the Commons agreed to, and on the 21st of December, he made an elegant and quaint Oration, tending to the Vindication of himself in every Particular; but notwithstanding all that he could say, they voted him that very Day a Traytor, upon these Considerations.

Lord Keeper Finch voted a Traytor.

1. For refusing to read the Remonstrance against the Lord Treasurer Weston, 4 Caroli, when the Parliament desired it.
2. For soliciting, perswading, and threatening the Judges to deliver their Opinion for the Levying of Ship-Money.
3. For several illegal Actions in Forest-Matters.
4. For ill Offices done in moving the King to dissolve the last Parliament, and causing His Majesty's Declaration thereupon to be put forth.

The next Day he was accused before the Lords; but he wisely withdrew himself into Holland, and thereby escaped the Danger that threatned him, and a while after, Sir Edward Littleton was made Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England in his Place.

The King having been some time in Treaty with the Dutch Embassador, for a Match betwixt the young Prince of Orange and the Lady Mary his Daughter, before he would make any Conclusion therein, thought fit to communicate the same to the Lords in Parliament, which he did on the 10th of February; and the Lords communicated this favourable Proposition of the King's to the Commons, who received it very well.

A Match proposed between the Prince of Orange and the Lady Mary, approved by the Parliament.

About this time, or a few Days before, the particular Charge against the Earl of Strafford was brought up to the Lords by Mr. Pym, under 28 Articles. They had a little while before exhibited some general Articles, to which he could not be forced to answer; but upon this Impeachment, the Lords required him to answer to the whole; and though the Charge was very long, yet were the Commons so pressing for his Answer, that by the 24th of February he delivered it to the Lords, and it was read in the House, the King being present.

A particular Charge brought by Mr. Pym against the Earl of Strafford, whereupon he is committed to the Tower.

The Bill for Triennial Parliaments having passed both Houses, was on the 16th of February offered to the King; it was entituled, An Act for the preventing Inconveniencies happening by the long Intermission of Parliaments: And at the same time the Commons presented an Act for the Relief of his Majesty's Army, and the Northern Parts of the Kingdom, which was a Grant of four entire Subsidies: To both which the King gave his Royal Assent. And the King's Grace in assenting to the first Act, was so pleasing to the Parliament, that upon a Conference with both Houses, it was unanimously agreed to wait upon the King at Whitehall, and return him their humble Thanks; and that Night Bonfires and other Tokens of Joy were made in the City by Order of Parliament.

On the same Day the Charge against the Archbishop of Canterbury was carried from the Commons to the Lords, by Sir Henry Vane the younger, whereupon he was ordered to the Tower; but upon his humble Suit to the Lords, his Commitment was respited till the first of March.

The Archbishop of Canterbury ordered to the Tower.

The Scots Commissioners laboured very much under-hand to introduce their Presbyterian Discipline into the Church of England; and by their Confederates had made an active Party in the House of Commons, who took frequent Occasion of aspersing the Bishops, and in these Debates they spared not Episcopacy. Also the Debate of the forementioned City Petition was now resumed, and many Members spake for the Eradication of the Episcopal Hierarchy, amongst which, Nathaniel Fiennes, the younger Son of the Lord Say, was most vehement; but the Lord Faulkland, the Lord Digby, and many others of great Learning and Integrity, did, by the weight of Reason, so far prevail, that the Order of Episcopacy was yet preserved, tho' their Power was much lessened by a Vote passed in the House of Commons preparatory to a Bill, viz. That no Bishop shall have any Vote in Parliament, nor any Judicial Power in the Star-Chamber, nor bear any Sway in Temporal Affairs, and that no Clergyman shall be in Communion of the Peace.

The Bishops Votes in Parliament voted down.

On

1640. On the 22d of March, the Tryal of the Earl Strafford began with much Solemnity; Scaffolds being built round Westminster-Hall to receive the House of Commons, and a vast Concourse of Spectators; in the midst of which the Peers sat in their Robes, the Earl of Arundel being Lord High Steward. His Charge consisted of eight and twenty Articles, in which some hasty and proud Expressions which had come from him since he was made a Privy-Counsellor; Acts of Passion or Power exercised in Yorkshire, where he was President in a Court erected at York, the Authority of which had been severely felt by the four Northern Counties; Some Projects by way of Monopoly, in which he had been concerned while he was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland: Together with some exorbitant Acts of Authority exercised there, and high and imperious Expressions uttered in Ireland, and in the Privy-Council here, were alledged against him, in order to make out the General Charge of an Endeavour to overthrow the Fundamental Government of the Kingdom, and to introduce an arbitrary Power.

The Earl of Strafford brought to his Tryal.

To rehearse the Particulars of this important Tryal, were over-long for a Work of this kind. It will be sufficient to say that he made his Defence with all imaginable Dexterity; answering this Charge, and evading that with all possible Skill and Eloquence: And though he knew not 'till he came to the Bar, upon what Parts of his Charge they would proceed against him, or what Evidence they would produce against him; he took very little Time to recollect himself, and left nothing unsaid that might make for his own Justification.

The Tryal lasted eighteen Days; during which the Charge was with all possible Zeal and Skill urged against him, by the greatest Men in the House of Commons; but to so little Purpose, that they dared not adventure their Arguments to be laid in the Ballance with those of himself and his Council: So that a more sure way was proposed among them to take away his Life, by bringing in a Bill to attain him of High Treason; which passed in the House of Commons with incredible Facility, there being two hundred Voices for it, and only Fifty Nine against it.

Nevertheless, the Earl's Behaviour and Arguments wrought so, that the Lord Digby, and Mr. Selden, two of his Accusers, voted against the Bill: And the Lord Digby made a notable Speech against it; which much offended those who designed the Death of the Earl. They were so factious in the Pursuit of it, that they took the Names of the Dissenters upon a Division of the House when the Bill passed, and caused them to be dispersed among their Party in the City, who came in great Tumults to Westminster to clamour for Justice; and in the Old Palace-Yard in Westminster, those Dissenters were posted up, to be exposed to the Fury of the ungoverned Multitude, made at this time so mad and violent, that some of them were heard to say, if they could not have the Earl of Strafford's Life, they would have the King's; and in their Paper, they called the moderate Part of the House of Commons, Straffordians.

Obs. of the History of K. Charles pag. 238.

The same Afternoon this Bill of Attainder was carried up to the Lords House, where it rested many Days, and had probably never passed, had not many of the Peers been terrified from coming to the House by the tumultuous Multitude, in whom such Fears and Jealousies were infused by the Artifices of some of the Members of both Houses, that when any Debate was like to be carried against them in either House, they would send for great Numbers of them with Swords and Clubs, who would menace, reproach, and assault such Members as disliked them. But notwithstanding all this Violence of Prosecution, the Lords were much unsatisfied; and so many Scruples were started by them, that a Conference was desired with the Commons to resolve them, and it was agreed, that Oliver St. John, the King's Solicitor, should on the 29th of this Month, give their Lordships an Account in publick in Westminster Hall of the Reasons impelling the House of Commons to proceed by Bill, ordering also that the Earl of Strafford should then be present. Whilst these things were in Agitation, many Consultations were had about raising Money for the paying and disbanding the English and Scotch Armies in the North, and other Matters relating thereunto.

Artifices used to make the Bill pass in the Lords House.

The Commons had voted to give three hundred thousand Pounds to the Scots, as a fit Proportion for Recompence of their Losses and Necessities occasioned by this War, notwithstanding the great Levies made by them for their Subsistence in the Northern Counties: But those that invited them hither, so their own Purposes were effected, cared not into what Extremity the Kingdom was brought, and therefore they gave many Delays to the Scotch Treaty, and to the Disbanding the Armies, and the raising Money for these Ends: And one of them said, They could not yet spare them, that the Sons of Zerviah were too strong for them. But upon a Debate of these Matters in the House of Commons, when many Discourses were made of the Necessities of the Northern Parts, occasioned by the Scotch Army; and one Mr. Gervase Holles, a Burgess for Newborne upon Trent, said, That the best way of paying them was by Arms, to expel them forth of the Kingdom: They took such Offence at his Speech, that they speedily called him to the Bar, and being not satisfied with what he had said there, they expelled him from the House.

The Commons Vote 300000*l.* to the Scots.

Mr. Gervase Holles expelled the House for a Speech concerning the Scotch Army.

These Transactions were carried on with great Heat by a clamorous pretended Necessity of Reformation in Church and State, and the People were perswaded to believe their Religion and Liberties had been lost if the Scots had not interposed at this time: Wherefore that the time of the Armies stay might be prolonged 'till such Alterations in Church and State were made as they designed, all things were urged that might heighten the Jealousies of the People, and at this time many Apprehensions were raised of Danger by the Exercise of Popery, and their Access to the Court, as also of the Continuance of the Army in Ireland: So that a Petition was presented to the King, for three Things touching those Matters:

A Petition presented to the King.

1. For removing all Papists from Court.

2. For 1641. 2. For disarming of them generally throughout the Kingdom.

3. For disbanding the Irish Army.

To all which the King the 28th delivered Answer contractly thus:

The King's Answer to the Petition. For the First, They all knew what legal Trust the Crown hath in that Particular, therefore he shall not need to say any thing to give them Assurance that he shall use it so as there shall be no just Cause of Scandal.

For the Second, He is content it shall be done according to Law.

For the Last, He had entred into Consultation about it, and found many Difficulties therein, and he doth so wish the disbanding of all Armies, as he doth conjure them speedily, and heartily to join with him in disbanding those Two in England.

The Day after the King had given his Answer, the Earl of Strafford, in Pursuance of what was before resolved, was brought into Westminster Hall, before a Committee of both Houses of Parliament, where Mr. St. John did endeavour to satisfy the Lords in the reasonableness of the Bill of Attainder to induce them to pass it; for though their Proofs at the Tryal were insufficient, and nothing but legal Evidence could prevail in Judicature, by this way both Lords and Commons might proceed by the Light of their own Consciences, without any further Proof whatsoever. And so it was expressly affirmed by Mr. St. John in the Speech he then made, wherein he said;

Mr. St. John's Reasons to the Lords for the Bill of Attainder. That although single Testimony might be sufficient to satisfy private Consciences, yet how far it would have been satisfactory in a judicial way where Forms of Law are more to be stood upon, was not so clear; whereas in this way of Bill, private Satisfaction to each Man's Conscience is sufficient, although no Evidence had been given at all.

And towards the Conclusion of what he said, after many Aggravations of the Earl's Offences, tending (as he said) to subvert our Laws; he told them, He that would not have had others to have Law, should not have any himself. It is true (said he) we give Law to Hares and Deer, because they be Beasts of Chase. It was never accounted either Cruelty or foul Play to knock Foxes and Wolves on the Head, as they can be found, because these be Beasts of Prey: The Warrener sets Traps for Powlcats and other Vermin, for Preservation of the Warren.

The Earl's Petition for a Second Hearing denied. Upon the Close of this Speech, the Lords and Commons rose, nor was there a Word spoken but by Mr. St. John, only the Earl by a kind of dumb Eloquence, often holding up his Hands towards Heaven, all along the Speech made his Reply with a deep Silence; and the next Day, he petitioned the Lords to be heard again, alledging, That his Lawyers had not fully spoken at their last Meeting: But this was denied him, and many of the Lords shewed greater Propensity towards the Earl's Condemnation than before; whereof the King being informed, he came the next Day to the House of Peers, and having sent for the House of Commons, he took Notice to them of the Bill then depending; and having cleared the Earl of some things laid to his Charge, he observed to them, that for that Reason he could not in Conscience condemn him of High Treason; and desired them to find some Expedient to help him out of the Strait he was in upon that Account.

This coming of the King, and the Speech then made, relished so ill with the two Houses, that few of them attended on the Solemnities of the next Day, May 2, being Sunday, on which the King's eldest Daughter married to the Prince of Orange; and the next Day, five or six thousand of Apprentices, and other tumultuous Citizens, came down to Westminster, most of them armed with Swords, and demanded of the Lords as they went to the House, Justice and Execution against the Earl of Strafford, and many of them they likewise affronted in their Passage.

The Solemnization of the Marriage of the Prince of Orange and the Lady Mary, eldest Daughter to the King. Tumults at Westminster.

The same Day intimation was given to the House of Commons of Practices upon the English Army, to bring them up to London to awe the Parliament; which was an Artifice used by some leading Men, to add to those Distractions already raised to fill the Minds of the People with Fears and Jealousies, when in truth all that appeared in Reference thereunto, amounted only to this:

Observation being made of the great Tumults about Westminster, which seemed to threaten the Safety of such of the Members of both Houses, as were known not to agree with the Designs of some passionate Men, who countenanced the delivering of Petitions, attended and subscribed by the Hands of many Thousands, against the Laws and established Government of the Kingdom, (which yet seemed to receive some Countenance, and to carry some Authority, as Instances of the Affections of so many Persons) it fell into the Thoughts of some Officers of the Army, of known and publick Affections to their Country, that a Petition of a modest and dutiful Nature from the whole Army, For the composing and settling all Grievances in the Church and State by Law, might for the Reason of it prevail with the whole House, and coming from such a Body, might confirm those, who might be shaken with any Fears of Power, or Force by the Tumults: But even this in the Debate of it had so many intervening Difficulties, that it was laid aside two Months before any Discovery; yet, nevertheless, this Alarm gave Occasion to the Commons immediately to frame a Protestation, which the same Day it was made, was imposed upon all the Members, before they were permitted to go out of the House, and was taken by all of them, except the Lord Digby, and an Uncle of his; and shortly after it was sent to the Lords, and by them taken also: And afterwards, by an Order of the House of Commons, all the Subjects of England were enjoined to take it, under Pain of being thought unfit of bearing any Office either in Church or Commonwealth; to which the Lords would not consent. The Protestation was in these Words:

I A. B. do in the Presence of Almighty God, promise, vow, and protest, to maintain and defend, as far as lawfully I may, with my Life, Power, and Estate, the true Reformed Protestant Religion, expressed in the Doctrine of the Church of England, against all Popery and Popish Innovations within this Realm, contrary to the same Doctrine, and according to the Duty of my Allegiance to his Majesty's

The Protestation taken by both Houses, and the Subjects of England.

1641. jeſty's Royal Perſon, Honour, and Eſtate; as alſo the Power and Privileges of Parliament, the lawful Rights and Liberties of the Subject, and every Perſon that maketh this Proteſtation in whatſoever he ſhall do in the lawful Purſuance of the ſame. And to my Power, and as far as lawfully I may, I will oppoſe, and by all good Ways and Means, endeavour to bring to condign Punishment, all ſuch as ſhall either by Force, Practice, Plots, Counſels and Conſpiracies, or otherwiſe do any thing, to the contrary of any thing in this preſent Proteſtation contained. And further, That I ſhall in all juſt and honourable ways, endeavour to preſerve the Union and Peace between the Three Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland: And neither for Fear, nor other Reſpect, ſhall relinquish this Promise, Vow, and Proteſtation.

How this Proteſtation was obſerved by moſt of them that took it, will be diſcovered hereafter.

On the fifth Day of May, Ground was taken from the great Apprehenſions of the Houſe of Commons, that the Parliament might be diſſolved before Juſtice ſhould be done upon Delinquents, publick Grievances redreſs'd, a firm Peace betwixt England and Scotland concluded; and before Proviſion ſhould be made for the Re-payment of ſuch Monies as ſhould be taken up upon Credit, to answer the immediate Emergencies that were at that time in the State, to debate of the Neceſſity of a Bill for the Continuance of this Parliament, not to be prorogu'd or adjourn'd but by Act of Parliament, in which there was ſuch haſte made, that within two Days after the firſt mention of it, it was paſſed in the Houſe of Commons, and carried up to the Lords, where it ſtaid not long, for the Temptation was too great to let a Bill of this Nature be laid aſide; and in a few Days after it came before them, viz. on Saturday the eighth of May, both that and the Bill of Attainder were paſſed. The Bill of Attainder had a hard Paſſage, of Forty Five preſent, there were Nineteen againſt it; there were many of the Earl's Friends that abſented themſelves for fear of the Tumults, otherwiſe the Suffrages for him had more than counterpois'd the Votes for his Death. The ſame Day they ſent to the King, to deſire Acceſs to him, which was granted; and about four a Clock they attended in the Banqueting-Houſe in White-hall, where after ſome ſtay, theſe two Bills were preſented to him, with a Signification, that the preſent Danger of the Kingdom could not admit of Delay, and therefore they humbly beſought him to give his Royal Aſſent thereunto. The King told them they ſhould expect his Answer on Monday, and ſo they parted from each other.

On the next Day, which was Sunday, the King ſends for the Archbiſhop of Armagh, the Biſhops of London, Durham, Lincoln, and Carlisle, whom he deſired as Caſuiſts to adviſe him, whether in Juſtice he ought to paſs the Bill of Attainder againſt the Earl? All but the Biſhop of Lincoln were very tender in this Affair; the Matters of Fact they ſay he could himſelf beſt judge of, having been preſent at the Tryal; and for the Matter of Law, what was Treason, and what was not, he was to reſt in the Opinion of the Judges, whoſe Office it was to declare the Law, and who were ſworn therein to carry themſelves indifferently betwixt Him and his Subjects; that the King might ſhew Mercy unto him, and pardon his Offence, without any Scruple of Conſcience, they ſaid no Man doubted, if other Reaſons of State did not hinder, of which the major Part deſired to be neither Judges nor Advifers: But the Biſhop of Lincoln went a little farther; he urged the Opinion of the Judges, and the Judgment of the Parliament thereupon, repreſenting the terrible Conſequences of an enraged Multitude, and that no other Expedient could be found out to appeaſe the People. It is not ſaid the King was convinced by any thing ſaid to him at this Conference; but the Motive ſuperior to all, was a Letter he received from the Earl, wherein, with a noble Unconcern for his own Life and Safety, he requeſted of the King to aſſent to the Act for attainting him, in order to eſtabliſh an Agreement between his Maſteſty and his People. A Strain of Generoſity which deſerved a better Fate.

On the next Day in the Morning, he ſigned a Commiſſion to the Earl of Arundel, the Lord Privy-Seal, the Earl of Pembroke, and others, for the paſſing of the two Bills, the one for the Continuation of the Parliament, the other, the Bill of Attainder againſt the Earl of Strafford; than which Conceſſion, never any thing paſſed from him with greater Reluctancy at the preſent, or which he bewailed afterward with greater Remorſe of Conſcience: For thoſe themſelves that framed it, knowing of what dangerous Conſequence it might be hereafter to the Lives and Fortunes of the Subjects, to let ſuch a Precedent remain in Force, a Clause was added to the Bill, that it ſhould not be drawn into Example for the time to come; which becauſe it may ſeem ſtrange to them that know it not, we ſhall here inſert ſo much of the enacting Part thereof, as concerns this Point, (for the Preamble is only a Recital of the Heads of the Accuſation.)

Be it therefore Enacted by the King's moſt excellent Maſteſty, and by the Lords and Commons in this preſent Parliament aſſembled, and by the Authority of the ſame; That the ſaid Earl of Strafford, for the heinous Crimes and Offences aforeſaid, ſhall and be adjudged and attainted of High Treason, and ſhall ſuffer ſuch Pain of Death, and incur ſuch Forfeiture of his Goods and Chattels, Lands, Tenements and Hereditaments, of any Eſtate of Freehold or Inheritance in the ſaid Kingdoms of England and Ireland, which the ſaid Earl, or any other to his Uſe, or in Truſt for him, have or had the firſt Day of the Sitting of this preſent Parliament, or at any time ſince. Provided that no Judge or Judges, Juſtice or Juſtices whatſoever, ſhall adjudge or interpret any Act or Thing to be Treason, nor hear or determine any Treason, nor in any other Manner than he or they ſhould or ought to have done before the making of this Act, and as if this Act had never been made.

Thus have we Treason and no Treason in the ſelf-ſame Action; that being judged Treason in this one Man, which never was to be judged Treason in any other.

What Inducements the King had to paſs this Act, and with what Regret he did it, we have heard;

A Bill for the Continuance of the Parliament paſſed by both Houſes. The Lords alſo paſs the Bill of Attainder.

They preſent both to the King, requeſting his Royal Aſſent.

The King conſults with the Biſhops about the Caſe of the Earl, as to Matter of Conſcience.

The King ſigns a Commiſſion on to paſs the two Bills.

1641. heard; but * who drew him to the other, may be now enquired: Some attribute it to the Lord Say, then Master of the Wards, and one of his Majesty's Privy Council; who, as it is reported, when the King asked him, if a Continuance for seven Years might not serve the turn, made Answer, that he hoped they would dispatch all Business in so many Months; and that if his Majesty passed the Bill, it should be so far from making the Parliament perpetual, that he was confident they would desire to be dissolved before three Years end. But most lay the blame on the Marquess of Hamilton, who by cutting out so much Work for the King in England, doubted not to carry on his Designs in Scotland without Interruption; for it is credibly said, that he did brag much of this Service when he was in that Kingdom, affirming frequently, that he had got a perpetual Parliament for the English, and would procure the like for the Scots before he had done.

The King gives his Royal Assent to the two Acts.

The Lords send to satisfy the King about this Matter.

Although the King signed the Commission for passing of these Acts, yet the Royal Assent was not given to them 'till the 10th of May; and on the next Day the King wrote to the Lords by the Prince of Wales. The Design of the Letter was by way of Request, to move the Houses to consent that the Earl of Strafford's Life should be saved; but on Condition of being a perpetual Prisoner. It was twice read in the House of Peers, who, after Consideration thereof, sent twelve of their Number to the King, to signify to him, That neither of the two Intentions expressed in the Letter, could with Duty in them, or without Danger to his Consort the Queen, be possibly admitted. Which being accomplished, and more Expressions offered, the King suffered no more Words to come from them, but said, That what he intended by his Letter, was with an If, if it may be done without Discontentment to his People. If it cannot be, I say again the same that I wrote, Fiat Justitia.

My other Intention proceeding out of Charity, for a few Days respite, was upon certain Information, that his Estate was so distracted, that it necessarily required some few Days for the settlement thereof.

Whereunto the Lords answered their Purpose was to be suitors to his Majesty for Favour to be shewed to his innocent Children, and if himself had made any Provision for them, that the same might hold. This was well pleasing to his Majesty, who hereupon departed from the Lords. At his Majesty's Departure they offered up into his Hands the Letter it self which he had sent. But he was pleased to say, what I have written to you, I shall be content it be registred by you in your House. In it you see my Mind, I hope you will use it to mine Honour.

Upon Wednesday the 12th of May, the Earl was summoned to his Period: He was conveyed from the Tower by a Court of Guard, formed of the Trained Bands. Before him went the Marshall's Men, next the Sheriffs Officers with Halberds, then the Warders of the Tower, then the Earl's Gentleman-Usher bare-headed, and next him the Earl himself, accompanied with the Primate of Armagh, and others. Upon his first coming forth, being to pass near the Archbishop's Lodgings (who stood at the Window waiting for his approach) he lifted up his Eyes, and spying the Archbishop, bestowed a low Obedience towards him, saying, My Lord, your Prayers, and your Blessing. The Archbishop lift up his Hands, and bestowed both; but overcome with Grief fell to the Ground in a Swoon. The Earl proceeding a little farther, he bowed the second Time, saying, Farewell, my Lord, God protect your Innocency.

Being brought to the Scaffold, he address'd himself to the Lord Primate, in an eloquent and pathetick Speech, protesting his Innocence of any Design against the Constitution; and concluding with the most ardent Wishes and Prayers, for the Happiness and Prosperity of the same in Church and State. This said, he desired all present to assist him in his Prayers, wherein he continued near a quarter of an Hour, then rising up he bade all his Friends farewell, especially by name his Brother Sir George Wentworth, by whom he sent his Love to his Wife, and Blessing to his Children, willing him to charge his Son, never to meddle with the Patrimony of the Church.

Then he address'd himself to the Block, and having prayed a while, he gave the Executioner the Token of his Preparedness, whereat the Headman doing his Office, severed his Head from his Body, at the first stroke. Thus dyed this unfortunate Earl. A Gentleman he was of excellent Endowments, of a happy fluency in Speech, and of a searching and sound Judgment in Counsel, and always faithful to his Master therein. The Scots designing some Alterations in that Kingdom prejudicial to the King's Government there both in Church and State, were opposed therein by him, which made him formidable to them, and they therefore became his mortal Enemies, so that some said, he suffered not so much a Sacrifice to the Scots Revenge, as to their Fear: his Character is expressed by the King his Master, who said, he looked upon the Earl of Strafford, as a Gentleman whose great Abilities might make a Prince rather afraid than ashamed to imploy him in the greatest Affairs of State.

His Children were restored to their Honour and Estates on the Petition of the Lords and Commons; and the Commons were seemingly most favoured therein, to make some recompence to them, or to give Proof to the Nobility (lest they should be scared by the Example) that not so much the Estate as the Man was aimed at.

Though we were enter'd into great Distempers at this time, yet the King was mindful of the Restitution of his Nephew the Elector Palatine, who was to attend the Emperour at a Diet to be held at Ratisbonne, and Sir Thomas Roe was appointed Ambassador from hence, to assist him there, and to add to the Reputation of the Embassy, the Parliament joyned with the King in a Manifesto in the Elector's Behalf; but no Success ensued.

The Parliament now in good Security and Power, began to think themselves concerned to disband both the Armies.

The Scots by the first Cessation, were limited but for a Month, but they having resolved not to part with them, 'till they had procured the Passage of several Laws in agitation, their stay was from time to time enlarged, 'till there were almost 1641. almost nothing left for the King to grant, as by several of the Acts hereafter mentioned may appear.

The Earls of Hartford, Essex, Bedford, Warwick, Lord Say, with some others, made Privy Counsellors.

The Triennial Parliament before spoken of, was a great Concession, for thereby the Power of calling Parliaments, in case of neglect or refusal, was put into the Hands of Sheriffs, and Constables, which every one thought a great Foundation of Confidence betwixt the King and his People: But because many of the Peoples Grievances were conceived to proceed from the great Liberty of the Council-Board, or from some Orders and Directions from them, the King admitted to his Privy-Council, the Earls of Hartford, Essex, Bedford, Warwick, the Lord Viscount Say, and some others, all of them eminently in esteem with the People for their Reputation of Honour and Justice, that no irregularities might be there committed; and divers of the King's most eminent Officers surrendered their Offices to the King, to enable him the better to gratify most of them.

The Lord Treasurer, and other great Officers, resign up their Places.

The Bishop of London's Office of Treasurer, was put into the Hands of five Commissioners; the Earl of Hartford was sworn Governour of the Prince in the room of the Earl of Newcastle; and the Earl of Essex, Lord Chamberlain of the King's Household, in the place of the Earl of Pembroke; the Office of Master of the Wards was resign'd by the Lord Cottington, and conferred on the Lord Say; and the Earl of Leicester was made Lieutenant of Ireland: Having thus begun, the King was resolved to proportion Remedies to all the visible known Diseases of the State by the Advice and Counsel of both Houses of Parliament, making hitherto no Rule to his Concession but their asking: Thus they gain'd from him the abolition of the Star-Chamber, a Court formerly erected by Act of Parliament.

The Star-Chamber abolished.

The High Commission Court put down.

The High Commission Court had proceeded with too much strictness, having so far out-grown the power of Law, that it would not be limited and guided by it, and therefore that Branch of the Statute by which it was erected, was repealed.

Ship-money relinquish'd by the King.

The Writs for Ship-money, and all the proceedings in that Business were by the King's consent adjudged void, and the Judgments, Enrolments, and Entries thereupon vacated and cancell'd, though all the Judges had subscrib'd unanimously to the Lawfulness of it in time of Danger, of which Danger the King was declared to be the Judge; and moreover, being brought to a publick Tryal, after it had been argued by Council on both sides in the Courts of Justice, and by all the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber, there passed a definitive Sentence for it: But this abrogation of Ship-money by a Law was not enough, for Bramston, Trevor, Weston, Davenport, and Crawly, five of the Judges that gave their Opinions for it, were impeached of high Misdemeanours for so doing, and Barkly, another of the Judges, accused of Treason, but no further Prosecution was made therein.

Five of the Judges for Ship-money, impeached of High Misdemeanour, and Barkly accused of Treason.

Several Laws passed by the King for regulating Abuses and disclaiming Privileges.

Under colour of executing the Forest Laws, many had been vexed by Presentments, Fines, and Imprisonments, for Remedy whereof, the King passed a Law, for the Certainty of the Metes, Limits and Bounds of all the Forests in England, with great Provision for the ease of the Subject in that behalf. Likewise he passed a Law against divers Encroachments and Oppressions in the Stanary Courts; and in an Act for granting the Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage to him, in the Preamble thereof, he parted with his Title of Imposing, a Power adjudged good, and exercised by former Kings, and though disputed, never resolved against by Judgment in Parliament. And by an Act for regulating the Office for Clerk of the Market, because the undue Execution thereof had been grievous to many of the People, he consented that no Clerk of the Market of his House should hereafter execute his Office in any Part of the Kingdom, but only within the Verge of the Court, and granted the Execution of that Office, to the Mayors and Bayliffs of Towns Corporate, and to the Lords of Liberties and Franchises; and in an Act obtained from him for Prevention of vexatious Proceedings touching the Order of Knighthood, he absolutely parted with, and discharg'd a Right and Duty as unquestionably due to him by the Law as any Service he could challenge: He parted also with his Propriety in the making of Gun-powder, and consented to an Act, for disclaiming of his Power in impressing Soldiers, enjoyed by all his Predecessors for Defence of his Person and the Realm: But that which chiefly protracted the disbanding of the Armies, was a Bill tender'd to the House of Commons, for the abolishing of Bishops root and branch, but that took no Effect. And now the Treaty between the two Kingdoms being finished, and an Act pass'd for Confirmation thereof, the Armies were suddenly to be disbanded, and for that Purpose the Earl of Holland was made General of the English Army, and for the Payment of them and other Debts of the Kingdom, a Poll-Bill was passed, wherein the whole Kingdom was assessed; every Duke at 100*l.* a Marquess at 80*l.* Earls 60*l.* Viscounts and Barons at 40*l.* Knights of the Bath 30*l.* Knights Batchelors at 20*l.* Esquires 10*l.* and every Gentleman dispending 100*l.* per Annum, 15*l.* and all others of Ability, a competent Proportion; the meanest through the whole Kingdom was not excused under six Pence: As for the 300000*l.* voted to be paid to the Scots towards a Supply of their Losses, it was agreed that 100000*l.* thereof should be paid at Midsummer come Twelve-month, and the other 200000*l.* two years after, which was secured to them by Act of Parliament.

And on the sixth of August both Armies were disbanded, and four Days after, the King began his Journey to Scotland, to settle the Affairs of that Nation, and on the same Day both Houses of Parliament adjourn'd themselves to the 20th of October, and a Committee of the House of Commons consisting of fifty Members, was appointed to sit during the Recess.

The King at his coming into Scotland was received there with great Demonstrations of Affection by the People, and to oblige them to him, he confirmed not only the Articles of the Treaty betwixt the two Nations by Act of Parliament, but all his former Concessions also, and all such things as had been acted by them in their general Assemblies: And likewise the better to please them, he conferred Titles of Honour and Dignity on some, and great Places of Power, Trust, and Profit on others: Amongst these, the Marquess 1641. of Hamilton was made Duke of Hamilton, General Lesly was created Earl of Leven, who was so transported with a Sense of the King's Favour and Bounty to him, that he often protested, and once at Perth upon his Knees in the House of the Earl of Kinnoul, that he would never bear Arms against the King.

A while after the King being at Edinburgh, some Information was given to the Marquesses of Hamilton and Argile, that there was some Design upon their Persons, which made them for some few Days withdraw themselves from the Parliament out of Edinburgh, but their Persons were of such quality and estimation in Scotland, that great Care was taken to discover the ground thereof, and after full Examination by the Parliament, upon the whole, they themselves, and that great Council were satisfied, that the Information first given to them, could not be made good to the Proof of any design to the Danger of their Persons: But the King who was a little reflected on in the first Information, could not conceal his Repentment of this Carriage in Hamilton, and when he delivered to him his Patent of Duke in Parliament (according to the manner of that Nation,) he told him he had not deserved to be mistrusted by him, for he well knew when he was accus'd to him of High Treason, he permitted him even then to lye in his Bed Chamber: This Reproof had no great Impression on the new Duke, though he seem'd outwardly much troubled for having given the King so just a Cause of Displeasure, yet upon the first Report of this Business at London (without staying to hear the Opinion of the Parliament of Scotland, who had fully examin'd it,) strange Interpretations were made upon the Matter as highly and nearly concerning the Peace of England, and a sudden Resolution was taken, first by the Committee during the Recess, and after by the Parliament, to have a Guard for the Defence of London, Westminster, and both Houses of Parliament, which troubled the Minds of the People with the Apprehension of new Danger, when they were so lately freed from the Fears of two Armies.

About the end of October this year, a Rebellion broke out in Ireland, which was carried so close, that no certain Notice was given of the Conspiracy 'till the very Evening before it was to be put in Execution.

The innocent Protestants were upon a sudden dispossessed of their Estates, and the Persons of above 200000 Men, Women and Children, murdered, within the space of one Month, and many of them with exquisite and unheard of Tortures. That which increas'd the Wonder of most Men was, the Consideration that the ancient Hatred which the Irish, (a thing incident to conquered Nations) had born to the English, did now seem to be forgotten: Forty Years of Peace had compacted those two Nations into one Body, and cemented them together by all Conjunctions of Alliance, by Inter-marriages, and Consanguinity, which was in outward Appearance strengthened by frequent Entertainments, and all Kinds of friendly Neighbourhood.

This Design was to be put in Execution on the 23d of October, upon which Day, not only the Castle of Dublin, the Kingdom's chief Magazine, a Storehouse of 10000 Arms at that time, but all other Forts and Magazines in that Kingdom were to be surpriz'd, and all the English and Protestants that joined not with them, to be murdered.

The Seizure of Dublin Castle was prevented by timely discovery of the Plot to the two Lords Justices, by one Owen O Conally of Irish Extract, but a Protestant, which Discovery was but the very Night before that fatal Day, and the Occasion of it very accidental, by one Hugh Mac-Mahon, Grandson to the great Tyrone, a Gentleman of a plentiful Fortune, in the County of Monagan, and one that had been a Lieutenant Colonel in the King of Spain's Service, who trusted this Owen with some Relations concerning it at a Tavern.

Upon which Discovery, Mac-Mahon and the Lord Mac-Guire were presently apprehended by the Lords Justices, and many Conspirators of great Note escaped that Night out of Dublin; so was Dublin saved, that all Ireland might not be lost in one Day. But the horrid Design was past Prevention, as to the general; for the Conspirators were up at the Day fix'd in all Counties round about; and poor English Protestants arrived at Dublin every Day, robbed and spoiled of all they had, relating how their Houses were seized, how Towns and Villages in all Parts were fired, and cruel Outrages committed.

The Lords Justices, Sir William Parsons, and Sir John Burlace taking those Arms which they found in Dublin, and arming whom they could to defend themselves, dispatched Letters to the King in Scotland, and the Earl of Leicester, then chosen Deputy, but staying in England.

It was generally said, the late Insurrection in Scotland, gave the first Encouragement to this in Ireland, and the Pretences were in many of them the same, namely, for Liberty of Conscience, not to have the English Bishops and Liturgy imposed upon them; and these, as those in Scotland, being mighty zealous in their Religion, when once they were possessed with a Possibility of compassing their Designs, executed whatever the impetuous Dictates of Superstition or wicked Exhortation of Priests could infuse into them; in this, exceeding the Actions of the Scots, whose Religion, founded on more pious Principles, instructed them not to such bloody Ways of Propagation of it.

The Lords Justices sent Sir Henry Spotswood to Scotland to the King, with Intelligence of all that happened, and thereupon he sent Sir James Stuart to the Lords of the Privy-Council in Ireland, to acquaint them with his Knowledge and Instructions, and to carry all that Money that his present Store could supply: He moved also the Parliament of Scotland (as being nearest) to a speedy Help, but they excused their Aids, because Ireland was dependent upon the Crown of England; but they said, if the State of England, would use any of their Men for that Service, they would make Propositions in order to it. At the same time likewise he sends Post to the Parliament of England, and a while after Owen O Conally, the first Discoverer of the Plot, brought Letters to London, to the Earl of Leicester, with an Account of it, wherein the Lords Justices desired some Reward might be given to him; upon

The King receives Intelligence of what happened in Ireland, and sends Sir James Stuart with Instructions thither. He moves the Parliament of Scotland for Aid, which they excuse. The Discoverer of the Plot rewarded.

1641. upon the Receipt of which, the Parliament voted him a Gift of five hundred Pounds, and an Annuity of 200*l.* a Year, and at a Conference of both Houses they resolved to consider of the Relief of Ireland, and passed several Votes to that End; but little was done for their Relief, 'till the King returned to London, which was about the end of November.

The Irish to dishearten the English from any Resistance, bragg'd that the Queen was with their Army; that the King would come amongst them with Auxiliary Forces; that they did but maintain his Cause against the Puritans; that they had the King's Commission for what they did (shewing indeed a Patent that themselves had drawn, but thereto was affix'd an old Broad Seal that had been taken from an obsolete Patent out of Farnham Abby by one Plunket, in the Presence of many of their Lords and Priests, as was afterwards attested by the Confession of many). That the Scots were in Confederacy with them, to beget a Faith of which, they abstained for some time, from the Lives and Fortunes of those of that Nation among them.

On the other side, to encourage the Natives of their own Party, they produced fictitious Letters, wherein they were informed from England, that the Parliament had passed an Act, that all the Irish should be compelled to the Protestant Worship; and the Refusers for the first Offence should forfeit all their Goods, for the second, their Estates, and for the third their Lives. Besides, they presented them with the Hopes of Liberty; that the English Yoak should be shaken off; that they would have a King of their own Nation, and that the Goods and Estates of the English should be divided among the Natives.

With these hopes of Spoil and Liberty in the Irish, the Rebellion increased. The Rebels in Ulster, under the Conduct of Sir Phelem Oneal, assisted by Turbeck Oneal, his Brother, Rory Mac-Guire Brother to the Lord Mac-Guire, Philip O'Rely, Mulvere O'Rely, Sir Cannol Mac-Gennes, called Mac-Ruian, and others, had possess themselves of all the strong Places in Ulster, (London-Derry, Colreim, and the Town and Castle of Eniskellen excepted) many Places which the English defended, and they could not either surprize by Treachery, or take by plain Force, they had surrendered to them upon Composition and Articles, which they afterwards most perfidiously broke, butchering and massacring the poor English without Pity or Compassion to Age or Sex, though they still spared the Scottish Plantations in Ulster, because of their Numbers; and likewise for fear of the Scottish Army, so easily to be transported into the North Parts of Ireland, 'till such time as their General Sir Phelem Oneal, (one of the Race of the late bloody Earl of Tyrone, of English Education, a Gentleman of Lincolns-Inn, and a professed Protestant 'till some time before) having gathered together a numerous Rabble of the Natives, who daily flocked in to him, fell upon their Quarters; were though he exercised not that Cruelty upon their Persons which he did upon the English, yet he deprived them both of their Goods and Livings, enforcing many of them to fly away naked to the Scottish Shore; from thence he marched into the English Pale, and in the beginning of November he took Dundalk, and soon after he encamped at Arde within seven Miles of Tredagh.

The King finding his stay in Scotland to be somewhat longer than he expected, that the Business of Ireland might not suffer thereby, referred the whole Business of Ireland to the Parliament of England, who had undertaken the Charge and Management of the War; where-with the Earl of Leicester acquainted the Lords Justices, letting them know further, that they had declared a speedy and vigorous Assistance, and had designed for their present Supply the Sum of 50000*l.* which was to be raised with all convenient Speed.

By this time the Lords of the Council of Ireland had armed as many as they were able, and given Commissions for raising of several Regiments, which were put into the Hands (for the most part) of gallant Men, as their Actions afterwards testified to the World; Sir Charles Coote, an active and valiant Man (who was also made Governour of Dublin) with great speed made up his Regiment out of the poor robbed and stripped English which had fled to Dublin; Sir Henry Tichbourne, a worthy Commander, was dispatched away with a Regiment of Foot, to keep Tredagh from the approaching Rebels; the Lord Lambert, and Sir Thomas Lucas, Captain Armstrong, Captain Yarner, with others, raised many Companies of Soldiers there.

This was done about the middle of November; at which time also the Earl of Ormond with his well armed Troop of Horse came to Dublin; wherewith in a few Days after, he was by a Commission sent from the Earl of Leicester, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, (as likewise by the King's approbation from Scotland signified in a Letter) made Lieutenant General of all the Forces there, who being a Person of great Estate, Credit, and Reputation in that Kingdom, and a Protestant, did very eminent Service against the Rebels.

The Parliament in Prosecution of their great Promises, sent over twenty thousand Pounds in Money, which arrived seasonably at this time, their Treasure being much exhausted, by paying the new Companies they had raised, but with this small Relief they were much encouraged, and very successful Service was performed in divers Places against the Irish, but no Levies of Men were made in England, 'till the King had disclaimed his Power of pressing Soldiers, and thereby laid himself open to those Arms that were afterward raised against him: The first Soldiers they sent, was a Regiment under Sir Simon Harcourt, who arrived in Ireland on the last of December.

Whilst that Kingdom was thus distressed, the King returned out of Scotland into England about the end of November, and was by the City of London, entertained, feasted, and conducted to his Palace at Whitehall, with as pompous Solemnity and costly Expressions of Love and Duty as ever any King of England was, and the chief of them afterward were feasted by him at Hampton-Court, where several of the Aldermen had the Honour of Knighthood conferred upon them: But this little Prospect of Happiness was quickly clouded by a Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom, presented to him at Hampton-Court a few

1641. few Days after his Arrival there, from the House of Commons, which they prepared for him against his coming to London, wherein all the Mistakes and Misfortunes which had happened from the King's first coming to the Crown and before, to that very Hour, were with great Asperity recited.

Most moderate Men wondered at this Carriage towards the King, since he had from the first sitting of the Parliament, denied nothing to them they reasonably asked, and when he went to Scotland it was voiced to all, that he parted a gracious King, from a contented People: And in Scotland he gave so much Satisfaction to that People (though afterwards as appeared by their unfaithfulness they were perverted) that they caused an Act (then in Force) to be published and revived, That it should be detestable and damnable Treason in the highest Degree that could be, for any of the Scots Nation conjunctly or singly to levy Arms, or any Military Forces upon any Pretence whatsoever, without the King's Commission.

An Act published in Scotland against levying Arms without the King's Commission.

A Petition presented with the Remonstrance.

Those in the Parliament of England that were ill disposed to the King's Person and Government (as too many were) were much displeased at these Methods of his, to gain the Affections of his People, and therefore they used all the Endeavours they could, to blast him; and this Remonstrance as an Engine for that Work, was prepared and brought into the House, where the greatest Industry and Skill imaginable was used by private Sollicitations, Threats and Promises, to procure it to pass: The Debate lasted from ten in the Morning till three of the Clock next Morning, so that at last they carried it by eleven Voices, when many of the more aged, and Persons of best Fortunes not accustomed to such Watchings, were wearied out, and many others not daring to provoke the prevailing Faction, left the House: The Consent of the Lords was not asked, for of that they despaired, though some of them were too apt to be seduced: This they presented to the King at Hampton-Court, with a Petition before it, as sharp as the Remonstrance it self; wherein they desired him,

1. To concur with the People for depriving the Bishops of their Votes in Parliament, (for which there was yet no Bill passed.)

2. To employ such People about him as the Parliament might confide: And,

3. Not to alienate any of the forfeited and escheated Lands in Ireland, which should accrue to the Crown by Reason of the Rebellion, and thereupon they promised to undergo the Hazard and Expences of the War, and to apply themselves to such Counsels and Courses, as may support the Royal Estate with Honour and Plenty at home, and with Power and Reputation abroad.

The King receives the Petition.

And desires them not publish to the Remonstrance.

This Petition and strange Remonstrance, was graciously received by the King, from the Hands of the Presenters, who were Members of the Commons House; and he promised to answer to them, but in the mean time desired, that the Remonstrance might not be printed and published to the People: The Thing it self, and the printing any thing of the like Nature, being never heard of by the Direction of the House of Commons 'till this Parliament, it being the first Appeal to the People, and of fatal Consequence both to the King and many of the busy Actors in 1641. this Transaction.

But without giving the King Leisure to answer, special Direction was given for printing the Remonstrance, and equal Care taken for the publishing it in all Places and Parts of the Kingdom: But this did not hinder the King from performing his Promise, to answer their Petition, and vindicate himself from those Aspersions that were published in the Remonstrance, to lessen or blemish his Reputation with the People.

They contrariwise order it to be published in all Parts of the Kingdom. The King answers the Petition, and vindicates himself from the Aspersions of the Remonstrance.

That Part of the Petition, that he would not alienate the forfeited and escheated Lands in Ireland, he did not dislike; he said, it might be a Resolution very fit for him to take (though he doubted whether it were seasonable to take Resolutions of that Nature, before the events of the War were seen) and to all the other Parts, he gave such modest and gracious Replies, (but yet not without some Resentment of their Dealing towards him) that many of the prime Actors were much discontented, to find their Practices so fully discovered, so that they had Recourse to their former perilous Remedy, the Tumults of the Multitude to bring about their next Design.

For the Commons having passed a Bill for disabling all Persons in holy Orders, to exercise any Temporal Jurisdiction or Authority (wherein the Votes of the Bishops in the House of Peers were taken away) when it came to the Lords House, it met with a very cold Reception; but the tumultuous Rabble were so insolent, that they assaulted and evil intreated some of the Peers, even at the Doors of their House, crying out against Bishops, and bending most of their Malice against them, whereby they were deterred from doing their Duty; and afterwards they went to Whitehall, and made a Stand before the Gate in a great Body, saying, they would have no more Porters-Lodge, but would speak with the King when they pleased: And when the Lords at a Conference with the House of Commons, desired they would joyn with them in a Declaration for the suppressing such Tumults, several Speeches were made in Justification of them, Mr. Pym saying, God forbid that the House of Commons should proceed in any way to dishearten People to obtain their just Desires in such a way.

The Tumult upon the Lords slighting the Bill, comes to their House, and clamour against the Bishops. The Commons justify those Tumults.

The Lords having in vain tried this way, appointed, by Advice of the Judges, a Writ to be directed to the Sheriffs and Justices upon divers Statutes to suppress all tumultuous Resort, in Obedience to which, the Justices appointed the Constables and others, to attend about Westminster, to hinder that unlawful Conflux of People; which was no sooner done, but the Constables and Justices of the Peace were sent for by the House of Commons, and the setting forth a Watch was voted to be a Breach of Privilege, and before any Conference with the Lords, by whose Direction that legal Writ issued out, the Watch were discharged, and one of the Justices for doing his Duty, according to that Writ, was sent to the Tower.

The Lords direct a Writ to the Sheriffs and Justices to suppress those Tumults. Whereupon the Constables and Justices are sent for by the Commons.

These licentious and unpunished Tumults, gave Occasion to the Bishops (who could not repair to the House without Danger of their Lives)

1641. Lives) to frame their Petition and Protestation to the King and Peers, which was to this Purpose :

The Bishops Protestation against the Actions of the Parliament.

They protested themselves to abominate all Actions or Opinions tending to Popery, or any malignity against the State; but were willing and ready to perform their Duties in Parliament: But whereas coming to perform that Duty and Service, they have been rudely menaced, affronted, and put in Fear of their Lives by multitudes of People, and can find no Redress or Protection upon Complaint made; they therefore humbly protest before his Majesty and the noble Peers, that saving to themselves all their Rights and Interests of Sitting and Voting in that House at other times, they dare not Sit and Vote in the House of Peers, until his Majesty shall further secure them. And because their Fears are not in vain, but upon true Grounds and Objects, they do in all Duty and Humility therefore protest before his Majesty and the Peers, against all Laws, Orders, Votes, Resolutions and Determinations, as in themselves, null and of none Effect, which in their Absence since the 27th of this Instant, December, 1641. have already passed, as likewise against all such as shall hereafter pass, during this their enforced Absence from the said House. Which Protestation they desired the King to command the Clerk of that House to record.

They are charged with Treason, and committed to the Tower.

The Lords were so much displeased at this Protestation, that immediately at a Conference with the Commons, they declared, it was of dangerous Consequence, and deeply intrinching upon the fundamental Privileges and Being of Parliament; at which the Commons took so great a Heat, that after a little Debate, they passed a Resolution by Vote to accuse them of High Treason, and sent Mr. Glym to the Lords House to impeach them thereof, which caused their Commitment to the Tower, where they continued about four Months.

The King thinking himself at this time unsafe at Whitehall without a Guard, accepted of the Offer of some Gentlemen of the Inns of Court to be a Guard to him, by which Means the Insolency of the Rabble was in some Degree check'd; but they instructed by their Heads, laboured to make it more unsafe to the King, by seeking on this Occasion, to raise the Rage and Jealousy of the whole City against him: For at Midnight there were Cries made in the Streets of London, that all People should arise to their Defence, for the King with his Papists were coming to fire the City, and cut their Throats in their Beds; than which thought nothing were more false, yet it found the Effects of Truth; and the People by such Alarms being terrified from Sleep, the Impressions of those nightly Fears lay long upon their Spirits in the Day, and filled them almost with Madness.

The King upon this, sent a Message to the Common-Council of London, complaining of tumultuous Assemblies of the People from the City daily resorting to Westminster, to the Disturbance of that Place and his Palace at White-hall: But the House of Commons to obviate this, petitioned him for a Guard of Security of their Persons, alledging, That there was a malignant Party bitterly envenomed against them, who did daily gather Strength and Confidence, and were now come to that height of Boldness, as to give out insolent and menacing Speeches against the Parliament itself. It was therefore their humble Desires, that they might have a Guard out of the City, commanded by the Earl of Essex, Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty's Household, of whose Fidelity to the King and Commonwealth no question was ever made.

This Petition was denied by the King; but with a solemn Engagement of himself by the Word of a King, that the Security of all, and every one of them from Violence, was, and ever should be, as much his Care, as the Preservation of himself and his Children; and if this general Assurance would not suffice to remove those Apprehensions, he would command such a Guard to wait upon them, as he would be responsible for to Almighty God.

The King at such time as he was in Scotland, had expostulated with some of the Chiefs among them, touching their coming into England in a hostile Manner, and found, that some who were now leading Men in the Houses of Parliament, had invited them to it: And having furnished himself with sufficient Proofs thereof, he commanded his Attorney General to draw up an Impeachment of High Treason against some of them; that is to say, the Lord Kimbolton a Kimbolton Member of the House of Peers, Denzil Hollis, with five Esq; Sir Arthur Haslerig, Mr. Hambden, Mr. Pym, Members of the House of Commons, appointing him likewise to inform the House of Peers therewith, and with the general charged with High Matters of the Charge: And at the same time he sent a Serjeant at Arms to the House of Commons, to acquaint them that he did accuse, and intend to prosecute the five Members of that House for High Treason, and did require that their Persons might be secured in Custody.

The Articles of their Accusation were to this Purpose:

1. That they had endeavoured to subvert the Government, to deprive the King of his legal Power, and to place on Subjects an arbitrary and tyrannical Power.

2. That they had endeavoured by foul Aspersions upon his Majesty's Government, to alienate the Affections of his People from him.

3. That they endeavoured to draw his late Army from his Obedience, to side with them in traitorous Designs.

4. That they traiterously invited and encouraged a Foreign Power to invade his Majesty's Kingdom of England.

5. That they traiterously endeavoured to subvert the very Rights and Being of Parliament.

6. That they have endeavoured by Force and Terror, to compel the Parliament to join with them in their traitorous Designs, and to that end have actually raised and countenanced Tumults against the King and Parliament.

7. That they have traiterously conspired to levy, and actually have levied War against the King.

The House of Commons did nothing herein, to comply with the King's Intimation to them concerning the accused Members; but when a Serjeant at Arms was sent to arrest their Persons, there came a Countermand from them, by which the

The Commons justify the accused Members.

1641. the Serjeant was deterr'd from doing his Office; for they had Voted, if any Person came to attack them without Order from that House, they might stand upon their Defence, and make Resistance.

The King seeing this Obstruction of Justice, and that Opposition was like to be made, if he proceeded in the ordinary way of Justice, resolved to go himself to the House of Commons, and by a clear Discovery of his Intentions, prevent all seeming Inconveniencies, and in this he was so secret (as he thought) that he discovered it not 'till the very Minute of his going.

The King comes to the House of Commons, to demand the Delivery of the five Members.

He therefore took with him the Palsgrave, (his Nephew) and about an hundred Lords and Gentlemen, and their Followers, and went to the House of Commons; where commanding his Attendance to move no further than the Stairs, to offer no Violence, nor return any uncivil Language to any, although provoked, he himself, with the Palsgrave only, entred the House, and demanded that the accused Persons might be delivered into his Hands, with whom he promised to deal no otherwise than according to Law: But they whom he sought, being before informed, as it is reported, of the King's coming, by the secret Intelligence of the Countess of Carlisle, had forsook the Place, and withdrawn themselves into the City; wherefore the King having renewed his Charge, without Injury to any, immediately departed.

The Commons vote this a Breach of Privilege.

This Act of the King's was Voted by the Commons, a breach of Privilege; and strange Reports and Scandals were raised against him in the City of London, by the Friends of the accused Members; as that he had offered Violence to the House of Commons, and came thither with Force to murder several Members, and used threatening Speeches against the Parliament, with which the City were so possess'd, that unusual Watches were set, and Guards placed in several Places thereof, as if some desperate Attempt or Assault were to be made upon it; and as if all Men were now absolved from the Rules of Obedience, publick Direction is given for drawing down the Train-Bands of the City to Westminster on a Day appointed, to guard and bring in Triumph the Persons accused of High Treason, as such worthy Patriots, that the Commonwealth itself could not subsist, but with Reference to them.

The King removes to Hampton Court.

This coming to the Knowledge of the King, although many gallant and faithful Servants proffered their Service to curb any Insolencies that should be attempted on him; yet was he resolved to withdraw himself, with the Queen and their Children to Hampton Court, to give time for their Jealousies and Rumours to waste and perish. And though the King was not conscious to himself of any Error in his first Proceeding against these Members, remembring that in a Petition from both Houses of Parliament in the beginning of his Reign, in the Case of the Earl Arundel, it was asserted, That in Case of Treason, Felony, and Breach of Peace, Privilege of Parliament doth not extend; yet neither his desisting from the Prosecution of that Impeachment, nor any thing that he could either say or do, would give Satisfaction.

But that nothing might be omitted in him to manifest the Clearness of his Intentions, he sent a Message to the Parliament on the twentieth of 1641. January, wherein, in gracious Expressions he proposed, That since particular Grievances and Distractions were too many, and would be too tedious to be presented by themselves, that they would comprise and digest them into one entire Body, that so both he and themselves might be able to make the more clear Judgment of them: And that it should then appear, by what he would do, how far he hath been from intending or designing any of those things which the too great Fears and Jealousies of some Persons seemed to apprehend; and how ready he would be to equal or exceed the greatest Examples of most indulgent Princes in their Acts of Grace and Favour to the People.

The King's Message to the Parliament.

This Message was received by the Parliament with Thanks, and most People expected very good Effects of it; but the accused Members and their Faction, fearing this good Disposition of the King might put an end to their Empire, cast about all ways how they might obstruct the Settlement of Affairs, and in a Petition to the King on Pretence the better to enable them to discharge their Duties in those Matters, they desired him to raise up to them a sure Ground of Confidence by putting the Tower of London into their Hands, together with the Command of the Royal Navy; as also all the Forts, Castles, and Train Bands of the Kingdom, all which they comprehended under the Name of the Militia: This Petition was ill relished by him, but he concealed his Resentment for some time, and about the midst of February, he and the Queen went to Canterbury with the Princess Mary, and from thence to Dover, and there she embarked herself with her Daughter, and accompanied her to Holland. The King's stay at Canterbury and Dover was not long, nor the Place so remote, but that some Business passed, of which the greatest was, The Bill for taking away the Bishops Votes in Parliament: From Canterbury the King came to Greenwich, and from thence he sent for the Prince of Wales, and the Duke of York, to come to him, to accompany him to York, whither he forthwith went, as to a Place of Safety, where he might better find a way to compose those Differences which now began to embroil the Kingdom.

The Commons Petition the King to have the Militia put into their Hands.

The Queen accompanies the Princess Mary to Holland.

The King removes to York.

The Parliament sent after him in his Journey to York two Petitions for the Militia, one came to him at Theobalds, and the other at Huntington, to both which he gave a Denial; but since they could not have it by his Consent, they took it without it, and both Houses passed it by an Ordinance, and settled it in divers Counties in the Hands of such as they reposed Confidence.

The King looking upon this as the beginning of a War against him, and therefore that he might not be surprized, he issued out several Commissions of Array to Persons of the most eminent Quality, to muster, train, and array the Subjects for Defence of himself and the Kingdom; and because of the Indisposition of the Earl of Northumberland to command the Fleet, the King appointed Sir John Pennington in his Place: But the Parliament by a Message on the 28th of March, disliked of that Choice, and recommended the Earl of Warwick to the King; but this the King would not admit of: Never-

1642. theless they authorized him to command the Fleet, without the King's Consent, and within a few Months they used such Arts, that he became possessed of the whole Navy. At Hull the King had a Magazine of Arms, and Ammunition provided for the late intended War against the Scots, which was laid up there when the Occasion of that War was taken away. Of this Town he intended to possess himself, and to make use of his own Arms and Ammunition for his own Preservation; but coming before the Gates of the Town, he was denied Entrance by Sir John Hotham, who by the Appointment of the House of Commons, had newly taken Charge of that Place.

Sir John Hotham denies the King Entrance into Hull.

He thereupon is proclaimed Traytor. The Parliament justify Sir John Hotham.

The Parliament oppose the King's Intention to go in Person into Ireland.

The King summons the Gentry of Yorkshire to his Assistance.

The King thereupon proclaimed him Traytor, and by Letters to the Parliament, complained to them of the Indignity, and required Satisfaction; but they justified him therein, and sent a Committee of the Lords and Commons to reside there, for the better securing of the Garrison to them, and they gave the Governour Power to raise the Train Bands for his Defence. The King was forced, for the time, to endure this Indignity; but being very intent on subduing the Rebellion of Ireland, he sent a Message to the Parliament to declare his Intention to go thither in Person, and acquainted them with his Purpose in Order thereunto, to raise two thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse in the Counties near Chester, for a Guard to his Person; which was so grateful News to the Lords Justices and Council of Ireland, that they very much rejoiced thereat: But the Parliament were so jealous of any thing that tended to the King's Security, that they resolved to oppose it; but in regard it was a popular Action, they were forced to use Art in it. They shewed many Inconveniencies in the undertaking such a Journey, both in the Hazard of the King's Person, and the Interruption of the Proceedings of Parliament; but the chief Matter was an Apprehension, that hereby the King might have a good Occasion of raising Soldiers for his Defence, against the Designs and Contrivances against him: Wherefore in the Conclusion of their Answer to the King's Message, they declare, That they cannot consent to any Levies, but such as they shall advise and direct, and if any be otherwise raised, they must declare against them.

The King did hereupon decline the levying of Guards and his Journey to Ireland, but reflecting now upon the Affront of Sir John Hotham to him, and hearing that the Parliament against his Consent had raised Guards to themselves, He summoned the Gentry of Yorkshire to a Meeting, and acquainted them, That his Magazine at Hull was going to be taken from him against his Will, the Militia against the Law, and his Consent, put in Execution, and Sir John Hotham's Treason countenanced; so that upon these Considerations, he was resolved to have a Guard to secure his Person, in which he desired their Assistance, that he might be able to protect them, the Laws, and the true Protestant Religion from Violation or Injury.

The King's Desires herein were with great Affection complied with; but the Parliament, upon Notice thereof, declared, That it is against the Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom, that any of the Subjects thereof, should be commanded by the King to attend him at his Pleasure, and that whosoever upon Pretence of his Majesty's Command, shall take up Arms in a warlike Manner, shall be esteemed Disturbers of the Peace, and to be proceeded against accordingly. But this did not terrify the People of Yorkshire from doing their Duty to the King.

The Parliament's Declaration.

The Breach now began to grow very wide, and many Members of both Houses repaired to the King to York, insomuch that in a very short Space, there were more of the Peers at York, than sitting with the Parliament at Westminster.

Many Members of both Houses repair to the King at York.

The Commons, that they might not seem dejected at this time, sent up an Impeachment to the House of Lords, against Nine of those Peers that deserted; that is to say, The Earl of Northampton, the Earl of Devonshire, the Earl of Dover, the Earl of Monmouth, the Lord Howard of Charleton, and the Lord Rich, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors; the Substance whereof was, For that contrary to their Duty, they had deserted their Attendance on the House, absenting themselves after a Vote passed in both Houses, That the King, seduced by wicked Counsel, intended to make War against the Parliament, and that whosoever served or assisted him in that War, was adjudged a Traytor.

The Commons impeach nine of the Peers.

Upon the Impeachment, the House of Peers entered into Debate thereof, and the nine Lords were censured,

The nine Lords censured.

1. Never to sit more as Members of that House.
2. That they should be utterly incapable of any Benefit or Privileges of Parliament, and that they shall suffer Imprisonment during their Pleasure.

Not long after this, the Lord Keeper Littleton sent away the Great Seal to the King, by one Mr. Eliot, who was sent to him for it; and the next Day he himself followed it, and came safe to the King at York: But this Departure of the Seal, put the Parliament to a great Plunge, and they sent (in vain) to intercept it in its Passage.

The Lord Littleton flies to York with the Great Seal.

The King found himself in very good Esteem in the Northern Parts, but he was rather willing to prevent the Effusion of Blood, by any reasonable Accommodation, than engage the Nation in a Civil War: And during his Abode at York, many Messages and Replies to that Purpose passed between him and the Parliament, and at last, that they might not seem altogether averse from Peace, about the beginning of June, they sent a Petition to the King with nineteen Propositions.

The Propositions were,

1. That all the King's Privy Council, Great Officers, and Ministers of State, may be put out, excepting such as the Parliament shall approve, and to assign them an Oath.
2. That all Affairs of State be managed by the Parliament, except such Matters as are transferred by them to the Privy Council, and to be concluded by the major Part of the Nobility under their Hands; the full Number not to exceed fifteen, nor under fifteen: And if any Place fall void in the Interval of Parliament, then the major Part of the

3. That all the Great Officers of the Kingdom shall be chosen with Approbation of Parliament, &c. as before said.

4. The Government and Education of the King's Children by Parliament, &c. ut supra.

5. Their Marriages to be treated and concluded by Parliament, &c.

6. The Laws against Papists, Priests, and others, be executed without Toleration or Dispensation, except by Parliament.

7. No Popish Lord or Peer to have Vote in Parliament, and their Children to be educated in the Protestant Faith.

8. To reform Church Government as the Parliament shall advise.

9. To settle the Militia as the Parliament have Ordered, and for the King to recal all his Declarations published against their Ordinances therein.

10. All Privy Counsellors and Judges to take Oath for Maintenance of the Petition of Right, and other Statutes which shall be made this Parliament.

11. All Officers placed by Parliament to hold their Places quam diu bene se gesserint.

12. All Members of Parliament put out during this time, to be restored again.

13. The Justice of Parliament to pass upon all Delinquents, and they to appear or abide their Censure.

14. The General Pardon to pass with Exceptions, as the Parliament shall advise.

15. All Forts and Castles of the Kingdom to be disposed of by Parliament, ut supra.

16. The King to discharge all his Guards and Forces now in being, and not to raise any other, but in Case of actual Rebellion.

17. The King to enter into a strict Alliance with all Reformed States, for their Assistance to recover the Rights of his Royal Sister and her Princely Issue, to those Dignities and Dominions which belong unto them.

18. To clear the Lord Kimbolton and the five Members, by Act of Parliament.

19. No Peer hereafter to be made, shall sit in Parliament without their Consent.

And these Articles being confirmed, the Parliament engage to make him a happy Prince.

The King shewed great dislike at these Propositions, for indeed they seemed rather calculated to gratify the Ambition of some of those that framed them, than for any other Purpose; and the Answer he gave was more smart than usually his Answers were.

Amongst other things, he told them, That they had, contrary to Law, pressed their Ordinances on the People, wrested from him the Command of the Militia, countenanced the Treason of Hottham, and had directed to the People Invektives against his Government, aspersed him with the favouring of Papists; and with an utter dislike of the Propositions, he protested, that if he were vanquished and a Prisoner, in a worse Condition than any the most unfortunate of his Predecessors had ever been reduced unto, he would never stoop so low, as to grant those Demands, and to make himself of a King of England, a Duke of Venice.

On the 10th of June an Order was made by both Houses of Parliament, for bringing in of Money and Plate to Guildhall for their Service; wherein it was expressed, that whosoever should bring in either Money or Plate, or furnish any with Horse and Arms, should have their Monies repaid with Interest, according to Eight in the Hundred; for which both Houses of Parliament did engage the publick Faith.

The King was not wanting to his own Preservation in the mean time, and to do whatsoever might give Encouragement to the Business he had in hand; and first he assembled all the Peers then at York to attend him, and made to them a short but significant Declaration: In which he promised to require no Obedience from them, that was not warranted by the Laws of the Land; and to defend the Religion and Liberties of the People, and the just Privileges of Parliament: Which Declaration was answered by a loyal Engagement to defend the King, and all National Rights; subscribed by the Peers. To this was added afterwards another Declaration of the King, by which he disclaimed and disavowed any Intention to make War upon the Parliament: Which Declaration of his was attested by the same Lords. These Acts of the King and his Peers being made publick, and dispersed over the Kingdom, did him very great Service.

The King strengthened with some Arms and Ammunition from Holland, from the Endeavours of the Queen, but more strengthened by this Protestation in his Behalf, concerning his Intention of not making War against the Parliament, proceeded in his Business with great Circumspection and indefatigable Industry; and from York he went to Newark, where he made a Speech to the Gentry of Nottinghamshire in a loving and winning way, commending their Affections towards him. Another Speech he made at Lincoln to the Gentry of that County, full of Protections concerning his good Intentions, not only to them, but to the whole Kingdom, and the Laws and Liberties of it; so that within three Weeks both in his own Person, and by his Messengers, with Speeches, Proclamations, and Declarations, he advanced his Business in a wonderful Manner. From Lincoln he removed to York, and from thence to Beverly, from whence he sent a Message to both Houses, and a Proclamation concerning his going to Hull, to take it in, requiring before his Journey that it might be delivered to him: Which they answered with a Petition, praying him to disband all his Forces about Hull, to recal his Commission of Array, dismiss his Guards, and come to his Parliament: At which the King was much displeased; and the Parliament Voted, that an Army should be raised, whereof by the Vote of both Houses the Earl of Essex was chosen General, with whom they protested to live and dye in that Cause; the King had about 3000 Foot, most of them Train Band-men, and 1000 Horse before Hull.

Hotham, upon the King's Advance, having the Advantage of a Spring Tide, drew up the Sluices, and drowned all the Country about the Town.

The

Both Sides make Preparation for War.

The King takes a Journey into Nottinghamshire and Lincolnshire, to win those Places to his Party.

The King resolves to reduce Hull.

The Parliament raise an Army under the Command of the Earl of Essex.

1642. The Parliament took all Care imaginable to supply the Town, which they re-inforced with 500 Soldiers, under the Command of Sir John Meldrum. The King finding so great a Strength to oppose him, and considering the Preciousness of that time which he consumed there without hope of Success, resolved to march away. Some about him, laid the Fault of his not prevailing, upon the Unskillfulness of the Country Captains, and the unexperienced Rawsness of the Soldiers. It was said the King might have sped better, if Sir John Pennington could have brought part of the Navy to his Assistance, to have straitned them by Sea; but that was seized by the Earl of Warwick.

The King leaves Hull.

The Earl of Warwick gets the Command of the Navy.

The Earl of Essex was very busy in raising his Army; the Earl of Bedford was made General of the Horse, Sir John Merrick Major-General of the Army; the Lord Roberts, the Lord St. John, the Lord Rochford, the Lord Gray of Groby, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Mr. Hampden, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Waller, Sir Samuel Luke, Sir Henry Cholmley, and Mr. Grantham, all Members of Parliament, had Commissions for Regiments.

The King in the mean time was not idle, he went to Leicester, where he summoned the Gentry and Freeholders, and by his great Affability won many of them to an Opinion of his Cause; and from thence by the first of August he returns to York, where he summoned the County, and acquainted them with the Parliament's Preparations for a War, and desired their Advice and Assistance; for the Parliament had now published a Declaration for the raising of all Power and Force by Train Bands, or otherwise, to lead against all Traytors and their Adherents that oppose the Parliament, and them to kill and slay as Enemies to the Peace of the Kingdom: And in it they named most of the King's Lord Lieutenants and Commissioners of Array in the several Counties. The King then recommended to them the compleating of a Regiment for the Prince, and that he might not be behind-hand with the Parliament, he publishes a Proclamation, wherein the Earl of Essex was proclaimed a Rebel and Traytor to the King and Crown; and all Colonels and Officers authorized by the Parliament that should not instantly lay down their Arms, were declared guilty of High Treason.

The Earl of Essex, and the rest of the Parliament Commanders proclaimed Rebels by the King.

To obviate this, the Parliament had declared, That whosoever shall return from the King to the Parliament's Army within ten Days after publication, should have Reception and Pardon, excepting Persons impeached of Delinquency or Treason, or such as have been eminent Actors against them; and except the Duke of Richmond, the Earls of Bristol, Cumberland, Newcastle, Rivers, and Carnarvon; the Viscounts Newark and Faulkland, Secretary Nicholas, Eudymion Porter, and Mr. Edward Hyde.

The King hearing the Parliament intended to send an Army Westward, gave Commission under the Great Seal of England, to the Marquess of Hartford, to be his Lieutenant-General within the Counties of Devon, Cornwall, Somerset, Dorset, Wilts, Southampton, Berks, Oxford, Hereford, Monmouth, Radnor, Brecknock, Glamorgan, Carnarvon, Pembroke and Cardigan; and sent to encourage Colonel Goring, who kept Portsmouth at that time for him.

The Preparations were very great on both Sides, and on the 20th of August the King set up his Standard at Nottingham, from whence he sent up a Message to both the Houses, by the Earls of Southampton and Dorset, and Sir John Culpepper, for a Treaty of Peace.

When they came to Westminster, they were not permitted to sit in Parliament, whereof they were Members; nor could the Earl of Southampton (against whom there was least exception) be admitted to deliver it, but it was sent into the House of Peers by the Usher of the Black Rod.

The King sets up his Standard at Nottingham: He sends to treat with the Parliament.

In the Message the King signified,

That observing that many Mistakes had arisen by the Messages, Petitions, and Answers, betwixt him and the two Houses of Parliament, which might be prevented by some other way of Treaty, wherein the Matters in Difference might be more clearly understood, and more freely transacted, he proposed that a certain Number of Persons might be sent and enabled by the Parliament to a Treaty in some indifferent Place, with the like Number authorized by him.

The Parliament answered to this Effect, That until he take down his Standard, and recal those Proclamations and Declarations whereby he declared the Actions of both Houses to be treasonable, and their Persons Traytors, and whereby he had put them and the whole Kingdom out of his Protection, they cannot admit of any such Treaty.

The Parliament's Answer to the King's Message.

The King replied to this, That he never did declare both Houses of Parliament Traytors, or set up his Standard against them, much less to put them and the Kingdom out of his Protection; and to remove all Scruples which might hinder a Treaty, he promised so that a Day be appointed by them for the revoking their Declarations against all Persons as Traytors, or otherwise for assisting him, he would upon the same Day recal his Proclamations and Declarations, and take down his Standard.

The King's Reply.

To this the Parliament answered by Petition, insisting upon their former Request; To recal his Proclamations; concluding, That they can never allow themselves to be ballanced with those Persons about the King, whom they styled Persons of desperate Dispositions and Counsels.

Thus did they contend for some time by Declarations and Proclamations, which proved all fruitless; for the Parliament having in their Power all the King's Revenue, and his Navy, together with the Strength and Riches of the City of London, and great Contributions from them and others of Money and Plate, thought the King's Forces so inconsiderable in respect of theirs, that they despised all the Overtures he made for Peace, or put such Expressions into the Answers they made to them, that he could not with Honour and Safety approve of them.

About the beginning of September, Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, the second and third Sons of the late King of Bohemia, came to offer their Service to the King their Uncle, whom presently King.

Pr. Rupert and Prince Maurice put into Command by the 1642. presently he put into Command. Prince Rupert within a Fortnight after his Arrival commanded a small Party of those Forces which the King had at that time gathered together, with which he marched into divers Parts of Warwickshire, Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire, Worcestershire, and Cheshire, his Forces still increasing as he marched.

The King takes up his Quarters at Shrewsbury. And whilst the Prince was thus active with his Party, the King moved on slowly with those Forces which he had to Shrewsbury, where he intended to Quarter for a time, as a fit Rendezvous for those Troops and Companies he expected from Wales and other adjacent Parts; for those of Denbeigh and Flintshire, and generally all Wales were cordial to him and his Cause.

To Shrewsbury the King caused a Mint to be brought, and there coined all the Plate which he then had, or was then and soon after presented to him; for the University of Cambridge, and many Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others, about that time had sent their Plate to him, and many others had furnished him both with Men, Horses, and Arms; and within a few Days after his coming thither, his Strength, by his Diligence and Address was wonderfully increased, even beyond his own hope; infomuch that before the middle of October, which was about three Weeks after his first coming to Shrewsbury, with a small Body of an Army, he was grown to a Strength consisting of six thousand Foot, three thousand brave Horses, and two thousand Dragoons in one Body, besides what he had in other Parts, of which he gave the chief Command, under himself, to the Earl of Lindsey, and the next to General Rutben, a Scotch Gentleman of great Experience, and Prince Rupert was made General of the Horse, and the next in Command to him was Commissary Wilmot.

Whilst the King and the Parliament were gathering their Forces together, several Parties were employed in divers Parts of the Kingdom; Colonel Goring was besieged in Portsmouth by Sir John Meincles's Regiment of Foot, and the County Trained Bands, with one Troop of Horse; to which Place a Squadron of the Fleet was also sent to straiten it the more, and the Garrison-Soldiers were so practised on, the Governour had no Confidence in them; so that though the Marquess of Hartford hastened to his Relief with some Forces he had newly raised, yet he was necessitated to surrender the Town before he could help him, and had Conditions to be transported in one of the King's Ships to the Brill in Holland, whither he was conveyed accordingly: But the Marquess of Hartford, tho' he could not secure Portsmouth, yet he seized on Sherborne Castle in Dorsetshire, and passed by the Earl of Bedford, (who commanded in those Parts a Party of the Parliament's Troops) and marched over the Severn into Wales, to raise more Forces for the King, giving the Earl a little Brush in his Passage.

The Parliament Army raised under the Earl of Essex, was now grown to a considerable Bulk, consisting of about 16000 Horse and Foot united in one Army, besides Parties abroad: Their general Rendezvous was at Northampton, where the Lord Brook, Lord Roberts, Colonel Hamb- den, and many other of the chief Commanders staid with them, expecting the Presence of the General; and on the 9th of September, he set out of London with great Solemnity. The Parliament sent a Petition to him at Northampton, to be by him presented to the King; the Effect of which was, To entreat his Majesty to withdraw his Presence from those wicked Persons about him, (for so all the King's Party were called by them) and not to mix his Danger with theirs, but that he would return to his Parliament without his Forces, and by their Advice compose the present Distempers.

The Earl of Essex, after he had been at Northampton a while, had increased his Army to the Number of 20000, from whence he marched to Coventry, and from thence to Warwick; and having left some Companies in both those Towns for their Security, he marched away towards Worcester, upon Intelligence that the King himself intended to come thither with his Forces.

Sir John Byron had first entred Worcester for the King, whom Captain Fiennes had endeavoured to dislodge, with some Troops of the Parliament and Country-Volunteers which he had gotten together, with whom he assaulted the Town on the West Side of the Severn, supposing some of Essex's Troops were marching towards the Town on the other Side, (as he was informed by a Spy); but those proved to be a Party of the King's Horse under Prince Rupert, who marched into the Town with 500 Horse, and made Fiennes draw off to a Distance. The Prince had notice that Colonel Sandys with a Regiment of Parliament Horse, together with Captain Hales, Captain Wingate, Captain Fiennes, and Captain Austin, were drawn together to attack him, and thereupon he marched out of the City into a green Meadow near adjoining, and drew up his Men into Battalia: The Passage to the Meadow was through a Lane, where not above four could march a Breast, of which the Prince took the Advantage, and charged them first there, where the Rear could not come up to assist the Van, nor the Van retreat without great Disorder; so that the Prince prevailed. Douglas, Colonel Sandys's Major was slain, and the Colonel's own Cornet; the Colonel himself was desperately wounded, and many of his Soldiers killed, and some slaughter was also made of the Prince's Men.

The Prince after the Fight drew into Worcester, but hearing Essex was marching thither with his whole Army, he went away to Ludlow, twenty Miles from thence; nor was his Intelligence ill, for immediately after the Fight, Essex came to Worcester with his Army, where he lay a Month, and from thence he sent the Earl of Stamford with a Party to Hereford to impede the King's Levies in South Wales, and sent other Forces to possess Gloucester and Bristol. The Parliament began now to apprehend the King's Strength; for many began to appear for him in several Parts of the Kingdom; in Yorkshire and the Northern Parts, the Marquess of Newcastle, the Earl of Cumberland, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Sir Francis Wortly, and many others, had raised many Soldiers, and were so powerful, that the Lord Fairfax, Sir Thomas Fairfax his Son, Sir John Hotham, and his Son Captain Hot- 1642. tham, who had gathered some Men together for the Parliament were not able to appear against them: In Cornwall a Body was framing under Sir Bevil Greenvil and Sir Nicholas Slaving; and Sir Ralph Hopton, a Person of good Conduct and Courage was hastening to them to assist in their Levies, and many others in several Parts of the Kingdom were arming on both sides.

And in Cornwall.

Whilst the Affairs of England were in this military Posture, Ireland was neglected; some few Regiments were sent over from Scotland, and the Earl of Leicester's Regiment under Colonel Monk from England, but in no Proportion to the Necessities of that Kingdom; nevertheless they made many Impressions upon their Enemies into Lemster and Ulster, but Munster was but meanly supplied.

The Title of the Act.

The King had consented to an Act of Parliament before he left London, for the speedy and effectual reducing of the Rebels in his Majesty's Kingdom of Ireland to their due Obedience; wherein several Persons were invited as Adventurers to advance Money for that Service, who were to be repaid in Land for the same, when the Rebels should be subdued, according to the Proportions following: For each Adventure of 200 l. one thousand Acres in Ulster; for three hundred Pounds, one thousand Acres in Conaght; for 450 l. one thousand Acres in Munster; for six hundred Pounds, one thousand Acres in Lemster; all according to the English Measure, and consisting of Meadow, Arable and profitable Pasture; the Bogs, Woods, and barren Mountains being to be cast in, over and above, and to be holden in free and common Socage of the King, as of his Castle of Dublin, and so for greater or lesser Sums; and it is particularly enacted, That no Part of that Money which should be paid in according to the Act, shall be employed to any other Purpose, than the reducing of those Rebels, until they shall be declared to be subdued. The Parliament nevertheless to enable them the better to set out their Army, had diverted 100000 l. of this Money, whereat the King was very much offended, and resented it very sharply in one of his Messages to them; but they answered, that they did intend speedily to repay it, and to recapitulate, did charge the King with intercepting 9000 Suits of Cloaths, with a Chirurgeons Chest, and some draught Horses going into Ireland for the Train of Artillery there; but the Parliament made yet bolder, and made Use of the greatest Part of a Brigade raised under my Lord Wharton and one Colonel Horton, designed for Munster, against the King in a Battle, which was this Year fought, of which hereafter; but by this proceeding on both sides, it was evident they both thought the Security of England more considerable to them than that of Ireland, which could not well subsist without this.

It was now about the middle of October when the King came from Shrewsbury, he marched along by Coventry, and summoned the Town, but by the Example of Hull he was denied Entrance.

The King denied Entrance into Coventry.

Marching on, he came and lay at Southam, being but a small Distance from Effex's Army, from whence he struck a Terror into the City of London it self, for he was then nearer to London than

Effex was, inasmuch that both Houses began to apprehend his Approach, and ordered that the Train-Bands should be speedily raised for a Guard, and some Works for planting of Ordnance in special Places about the City of London and Suburbs, and the Parliament sent twelve Companies to possess and guard Windsor Castle.

The Earl thought it his chief Work to march as near to the King as he could, and on the 22d of October he lodged at Keinton within six Miles of the King, who then lay at one Sir William Chause's House near thereunto, and his Forces lodged at Cropley and Edgecot.

The King the next Morning drew his Army to Edgehill, and Effex intended to rest all Sunday in Keinton, to expect two Regiments of Foot, eleven Troops of Horse, and seven Pieces of Cannon who were a Day's March behind him; but when he heard the King's Army was in the Field, he drew his Army into Battalia, consisting of 12000 Foot in twelve Regiments, and forty Troops of Horse and Dragoons. The King's Army was esteemed about ten thousand Foot, and about 4000 Horse and Dragoons, but most of the Foot were very ill armed. At the bottom of Edgehill, there was a large Plain, called the Vale of the Red Horse, where Effex drew his Army into Battalia, about half Mile distant from the Foot of Edgehill. The main Body of the King's Army was led on by the Earl of Lindsey on Foot, with a Pike in his Hand, Prince Rupert commanded the King's Right-Wing, wherein was the greatest strength of Horse, and General Ruthen, and Commissary Wilmot in the left; the Right-Wing of the Parliament's Horse was commanded by Sir Philip Stapleton, and the Left, which had the greatest Force, by Sir James Ramsey, then Commissary-General; the General himself was in the main Body, and Sir John Meldrum had the Van. The King perceiving the Hedges near the Hill lined by some Musketeers of Effex's Army, sent Major Bostock and Captain Hammond of Sir Lewis Dives his Regiment, down the Hill, to remove them; but in the mean time my Lord of Effex caused three pieces of Cannon to be fired upon the King's Army, which was answered from the King with the like Number, and then the Battle began, and was continued with such Fury, that near six thousand were slain upon the Place; and the Parliament's Army was in great Danger to have been totally ruined that Day, with so absolute a Victory on the King's side, that in all Probability this Blow might have put a Conclusion to the War, if it had not been for a Brigade of fresh Men, which was seasonably brought in under the Command of Hambden to their Relief. This Succour gave Effex's broken Troops time to rally, and put them in a Condition of maintaining the Dispute, which they did with so much Resolution, that it was a long while doubtful what might be the Event of the Battle; 'till in the End Prince Rupert having wholly routed Effex's left Wing, fell in to the Assistance of those Regiments that were over-powered, and secured the Victory to the King's Party, which was before dubious. Those of Quality that were lost of the King's side, were the Earl of Lindsey, the Lord Aubigny, and Sir Edward

at Edgehill.

1642. Edward Verney: Of the Parliament's side many were slain, but there being but few of equal Note in that Service to those of the King's, they are not remembred, only mention is made of the Lord St. John, Col. Charles Essex, and Lieutenant Col. Ramsay; the Lord Willoughby of Eresby, Colonel Vavasor, and Sir Edward Stradling of the King's Party were taken Prisoners: The King's Standard was taken, but regained by Captain Smith, who for that Service was in the Field Knighted Banneret; each Part pretended to the Victory, but it went clearly on the King's side, who though he lost his General, yet he kept the Field, and possess'd the dead Bodies, and rifled all the Waggon and Carriages of the Enemy; and not so only, but he made his Way open to London, which the Earl before endeavoured to hinder, and in his Way, in the very sight, as it were of the Earl of Essex, he took Banbury-Castle, where he had fifteen hundred Arms, and finally entered Triumphantly into Oxford, with no fewer than an hundred and fifty Colours. Amongst the Papers of the Earl of Essex, a Letter was found from one Blake that attended the King and held correspondence with the Enemy, for which he was Tried by a Court Marshal, and condemned and executed betwixt Abington and Oxford.

The Earl after the Battle, marched to Warwick, and left the Country clear to London to the King, and he after a very short stay at Oxford, marched through Abington to Henly, where his Army was two or three Days refreshed, and from thence he made a nearer Approach towards London, and came to Colebrook: In the mean time the Earl of Essex had also marched with his Army nearer to London, and on the 7th of November came himself to Westminster, where he was welcomed by both Houses of Parliament, and had a Present of 5000*l.* given to him.

The Earl of Essex comes to Westminster, and is received with great Honour. The Parliament present a Petition to the King at Colebrook.

Whilst the King was at Colebrook, the Parliament sent a Petition to him by two Peers, and three Commoners, wherein in very humble Terms, they desired his Majesty to stay at some convenient Place not far from London, 'till such time as Committees of Parliament might attend him, with some Propositions for the removal of the present Distempers. The King liked well of this Petition, and sent back the Messengers with a very complying Answer, signifying, that he would reside at his Castle at Windsor, or any other Place, if that should not be liked, 'till such time as Committees might be sent to him: But the same Night that he had dispatched these Messengers, News was brought that Essex had advanced with his Army and the Artillery towards him; and that having possess'd himself of Windsor, Kingston, and Aston, if Brentford were likewise possess'd, the King's Army would be so straitned, that it could neither move nor subsist: Whereupon a Council of War being called, it was resolved that part of the Army should advance, and dispossess the Enemy from Brentford, which was accordingly done, and there was for some time a very sharp Fight, betwixt the King's Forces and those of the Parliament that were there lodged; but the King's Party prevailed, killed the Commander in chief then present, and several others, and took 500 Prisoners, and as many Arms, with 15 pieces of Ordnance, 11 Colours, and store of Ammunition; and the King was resolved the next Day to have marched to London, had not Advice come, that both the Remainder of that Army under Essex, and the Auxiliaries of London, under the Earl of Warwick were drawn up on Turnham-Green to oppose his marching further; whereupon he passed his Troops over Kingston-Bridge to Oatlands, and from thence to Reading, where he left a good Garrison, and marched with his Forces to Oxford.

The Fight at Brentford, in which the King's Party prevailed.

The King marched to Oxford.

The City of London were very much infligated by some Incendiaries upon this Action of the King's, and were wrought on to Petition the Parliament to proceed no further in the Business of Accommodation, for which they had the Thanks of both Houses; though the Parliament in a Message to the King, did confess, that they gave Direction to the Earl of Essex to draw the Army out of London, and that part of it was quartered at Brentford, whilst the Committee was with the King; but they endeavoured to excuse it, by saying, that they sent a Messenger with a Letter to know whether his Majesty intended forbearance of Hostility, who found the Parties in Fight, and could not pass.

The King's Forces in the North became very considerable; the Earl of Newcastle, and the Earl of Cumberland being joyned, made up 8000 Horse and Foot, and their Power daily increased, so that the Lord Fairfax and his Son Sir Thomas, Captain Hotham, Sir Hugh Cholmley, Sir Edward Loftus, Sir Matthew Bointon, Sir Henry Anderson and others, who commanded for the Parliament in these Parts, were ill able to withstand them; and the King's side received a good Addition of Strength in those Parts, by the landing of Colonel Goring at Newcastle with two hundred Commanders from Holland, and other Provisions of War; which made the Lord Fairfax and those with him implore Aid from the Parliament, and they therefore form'd an Association of the Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Cambridge, the Ile of Ely, and the City of Norwich, whereof the Lord Gray of Wark was, by Commission of the Earl of Essex made Commander in chief, with Authority to raise Forces.

Several Counties associate for the Parliament. General King lands with 6000 Arms.

In February, General King a Scotch Commander of great Experience in Military Affairs, came out of Holland, landed at Newcastle, joyned himself with the Earl of Newcastle, and passed to York with 6000 Arms. In the same Month also, the Queen landed from Holland at Burlington-Bay, with great Provision of Arms and Ammunition, and many Commanders of Note in her Retinue, and was conveyed by the Earl of Newcastle to the City of York, to which Place, the Earl of Montrose, and the Lord Ogilby came to her out of Scotland with 120 Horse; and Sir Hugh Cholmley, who had the Government of Scarborough for the Parliament, declared for the King, and presented himself at York with 300 Men to the Queen for his Service: Sir John Hotham also and his Son were at the same time inclin'd to desert the Parliament's Cause, but their Intentions were discovered, and they were both seized upon at Hull, and sent up to London, where they long remained Prisoners in the Tower, before the time of their Trial and Execution.

Sir John Hotham & his Son sent up Prisoners to the Parliament.

The

The Parliament having fortified Gloucester with a good Garrison, thought of enlarging their Quarters towards Oxford, and had in order thereunto drawn a great strength into Cirencester: The King was not well pleased with this neighbourhood, but ordered Prince Rupert with 4000 Horse and Foot, to take the Town, who marching by, as if he intended to attempt Sudeley Castle, (which had been lately before taken by **Massey*), when they expected him not, turn'd his whole Force upon them, and after about an hours Resistance made himself Master of the Place, where he took eleven hundred Prisoners, and three thousand Arms.

The Treaty at Oxford proves ineffectual.

The King was not so exalted by these Successes to be well pleased with a War, that brought so much Calamity to his People, and therefore he proposed a Treaty to the Parliament, to which, after many delays, they consented, and about the beginning of March, the Earl of Northumberland, Mr. Pierpoint, Sir William Ermine, Sir John Holland, and Mr. Bulstrode Whitlock attended him at Oxford, with Propositions of Peace; but though they were such as rather did bescem a conquering than a losing side, yet the King was resolved to treat upon them; howsoever he found the Commissioners so straitned in time, and so tyed to such particular Instructions as the Houses had given them, that nothing could be yielded to, which might conduce to the Composing of the present Distempers; so that after many Messages betwixt London and Oxford, the Parliament sent to their Commissioners to return to London upon the 17th of April; upon which the Earl of Essex immediately advanc'd with his Army to besiege Reading, then a Garrison for the King.

The King, upon the first Notice sent a Supply of 700 Musqueteers to the Town, and some store of Ammunition, but all could not avail to the holding out of the Town against so great an Army, continually supply'd from London with fresh Men, Provisions and Ammunition.

The King therefore, after a while, sent a good Body of Horse and Foot to relieve the Town, who assaulted a quarter of the Parliament's Army at Causum Bridge within a Mile of it, where many of the King's Forces were slain, and forced to retreat; but those in the Garrison were thought to have failed in performance of their Duty, in not drawing out a sufficient Party to have made a Diversion at the same time; but the Failure herein was imputed to Colonel Fielding, then Lieutenant-Governour for Sir Arthur Aston the Governour, who was disabled from Service by a Bruise or Wound he had received in the Siege: So that within 16 Days of Essex's first sitting down before the Town, it was render'd to him upon Terms, but honourable enough, viz. All the Forces to march out in warlike manner, with 50 Carts for Carriage, free Passage to Oxford, the Town to be sav'd from Plunder, and whosoever would, might have Liberty to leave it within six Weeks after.

Reading surrendred to Essex by Colonel Fielding Deputy Governor.

The Town of Reading was infected with a Pestilential Fever when Essex enter'd it, which caused a great Sicknes and Mortality amongst his Soldiers, besides which, they were much discontented for want of Pay, so that when he removed to Causum House to avoid the Infection, many of his Soldiers unanimously disbanded and went away; but tho' he gained nothing by this Town, the murmur at Oxford was great for the losing of it, and Colonel Fielding was accused of Treachery therein, and being found guilty by a Court Marshal, was sentenced to be shot to Death, but by the King's Clemency he was pardoned.

About this time, scarce any County of England was free from the War, and in most places the King's Parties was Victorious; in Warwickshire, Northamptonshire, and Staffordshire, many Encounters pass'd betwixt the King's Forces under Prince Rupert, and the Earl of Northampton of the King's side; and the Lord Brook, Sir John Gell, and Sir William Brereton for the Parliament, by one of which the Earl of Northampton lost his Life, and the Lord Brook was slain before the Town of Litchfield, which was afterward taken by his Soldiers, and again re-taken by Prince Rupert.

The Earl of Northampton routing the Parlia-ments Forces, is himself slain. Litchfield taken by Prince Rupert. Yorkshire subdued by the King's Arms.

In Yorkshire and those more Northern Parts, the Lord Fairfax and his Son did take some Towns, and do more than could be expected from so little Force; but after a while, the whole Country was subdued by the King's Arms, and they were forced into Hull.

The greatest part of Wales was for the King; but to prevent the Increase of his good Fortune, the Earl of Stamford was sent with an Army into the West, where Sir Ralph Hopton, with some Forces of the King's lay before Plymouth, then a Garrison for the Parliament; but upon the Earl's Advance, he drew from thence, and fought, and defeated a great of the Earl's Forces: After this a Truce was betwixt the Earl and Sir Ralph Hopton for twenty Days, and in the mean time Sir George Chudleigh, who had been very active and successful for the Parliament in Devonshire, began to reflect upon his past Actions, and by considering the Pretences of both Parties, resolved with himself, not to hazard his Life and Reputation, but upon what he thought a most just Cause, and hereupon he quitted his side, and joined with the King's Forces.

The Earl of Stamford's Forces defeated by Sir Ralph Hopton.

This additional Strength was very advantageous to the King; for shortly after in a Battle fought at Stratton in Cornwall, the Earl of Stamford was overthrown, and inforced to betake himself to the City of Exeter, whither Sir Ralph and Sir George Chudleigh with the Devonshire and Cornish Forces followed him, and with part of their Troops so straitened it, that they had opportunity to imploy the main Body of their Army in other Service, which with the conjunction of the Marquess of Hartford, who had raised many Regiments, the greatest parts of the West was reduced to the King's Obedience. Bristol was designed to be seized on for the King, about the beginning of May, by one Mr. Robert Yeomans, late Sheriff of the City, and William Yeomans his Brother, with Mr. George Bouchier, and Mr. Edward Dacres, and some others of their Friends, who had Commission from the King to list Forces, and possess themselves of the Town; and for the better enabling them thereunto, Prince Rupert hover'd thereabouts with a Party of 5000 Men: But the raising and listing Party 1642. of Soldiers made the matter so communicative, that it was discovered to the Governor, who caused the four above-mentioned to be seized on, and tryed by a Court-Martial, who condemn'd them all, and Robert Yeomans and Bourchier were on the 30th of May executed; and the like fate happened to some worthy Gentlemen, and other eminent Citizens of London, who intended to have contrived a mean to have put a Period to the present War, by stopping the issues of it in the Fountain, by securing the City of London, and seizing several Members of Parliament. It was detected by one Roe a Servant to Mr. Tomkins, on the last Day of May; the chief Actors were, Mr. Edmund Waller a Member of the House of Commons, Mr. Tomkins, Mr. Chaloner, Mr. Hassell, Mr. White and Mr. Blinkorne, who were to be strengthened in their Endeavours by the King's Commission of Array brought to London privately by the Lady Aubigny; but upon this Detection, all was blasted, and the Persons before-named, were all tryed by a Court-Martial at Guildhall, and condemned, whereof Mr. Tomkins and Mr. Chaloner were on the 5th of July executed; Mr. Waller after a Years Imprisonment in the Tower, paid a Fine of ten thousand Pounds, and was for ten Years banished into France.

Yeomans and Bourchier executed at Bristol, for endeavouring to seize the Town for the King. The like happened to several Gentlemen and Citizens of London, for a Design laid to seize it.

Essex marches towards Oxford.

Hambden and Sheffield routed by Prince Rupert.

Sir William Waller about the time of Edgehill Fight, had received a Commission to be Colonel of a Regiment of Horse, and had gained a great Reputation with the Parliament and the City of London, for some Service he did that Winter with Colonel Urry, Colonel Brown, and some others in the taking of Chichester, and hindring Levies for the King in Sussex, so that he was furnished with an Army this Spring, with which he did many acceptable Services to his Party in Wiltshire, Gloucestershire, Monmouth, and Herefordshire, wherein he took many Towns possessed by the King's Soldiers, and was very successful; but whilst he was active in those Parts, the Parliament pressed the Earl of Essex to march towards Oxford to straiten that Garrison, and take some Order by the Conjunction of the Forces of the Associates, to hinder Prince Rupert joining with the Queen: In Prosecution whereof, he marched with his Army to those Parts of Buckinghamshire, which were nearest to Oxford, and settled his head Quarters at Thame. Upon his coming thither, the Weather was very unreasonable, and great Rains fell, so that the Soldiers became very weak and sickly, and much Mortality ensued; but to put a good Face upon his Condition, he frequently sent out Parties upon several Occasions, though little or no Service was at any time performed by them: But about the Sixteenth of June, Intelligence came to Oxford, that a great Party of Parliamenters was then quartered at Postcombe and Chimer in Oxfordshire towards Thame, and Prince Rupert drew out a good Party to attack them in their Quarters, which he did, and took many Prisoners: But upon the Alarm, Colonel Hambden, with Sheffield, and others of Essex's Army, drew into Chalgrove-Field, with a Design to fight the Prince, where he drew towards them, and after a brisk Charge or two, he routed them, and took many Prisoners, and Horses and Arms, and killed many. Major Gunter was shot dead upon the Place, and Colonel Sheffield and Mr. Hamb-den were both very much wounded, of which the last died three or four Days after; it being observed, that he received his Wounds in that Field where he first executed the Parliament's Commission for the Militia against the King's Authority. Upon this Affront, Essex draws his Army off to Bristol, with a Purpose to recruit his Regiments with some Forces from the neighbouring Counties, but they were too much busied to spare any Assistance. About this time (or a little before) the Parliament resolved upon a very extraordinary Action, which was the making of a new Great Seal; it had some Opposition in the Debate, but by a Majority of Voices in both Houses, it was voted to be done; yet to put some colour on the Enterprize, they passed an Order, that if the Lord Keeper Littleton upon summons did not return with the Great Seal within fourteen Days, he should lose his Place, and whatever should be sealed therewith by him after that time, should be null and void in Law. But this menacing Vote did not bring the Great Seal from Oxford, so that their new Great Seal was made, and some Months after, the Use of it authorized by Ordinance of both Houses.

A new great Seal voted by the Parliament.

The Queen was now marching with six or seven thousand Horse and Foot, towards the King, but in the way she was so careful of Lincolnshire and Nottinghamshire, that she left twenty Troops of Horse and two thousand Foot, with Arms for five hundred more, under the Command of Colonel Charles Cavendish, who did eminent Service before and after, in those Counties. About the 13th of June she came to Newark, and was there welcomed with a Victory obtained three Days before, over some of the Parliament's Forces, by the same Colonel Cavendish at Dunnington in Lincolnshire: After some stay at Newark, her Army marched to Burton upon Trent, which was taken by the Lord Ferdinando Commander in chief of her Army, and from thence she went by easy Marches to Stratford upon Avon, where Prince Rupert came to her, with many Troops from Oxford; she had with her when he met her, three thousand good Foot, and thirty Troops of Horse and Dragoons, with six pieces of Ordnance, two Mortar-pieces, and a hundred and fifty Waggon, which with those of the Prince, made up a better Army than Essex could make to oppose them; for his Men were wasted by Sickneis to a very considerable Number, and he drew them to Kingston and other Places near London, to lie there 'till he could recruit. In the mean time, the Rent betwixt the King and Parliament became wider than ever, for now they proceeded to that Height to draw up Articles of High-Treason against the Queen; some of them were,

The Queen marcheth with her Forces towards the King.

The Parliamentarians beaten at Dunnington in Lincolnshire by Colonel Cavendish.

Articles of High-Treason against the Queen.

1. That she had pawned the Crown Jewels in Holland.
2. That she had favoured the Rebellion in Ireland.
3. That she had endeavoured to raise a Party in Scotland against the Parliament; and that she had gone in the Head of a Popish Army in England, for so they termed the Forces with her (though few or none of that Religion were among them). Divers other Articles were framed 1643. med against her; upon which, Mr. Pym carried up an Impeachment to the Lords: They were (or seemed to be) at first surprized at so extraordinary a Matter, but after some time, they agreed to the Charge.

The Successes of Sir William Waller, gave so great Reputation to his Army, that the King sent for his Western Forces towards Oxford, to hinder the Progress of his Fortune; for it was feared at Oxford, if he had not some Check, he might make himself Master of Ludlow and Worcester, and so bring a great Tract of Land, and many considerable Garrisons into the Power of the Parliament. Sir Ralph Hopton in pursuance of his Orders was marched into Somersetshire, and Prince Maurice with the Earl of Carnarvan and a good strength of Horse, were sent from Oxford to joyn with him. Sir William Waller was come to Bath with his Army, with whom Sir Edward Hungerford, with Sir John Horner, and Mr. Strode were joyned, and they marched towards Sir Ralph Hopton, and came so near him, that on the third and fourth of July, some Skirmishes had passed betwixt some Parties on each side, and Prisoners were taken of both Parties: But on Wednesday the 5th of July the two Armies engaged, at a Place called Lansdown, about eight Miles from Bristol, and the Fight was maintained betwixt them, from two in the Afternoon till one the next Morning, at which time the Parliamentarians left the Field, and the King's Party had gained a great Victory, if by Accident their Ammunition had not blown up, whereby two Captains were slain, and above twenty wounded, whereof Sir Ralph Hopton himself was one; and in the Battle Sir Bevil Greenville a Person of great Renown and Integrity to the King's Cause was slain, together with Mr. Leak, a hopeful young Gentleman, Son to the Earl of Scarisdale, who was found dead in the Field, with the Colours of the Enemy about his Arm, as also one Lieutenant-Colonel, one Major, and two Captains; what Officers fell on the Parliament's side was not known, because the Publishers of such Actions were unwilling to be very particular in their Relations, that they might not too much discourage their Party.

Waller being advertised of what had happened, having got some fresh Men from Bristol, marched after Hopton, hoping to engage him before he could get Ammunition to defend himself, so that he was forced to retire to the Devizes, a Town in Wiltshire, and there he was by Waller block'd up, and after a while he became so distressed, that he began to Treat about the Surrender of it, (for Prince Maurice was with the Horse retired towards Oxford) but immediately the Fortune of War changed; for the King having Notice of Hopton's Condition, sent Commissary Wilmot with the Earl of Carnarvan, and Crawford's Regiment of Horse, and others, to the Number of fifteen hundred, to relieve him; upon whose Approach near to Sir William Waller, he drew off to a place called Roundway-down, where the Horse began to fight, but after a while both Horse and Foot encountred each other, and Waller's Army was totally vanquished; and four Brass Guns, and all the Ammunition and Baggage were taken, with nine Cornets of Horse, and eight and twenty Colours of Foot: Sir Arthur Haslerig was wounded, and many other Officers, and a great Number of Soldiers killed; and this Victory was obtained on the 13th of July, on the same Day whereon the King and the Queen met at the foot of Edgehill, where the first Battle betwixt him and the Earl of Essex had been fought, as was before mentioned: Their Meeting after so long Absence, and on so sad an Occasion, was very joyful to each other: They went that Night to Sir Thomas Pope's House at Wroxton, where they lay all Night, and the next Morning they came with the Prince, the Duke of York, and their Army, with the Carriages and Ammunition to Woodstock, and from thence to Oxford, where her coming was rather to a Triumph than a War.

The King being willing to profit himself of this good Success to his Forces, ordered Prince Rupert to join himself with his Brother and the whole Body of his Strength in those Parts, and to march immediately to Bristol; before which Place he came on the four and twentieth of July, and summoned it to be surrendered to him. Colonel Nathaniel Fiennes Son to the Lord Say and Seal, was then Governour of the City, who made a shew of great Resistance; but yet after three Days, it was surrendered.

A few Days after the taking of this City, the King marched thither to see it and settle the Affairs of those Parts, where presently after his Arrival, he received News of the Surrender of Dorchester to the Earl of Carnarvan, and a Day or two after, Portland, Weymouth, and Melcombe submitted to his Forces; so that about this time the King was possessed of all the Western Counties, from the farthest Part of Cornwall, except some few Garrisons that were blocked up; and now or a little time after, the Lord Fairfax and all his Forces were defeated at Adderton Moor, and he and they driven into Hull by the Earl of Newcastle: And from thence Northward even to the Borders of Scotland, there was no Army in the Field to hinder the King and his Forces from marching whither they pleased. London was then altogether unsatisfied, and many in it favoured the King's Cause, and most of the chief Gentry of the associated Counties were ready upon any Appearance for the King, to have secured those Counties to him; wherefore it was expected that in this Conjunction of Affairs, the King would have marched with his Army to London, and the Earl of Newcastle with his into the associated Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, whereby a sudden End would undoubtedly have been put to this Civil War; which was not only the Opinion of those in the King's Quarters, but many at London and in the Parliament were of the same Mind, and some of them deserted the Party, and submitted to the King, and others were on the Point of quitting the Kingdom. But in the midst of these Hopes, the King against his own Judgment was at a Council of War over-ruled to go to besiege Gloucester; and a few Days after, the Earl of Newcastle sat down before Hull. To this fatal City of Gloucester the King in Person with his Army marched in the beginning of August, and about the 10th he sat down before it; and by two Heralds summoned the City to be surrendered to him: To which Summons within two Hours

1643. Hours an Answer was drawn and consented unto, both by the Citizens and Soldiers, which was presented to the King by Major Pudsey, and one Toby Jordan, a Citizen of the Place, in these Words:

We the Inhabitants, Magistrates, Officers, and Soldiers within this Garrison of Gloucester, unto his Majesty's gracious Message, return this humble Answer; That we do keep this City according to our Oaths and Allegiance to and for the Use of his Majesty and his Royal Posterity: And do accordingly conceive our selves wholly bound to obey the Commands of his Majesty signified by both Houses of Parliament, and are resolved by God's help to keep this City accordingly.

The King received this Answer without any Expression of Choler or Indignation, seeming only to wonder at their Confidence; for in all Appearance they could have no hope of Relief, the whole Number of Soldiers, Horse, Foot, and Dragoons, together with the Train Bands, and those Horse and Dragoons, which they on a sudden got from Berkley Castle, amounted to few more than fifteen Hundred; forty Barrels of Powder was all their Store, with a very mean and slender Artillery for such a Service, and the Works were of a great Compass, and little more than half perfected: So that it was generally believed, the King would rather presently have attempted the Town by a Storm, whilst they were yet in some Consternation, than waste his Time and Soldiers by a Siege. But by all the Intelligence he could get, the Parliament was in no Condition to send any Forces to disturb him; and his Council of War thought it better to save his Infantry by a little Expence of Time, than by exposing the Hazard of so many of their Lives in an Assault: So that a close Siege was made on all Sides, though the first had been the wiser Counsel.

The Parliament were very much troubled at the News of this Siege, and used all the Endeavours possibly to recruit Essex's broken Army for the Relief of it: The first thing they did was to cause 2000 Men to be pressed to strengthen some weak Companies, and upon a Conference with the Committee of the Militia of the City of London, by Consent of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, they procured from thence two Regiments of the Train Bands, three Regiments of Auxiliaries, and a Regiment of Horse: Nor were they less mindful of the North, for the Army from Scotland, which they had invited to their Assistance, could not be ready soon enough to secure these Parts; wherefore they passed an Ordinance for the speedy pressing of 20000 Men, to be raised out of the six Associate Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Cambridge, Hertford, and Huntingdon, to be put under the Command of the Earl of Manchester. In Preparation whereunto, Colonel Oliver Cromwel was very active: He had the Year before, the Command of a Troop of Horse, with which he secured the Town of Cambridge, and obstructed many Levies for the King in Cambridgeshire, Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk; but some time before this, he had a Commission to be a Colonel, and by Authority thereof, he raised a Regiment of Horse, consisting of 1000, with which he was employed in several of the North-West Parts of England, where he joined, as Occasion offered, with Sir William Brereton, Sir John Gell, the Lord Grey of Groby, and others, and did very considerable Service to his Party. His great Design was by this new Army, to attempt to change the whole Discipline of the Parliament's Militia; for having observed that the King's Horse, who were his greatest Strength, consisted of Gentlemen, or the Servants of such, and that these led on by a Sense of Honour, did in most Encounters worst their Enemies, he believed if the Parliament's Horse could be framed of the most Zealous of their Party, such as were perswaded by the Preaching of the Ministers, that the Cause was God's Cause, and that all their religious Liberties were at stake in it, and that those that died therein, died in the Favour of God, and in Assurance of Salvation, they might set this Sense of Conscience against the other Sense of Honour, and be in better Hopes of Success than before: And this Method he put in Practice as far as he could in the new raised Forces before-mentioned, whereof most of the Officers were very great Zealots, and the Soldiers by Degrees became of the same Leven; and those were they that effected afterwards what he hoped for from them.

On the 24th of August the Earl of Essex drew all his Army together to Hounslow, where almost all the Members of both Houses of Parliament were present, the Remainder of his old Army was well recruited; and he had got some additional Regiments of Horse, besides the Horse and Foot he had from the City, which made a gallant Appearance. That Night he marched to Colebrook, where he staid a Day for some more Men that were to come to him, and then he marched to Beskonsfield, and so forward to Beerton, where he cloathed his Army, and marched on.

The King thought it scarce credible that an Army could have been so soon got together; but since it was so, he sent out Parties to obstruct their March, but they marched so close, and in so good Order, that little Obstruction could be given to his Progress; so that on the 5th of September he came to Presbury Hills, where he drew up his whole Army in View of the City, and discharged four Pieces of great Ordnance to give them Notice of his Approach, which was at a time when the King's Forces were prepared ready for a Storm, the Belieged in want, and their Ammunition consumed to three Barrels of Powder: But upon Consultation had by the King with the General Officers, it was resolved the Army should draw off, which was done, and all their Huts were set on Fire. Essex marched thence to Cheltenham, and staid there two Days; and from thence, on the 8th of September, he went with his whole Army to Gloucester, where he staid two Nights 'till he had furnished the City with Ammunition, Money, and other Necessaries, and from thence marched to Tewksbury, staying betwixt the King's Forces and that Garrison four Days, to give them more time the better to furnish themselves with Victuals. Whilst he staid there, he had Advice, that a Body of the King's Army were then in Cirencester Castle, and there had laid in great Stores of Provision; upon which Advertisement, want of Victuals and 1643. and Necessaries increasing upon his whole Army, he made a long March with the Van-Guard of his Troops to fall upon them, which he did about One of the Clock in the Morning, sending in a Party of Horse to seize upon the Centinels and Guards, whilst himself with the rest of the Horse begirt the Town, and a Forlorn-Hope of Foot with his own Foot Regiment entered into it, and surprized two Regiments of Horse belonging to Sir Nicholas Crispe, and Colonel Spencer: Here he found thirty Load of Provision, which proved a great Relief to his Army, then in extreme Distress for want thereof. Having proved successful in this Encounter, he by short Marches passed from thence to Cricklade, so to Swinden, intending to pass through Hungerford, but passing over Oburn Chace, Prince Rupert with the greatest Part of the King's Horse charged the whole Army by two commanded Parties, one under the Lord Fermyn, and the other under Colonel Urry, who performed their Duties so well, that many great Bodies of Essex's Horse and Foot were disordered, with little Loss to the King's Soldiers or Officers, save only to the Marquess de la Vieuville, a young French Nobleman, who was a very brave and generous Cavalier, and unfortunately slain.

The Fight at Newberry.

Essex from thence marched to Hungerford, and the Prince sent an Express to the King then at Wantage, desiring him to advance with all haste to Newberry, the better to hinder Essex's March to London, which was the thing he chiefly endeavoured. The King was glad of the Advice, and in Pursuance of it he marched away to Newberry, where he got before Essex: The next Day the Parliament-Army marched from Hungerford toward Newberry, but hearing the King's Forces had possessed the Town, they lay that Night in the Field; but the next Morning, by break of Day, Essex gave Orders to march to a Hill, called Biggs-Hill, near Newberry, which with some struggle he gained; but the Forlorn of the King's Army by endeavouring to hinder him of so advantageous a Place, did there begin the Fight, which was very vigorously prosecuted on both Sides 'till Night came on, that both Parties drew off. The next Day Essex found his way open towards Reading, so that although the Loss was equal to both Armies, (saying that as the Quality of the Commanders were greater on the King's Side, more eminent Persons of that Party were slain) yet the Victory was allowed to the Parliament Army, because they gained thereby their way to London, from which the King strove to hinder them. The Number of the Slain in this Battle is not recorded: Captain Massey, Captain Hunt, and divers other Officers of Essex's Army were killed, but not many of higher Rank than Captains: Three of the Nobility fell on the King's Side, the Earl of Garnarvon, the Earl of Sunderland, and the Lord Faulkland. After this Fight, the King marched to Oxford, and the Earl of Essex drew his Army to Reading, and from thence to the Towns and Villages near London; but the King on the third of October, finding Reading free, placed a good Garrison in it.

The Gentlemen of Norfolk hearing of the great Success of the Marquess of Newcastle in Yorkshire, did expect his March into that and the rest of the Affiliated Counties; and in Confidence thereof, they seized on Lyn, and put a Garrison into it for the King; but whilst the Marquess of Newcastle vainly thought to take in Hull, before he left Yorkshire, the Earl of Manchester with Colonel Cromwell, and what Forces they could hastily get together, marched into Norfolk, and besieged Lyn, which in Desperation of Relief, after a few Days was yielded to them; and to save the Town from Plunder, the Earl imposed a Fine upon the Inhabitants of ten Shillings a Man to every private Soldier, and a Month's Pay to every Officer, which amounted to thirty thousand Pounds: And a while after, namely, on the Eleventh of October, Sir John Meldrum marched out of Hull, with two Bodies of Foot, under the Command of Colonel Lambert and Captain Rainsbrough, and fell upon the Marquess of Newcastle's Quarters before the Town, driving them from their Out-works and Trenches, where they killed fourscore of his Soldiers, and took an hundred and ten Prisoners, and nine great Pieces of Ordnance, and forced himself to retreat to Beverly; from whence afterward, all his Army marched away, and left the Town free; yet Sir Thomas Fairfax and those in the Town were not in a Condition to take the Field, but Meldrum was dispatched to London to solicit for Forces to be sent to Hull to make up an Army. But in the mean time, the Earl of Newcastle having received great Quantities of Arms from Denmark, which were brought to Scarborough, used Diligence to augment his Army, to be able, not only to oppose the Scots, which were very near ready to march into England, but to strengthen Newark, and the King's other Garrisons in the Northern Parts, whereof Lincoln and some others had been taken by the Earl of Manchester, whilst the Earl of Newcastle's Army lay before Hull, and others had been much distressed: But whilst these things were acted in the North, many considerable Occurrences happened in other Parts, which deserve to be mentioned.

The King being moved with Compassion of the sad Condition of his Protestant Subjects in Ireland, for want of Relief and Supply of Money, Munition, Arms, Provisions, Cloaths, and all other Necessaries; for the Parliament, who had undertaken the Managery of that War, and raised great Sums of Money for that End, employed the greatest Part of it in the War in England against the King, so that many of the English Soldiers, unable to endure the insupportable Necessity that lay upon them, did many times seize on Ships, and force the Mariners to transport them to England; which being represented to the King, He in July, this Year, sent a Commission to the Marquess of Ormond, then Lieutenant-General of the English Army, to treat with the Irish for a Cessation of Arms for one Year; which after some time, upon the 15th of September was agreed to by both Parties: And whilst the Cessation was making in Ireland, the King's Armies, in the Western Parts of England, were very prosperous; insomuch, that about the same time, or a little before, Biddisford, Applesford, Barnstable, and Exeter were surrendered 1643. surrendered to the King by the victorious Arms of Prince Maurice, who from Exeter marched to Dartmouth, which place was on the sixth of October surrendered likewise to him; so that though the King was unfortunately prevailed with to lose the Opportunity of ending the War, by besieging Gloucester and Hull, yet was his Condition at this time, much better than the Year before; for whereas a twelvemonth past, he had in all the West but the County of Cornwall, and in Yorkshire no more than that City and Pomfret Castle, and except at Reading, Wallingford, and Abington, not a Soldier quartered out of Oxford, not a Ship nor Port except Newcastle and Falmouth and as the Parliament themselves published, not ten thousand Men in Arms, he had now five Armies in being, and was possessed of all the Western Counties and Garrisons therein, except Plymouth, Lin, and Poole, and of all Yorkshire, Hull only excepted, and in Cheshire none but Nantwich stood out against him, and Wales was wholly His; and though the Parliament got from him Strafford, Warrington, Lyn, Lincoln, and some other inconsiderable Garrisons, the King in lieu of those gained from them, Saltash, Cirencester, Birmingham, Leige, Lichfield, Brandford, Hallifax, Wakefield, Dainton, Bristol, Bath, Dorchester, Weymouth, Biddiford, Barnstable, Appleford, Tenby, Haverford-west, Pembroke, and Exeter, and as to Gloucester, great Care was taken to hinder Excursions from that Garrison: Sir William Vavasor was sent with a strong Party of Horse to engarrison Hereford, with Commission to raise Forces, and to command in Chief in that County and Gloucestershire: Sudeley Castle was garrisoned by the Lord Chandois for the King, which stopp'd Gloucester's Entercourse with Warwick, the only way of Commerce with London: Berkley Castle was for the King, maintained by a Scottish Captain: Sir John Winter was strongly settled in the Forest of Dean; a Garrison was likewise put into Beverston Castle, and indeed Garrisons there were in every Corner of the County, beside several Parties of the King's Army which lay abroad in the Fields about it; so that Gloucester was almost as much distressed as if it had been besieged, they being inforced to Fight or Skirmish for whatever they got. In the mean time, an additional Supply of one thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse, under the command of Sir Wil. St. Leger and Colonel Min, landed out of Ireland to the King's Aid, and were with eight Pieces of Ordnance ordered to advance to Thornbury, the more to distress the City of Gloucester.

and Magnificence; and whilst he stayed at Oxford, he and his Retinue were lodg'd in St. John's College; but finding himself unable to effect any thing of his Embassy, after a few Months stay, he returned. Sir William Waller who had laid long in London to form an Army, had at last got together six thousand Horse and Foot, with which he was about this time lain down before Basing-House, where he met with no better Success than the King had at Gloucester: But whilst he was there, the City press'd the Earl of Essex to besiege Reading, but he found himself not in a Condition for such a Service, but march'd to Uxbridge, and so to St. Albans, where he kept his head Quarters, and sent out Parties to several Places to oppose the King's Forces, which were very active in many places, though not always fortunate; for about this time the Lord Widdrington with Colonel Henderson, and a good Party of Horse and Foot, were met near Horn-Castle in Lincolnshire, by the Parliament's Forces under the Command of the Earl of Manchester, betwixt whom there was a sharp Fight, wherein Sir Ingram Hopton an Officer of the King's, had once unhorsed Colonel Cromwel, but he was again quickly mounted, and the King's Party put to the worst, and Sir Ingram Hopton and some few others were slain. The King shortly after this Misfortune, was recompenced with the good News of four thousand English Foot landed in North Wales, out of Ireland, under Sir Michael Ernely, who immediately after their Landing, took in Hawerden Castle near Chester, and might afterwards have proved more serviceable than they were to the King, had they not been divided as they were, into several parts of his Armies, but kept together under their old and known Commanders.

The Scots promised to the Parliament (from whom Commissioners were sent to Edinburgh about that Business) that they would bring into England to their Assistance, an Army consisting of one and twenty thousand Horse and Foot, towards the Charge of raising whereof, the Parliament sent one hundred thousand Pound into Scotland, and great Levies of Men were made for this Army, which was now near drawn together; but some at Oxford had so good an Opinion of the Scots, that they would hardly be brought to believe they would invade England, till they saw them in the Bowels of the Nation; for General Lesly with great Imprecations upon himself, as hath been before express'd in this History, protested never to draw his Sword against the King: But the ruling Party in Scotland to facilitate the raising of this Army, had raised a Report that the King was deserted by most of his Nobility.

The King reposing great Trust in the Duke of Hamilton, had written to him to use all his Power and Interest to keep his Countrymen at home, which had not been difficult for one of his Credit in that Nation; but he by some secret Arts did more inflame them, and to cover his Deceit, pretended to fly from Scotland to Oxford, where he came about the last of December, pretending to seek a shelter there for his Loyalty; but the King had so good Information of his Practices in Scotland, that as soon as he came thither, he and the Earl of Lanerick 1643, his Brother, were both forbidden the Court, whereupon Lanercik got privately out of Oxford, and went to London, where he was well received, which increased the King's ill Opinion of his Brother, and he was sent Prisoner to Pendennis Castle.

The Marquis of Montrose made General Governor of Scotland.

A Letter to Sir Thomas Glemham, shewing the Reasons of their Army's March into England.

The King had on the 22d of December summoned the Members of both Houses, who had deserted those at Westminster to assemble at Oxford, on the 22d of January following, where accordingly they met in the great Hall at Christ's Church, and after the King had made a short Speech to them, he dismiss'd them to their Seats. The Lords sat in the upper Schools, and the Commons in the Convocation House, and for their better Welcome, he advanced Prince Rupert to the Titles of Duke of Cumberland, and Earl of Holderness, and created James his second Son, Duke of York, by which Name he had been appointed to be called at the time of his Birth, that they might sit and vote amongst them. After they had sat a while, by a Letter they mov'd the Earl of Essex to endeavour Peace, and did also declare against the Invasion of the Scots by another Letter sent to them, in which they acquainted them with the falseness of their Reports concerning the King, and shew'd how inconsiderable a Number of Lords were with those that invited them in; the King himself writ also to them to put them in mind of their several Engagements to be quiet, but before those Letters could come to Scotland, and indeed some Days before the Parliament had assembled at Oxford, the Scotch Army was marched into England; but when the Letters came to the ruling Party at Edinburgh, with a strange unheard of Insolency, they commanded them to be burnt by the Hands of the Hangman: But the Dishonour of that Nation was in a great measure repaired by the Gallantry and Faithfulness of the Marquis of Montrose, who about the time of this their Invasion, was made General Governor of Scotland, and with an incredible Industry, by small Numbers of Men won many Battles, and overthrew well formed Armies, whereof some Relation shall be made hereafter; and had he not been betrayed by those he trusted, he had forc'd that People to Justice and Quietness. Upon the entry of the Scotch Army into England, a Letter was writ from Berwick in the Name of the Committee of both Kingdoms, subscribed by the Marquis of Argyle and Sir William Armine, to Sir Thomas Glemham, who then lay at Anwick with sixteen Troops of Horse, two Regiments of Foot, eight Drakes, and twenty Pieces of Ordnance, which was to be communicated to the Gentlemen of Northumberland; wherein it was signified, That they came into England to prosecute the Ends of the Covenant, namely, the Preservation, and Reformation of Religion, the true Honour and Happiness of the King, and the publick Peace and Liberty of his Dominions, hoping that Things of so great and considerable Consequence, would find with him and them such Entertainment as might answer the Weight and Importance of them: Adding, that if Misinformation, or any other unhappy Grounds should so far prevail with him and the rest, as to reckon them in the Number of their Enemies; and if instead of that Concurrence with them which they wished and hoped to deserve, they found Opposition and Acts of Hostility, the Law of Nature and their own Reason, might tell them what they were to expect. Sir Thomas returned an Answer to this Letter, to this Purpose.

That there being none with him but Officers, he could not return an Answer so suddenly by their Trumpeter; but he said he would send to the Gentlemen of the County to give him a Meeting, and thereupon they should receive an Answer by a Trumpeter of his own; and by this Means he gained time to draw his Forces and Artillery to Newcastle, for Anwick was not tenable, and many of the Gentlemen of Northumberland, especially such as were allied to my Lord Grey of Wark, either for fear of the Scots, or Affection to their Cause, were very backward in their Opposition to them: But Newcastle, Tynmouth, Shields, and such other Places as were Garrisoned by the King's Forces, did so obstruct their March, that they passed not Tyne till the second of March, and when they did, the Marquis of Newcastle, and General King marched so near them, that they could not advance Southward, but got into Sunderland, where they lay, till the Lord Fairfax and the rest of the Parliament Forces made a Diversion able enough to give them Opportunity to descend into Yorkshire, as hereafter will be shewn.

Sir John Meldrum, the Lord Fairfax, Sir Thomas Fairfax, Sir Will. Constable, and Colonel Lambert, had out of Lincolnshire and the associated Counties, got many Men together, and made such Impressions upon the Marquis of Newcastle's Quarters, that they became very well able to keep a Body together in Yorkshire, and Sir John Meldrum marched into Nottinghamshire, where he joyned with some Troops of the Earl of Manchester, and the Lord Willoughby of Parham, to the Number of eight thousand Horse and Foot, with which they besieged Newark.

The King was much concern'd at the News of this Siege, and was resolv'd at any Hazard to relieve the Town; in order whereunto, the King sent an Express to Prince Rupert, which came to him on the 12th of March to Chester, wherein he commanded him to draw what Force he could together, to raise the Siege of Newark: Upon this Advice he made haste to Shrewsbury, speeding away Major Legg (General of the Ordnance) before to chuse out so many commanded Musqueteers of the English (of late come out of Ireland) as might be well spared out of that Garrison. These were a thousand Musqueteers of Colonel Broughton's and Colonel Tillier's Regiment, with a hundred and twenty of Colonel Sir Fulk Huns's. All these sent down by the Severn, met the Prince at Bridgnorth on Friday. Of Horse he took along with him his own Troop, and Regiment, with twenty of Major General Urrey's; with these Forces he drew along three Field-pieces. At Wolverhampton next Day was his Army recruited by a hundred Horse, and two hundred Foot of Colonel Leveson's. On Monday Night he had Notice at Ashby de la Zouch, of two thousand two hundred Enemies under Sir Edward Hartop, sent out by Meldrum to the Pass and Bridge over the Sore, a Mile from Loughborough in Leicestershire. Their purpose

Newark besieged by Meldrum.

An Express sent by the King to Prince Rupert to raise the Siege.

1643. pose was either to intercept Major General Porter, or to prevent his joining with my Lord Loughborough: For thither with four Regiments of Horse, and a thousand commanded Musqueteers of my Lord Newcastle's Men, was Porter now come from about Newark, to hinder the farther Inroads into Leicestershire. Daily flight Skirmishes here passed: For Meldrum not able to force the Passage, and hearing of my Lord of Loughborough's drawing out, stole away. Porter thus disengaged, was the next Day together with my Lord Loughborough's Forces conjoined to the Prince's. That Night they all quarter'd in a Close by Bingham, eight Miles short of Newark. About two of the Clock, the Moon then well up, the Drums beat, and all marched. Hitherto had the Marches been so speedy, as Fame it self was prevented; for by Meldrum's own Letter sent to the Lord Fairfax, which was intercepted the Night before, they had no more but an uncredited Rumour of Prince Rupert's coming. On this Days March the Prince had notice by his Espials, how the Enemies were busied all that Morning in sending away their Cannon; which proved no other, than their drawing them off their Batteries into their chief Work at the Spittle, or Exeter-House, a little more than Musquet-shot from the Town; for into that one Quarter had they this Morning drawn all their Regiments and Ammunition. The Prince having Intelligence of their amassing themselves thus into one Body, which he supposed a preparation to march off suddenly, advanced his Van of Horse upon the Spur to overtake them: The rest of his Horse had order to keep along with the Foot, Cannon, and Ammunition. Coming near the Bacon-hill, a Mile short of Newark, he perceived some Horse of the Enemies, who upon his Approach, drew down the other side to their own Gross. The Prince thus easily gaining the Hill, was earnest to pursue his good Fortune, upon his apprehension of having many Advantages upon a retreating Enemy: Whereupon he gave order to charge them with all the Horse then with him, to engage them till the Rear and Foot should be marched up to him. Trooping thus to the Edge of the Hill, he perceived the most of the Enemy in Battalia (Horse and Foot) near the Spittle; all except four great Bodies of Horse, who expected him at the very Descent of the Hill. The Prince thus ordered his own few Forces: First himself with his own Troop of Life-Guards, undertook to attack that Body on the left Hand, appointing my Lord Loughborough's Troop to second him, and Colonel Charles Gerrard's Troop to be a Reserve a little on my Lord's right Hand. The Prince's Regiment was cast out into five Divisions, two Troops to each Division: In the first and very right Hand of all, were Captain Gardiner, and Captain Richardson; then Captain Cobb, and Captain Martin; then the Lord Grandison and Sir Thomas Dallison; next them the Troops of Sir Lewis Dives, and the Lord Dillon; Major Legg's and Lieutenant Colonel O. Neal's Troops, being next unto the Life-Guards; this Regiment was seconded by Major General Porter's Regiment: The Field Word was, King and Queen; theirs, Religion. The Fight began about nine a Clock, and after a while it grew fierce, especially on the Prince's Right Wing; the other doubling their Files from three to six deep, and charged two utmost Troops upon the Flank so hard, that Captain Martin came timely in to help to beat them off; the Prince himself having pierced deep into the Enemies, and being observed and known, was dangerously at once assaulted by three sturdy Persons, whereof one fell by his own Sword; a second being Pistoll'd by Master Mortaign, one of his own Gentlemen; the third now ready to lay Hand on the Prince's Collar, had it almost chopp'd off by Sir Will. Neale. He thus disengaged, with a Shot only in his Gauntlet, with Sir Richard Crane and his own Troop, charged quite through the Body, pursuing them in a Rout, home to their Works at the Spittle. Presently after this, his Regiment with their seconds likewise routed the three other Bodies, four of the Troops charging even into the Work and bringing away a Captain Prisoner. Loughborough also deported himself honourably, some of his Men shrunk at the second Charge, but he himself rode back to rally and bring them up again: Colonel Gerard was shot in the Arm in this Encounter, and being by the Fall of his Horse much bruised, was taken Prisoner.

After a little Pause, both sides began to make ready for a second Charge; the Prince to make Impression, and they to receive it: And though for a good while they disputed it roughly, yet by main Force where they and all the rest driven quite out of the Field beyond their own Work, Foot and Cannon at the Spittle; divers of them hastening by a Bridge of Boats over that Branch of the Trent into the Island: Four other Troops, with as many Foot Companies hastened up to Muskam-Bridge, upon the other side of the Island, and main Stream of the River, about three quarters of a Mile both from Newark and the Spittle: Here they stayed till towards Evening; when breaking the Bridge behind them, and throwing one piece of Cannon into the Trent, they hastened to Nottingham. In both these stiff Bouts, the Prince took five Cornets, and ninety Prisoners, whereof three Captains, some Gentlemen, three Cornets, besides other Officers, and two Cannoneers. And now as if an universal Truce had been agreed upon, there was some half an Hours silence, excepting that the Enemies Cannon disturbed it. As for the Prince, he now stayed for his Foot and the Rear of his Horse, both left full two Miles behind, when his Van began to double their March to overtake the Enemy; anon came up his Foot, all that Day commanded by Colonel Tillier: These resting themselves a while upon the Hill, the first Division being Part of those that came from Shrewsbury were led on by the Colonel, these marched down in the Face of the Enemy, hooting at their Cannon; and flanked with some Horse, they were wheeled to the Right into a Meadow. At their coming, the Enemy drew all their Horse and Foot within their Spittle-Work, and coming up against this Place, both sides saluted one another at too far a Distance with a short Volley; but Colonel Tillier was not to stay here, as being by his Orders to march up to the very Rivers side, to recover the Boat-bridge from the Enemy; but this being too well guarded, he was glad to go off, making a stand without reach of Cannon. In this time were divers more Bodies brought down into the Field, who charged up to the Enemy's Work, and killed many: Loughborough's Men being left upon the Hill for a Reserve. Thus was the Valley bespread with the Prince's Battalions, and in this Posture stood the Army. Sir Richard Byron Governour of Newark likewise before this, had sent Part of his Garrison (both Horse and Foot) into another Ground on the South-East Side of the Town: And by this time had the Prince Notice given him by a Prisoner, and by one of theirs that came over to him, how they were so distressed for want of Victuals, that they were not able to live there two Days. Whereupon he began to resolve upon other Counsels, esteeming it cheaper to block up their Trenches, than to storm them: And block'd up they were already in a very narrow Room, no more being free than the backside of the Spittle towards the River: Besides which, they were on all Sides surrounded by his Forces; on the South Side, by the Town; on the East, by the Prince; and on the North, by Colonel Tillier. Into the Island on the West, had the Prince sent five hundred Horse, besides two hundred of the Newark Troopers. Thus the late Blockers found themselves now besieged, and without much hope of sudden Relief, or safe Means for Sally; for so well had the Prince ordered them, that had they sallied forwards, he had then fallen on upon their issuing out, both in Front and Flank with his Army, and the Town had charged them upon their Rear. Had they offered to escape over their Boat-bridge, those in the Isle had disturbed their passing, and others entertained their coming over. By this time had the Prince commanded Sir Richard Byron with his own, and Sir Gervase Eyre's Horse Regiment, with eight hundred of Sir John Digby's Foot, to advance so high into the Island, as to put in betwixt the Enemy's two Bridges: By which Interposition was all intercourse cut off betwixt their greater Body at the Spittle, and those at Muskam-Bridge; upon this those eight Colours at the Bridge retreated as aforesaid. Under favour of these Town-Forces too, was the Prince resolved to cast up a Redoubt that Night betwixt the Bridges, but going to view the Ground, the Enemy sent out a Trumpet to desire a Parley. To make way for this, and the more to sweeten and oblige the Prince, had Sir John Meldrum some Hours before sent home Colonel Gerard, yet upon the Parole of a Soldier and a Gentleman, to return himself a Prisoner whenever he should be called. They having sent out to parley, quitted their Bridge, which the Prince presently possessed by an hundred Musqueteers. For the Parley on the Prince's Part was appointed Sir Richard Crane, Captain of his Life-Guards, with Sir William Neale, Scout-Master-General; the other sending Sir Miles Hobard, and Sir John Palsgrave, two Colonels of Norfolk, on their Part. The Prince's Horse, were so over-marched, and the Foot so beaten off their Legs by long Marches, that he found his Men not very able to engage anew, and the Enemy were more than was believed; so that he was willing to give them good Conditions, and the rather, for that (as by intercepted Letters it appeared) the Lord Fairfax and his Son Sir Thomas, being commanded by the Council of State to march; other Places might, e'er long, have need of his Presence; so that at length he condescended to these Articles.

1. That all Match, Bullet, Powder, Cannon, and all other fire Arms belonging to the Artillery be delivered.
2. That all Soldiers march away with their Swords by their Sides, and Colours and Drums.
3. That all Officers march without Molestation with their Arms and Horses for themselves and Servants, and all Bag and Baggage, Money, and whatsoever doth truly belong to themselves.
4. That all Troopers and Dragoons march with their Swords, Horses and Colours.
5. That his Highness send a Convoy to protect Us from any Injury two Miles from the utmost of his Highness's Quarters.

Upon this Victory of the Prince, the Garrisons of Gainsborough, Lincoln and Sleaford, were quitted by the Parliamentarians, and Sterne Castle in Staffordshire was surrendered to Sir Gilbert Gerard for the King; but four Days after the Action at Newark, the King's Forces under the Marquess of Newcastle, received a considerable Loss at a Place called Hilton, where, for two or three Days, several Skirmishes were made betwixt the English and Scotch Armies; and on the 25th of March they came to a pretty close Engagement, wherein the English Foot were much disordered, and one Brigade of the Horse routed; and about two hundred Horses and Men were taken, but not without great Loss to the Scots, though their Numbers were increased with three thousand English Seamen and others, which came to them in Sunderland from Hull, and upon this Disorder the Marquess enlarged his Quarters Southward; but the Scots did not yet advance much further.

Sir William Waller having taken Arundel Castle in Sussex, and procured a Commission from the Parliament, less dependent on Essex than that he had before, marches into Hampshire against the Lord Hopton, who was then very fortunate there, having taken Warder Castle, and many other Places. At Brandon Heath near Alesford, both Parties met on the 30th of March, and there was a very hot Dispute betwixt them; but Waller having the Advantage of the Ground, and a Covert of Trees and Hedges to shelter his Foot, did thereby great Execution on the King's Party, who pressing too eagerly to gain a Victory, lost it; yet it was not an entire Conquest, for the Lord Hopton retreated to Winchester with all his Cannon, except two heavy Pieces which were plunged, and could not easily be drawn off: But Sir John Smith, and Colonel Butler, and some other Officers of less Note of his Army were slain, and two hundred common Soldiers, and many others wounded; amongst which, the Lord Steward, Brother to the Duke of Richmond was one, who died three or four Days after at Abington, of his Wounds: He was a young Nobleman of great Courage and Generosity in all his Actions, and very debonair and affable in his Behaviour towards all:

On

1644. On the Parliament's Side many Officers and Soldiers were killed and wounded; and of the Wounded, Colonel Thompson, who lost his Leg, and Colonel Dalbie, were the most remarkable. After this Fight, the Town of Winchester was yielded to Sir William Waller, but the Castle continued long after a Garrison for the King. The News of the Affront lately given to the Marquess of Newcastle's Army by General Lesley, animated Fairfax and the Forces in Yorkshire, to draw what Troops they could together, to endeavour to join with the Scots, who were now upon their March: And in Pursuance of this Design, the Lord Fairfax marched out of Hull, with twenty Troops of Horse, and joined with his Son Sir Thomas and Colonel Lambert, who made up about sixty Troops more, besides a good Body of Foot, under Sir John Meldrum, making up in all to the Number of seven thousand Horse and Foot; and with this little Army, they made as if they intended to march to York, but on the eleventh of April, when they came near Selby (where Colonel Bellasis lay with a good Body of Men, as a Reserve to the Marquess of Newcastle) they drew before the Town, and about eleven of the Clock they assaulted it in three Places, and after two Hours Fight, made themselves Masters thereof, wherein they took Colonel Bellasis the Commander in Chief, Governour of York, with most of the rest of the Officers, and sixteen Hundred common Soldiers, a Drake and a Saker; seven Barrels of Powder, sixteen Bundles of Match, great Store of Bullets, and two thousand Arms: Immediately upon this Success, the Marquess of Newcastle retreated to York, to re-inforce that Garrison, in case any Attempt should be made upon it; and Fairfax marched to meet the Scots, and joined his Army with theirs at Wetherby, from whence they disposed them to Quarters, 'till a Resolution should be taken for further Action. In the mean time, the Queen being great with Child at Oxford, and somewhat apprehensive of a Siege there, by the Earl of Essex and Sir William Waller, which was the common Intelligence of that time, to prevent the Inconveniencies thereof, set out from Oxford on the 17th of April towards Exeter, where she safely arrived some time after; and two Days after her Departure from Oxford, the Parliamentary Convention at Oxford were by the King prorogued to the 8th of October, and that Prorogation was afterward enlarged to the 9th of November by Proclamation. Prince Rupert was very active in Shropshire, Cheshire, Staffordshire, and Lancashire, to make an Army sufficient to relieve the Marquess of Newcastle, who was somewhat straitened in Yorkshire by the Parliament's Forces, where he had done very good Service in taking many Garrisons from the Enemy, as Longford House, and Tonge Castle in Shropshire, Stowford in Cheshire, and Bolton in Lancashire, besides the Relief of Latham House, (which had been eighteen Weeks defended by the Countess of Derby, against a close Siege) and the Defeat of many Parties that encountered him or his Forces at several times: But we shall leave him for a while, to speak of the King's Condition at this time.

The Parliament having formed two Armies, whereof the Foot were for the most Part made up of London Trained Bands and Auxiliaries, one under the Earl of Essex, and the other under Sir William Waller; both Armies Rendezvous'd on the 24th of May at Blewbury in Berkshire, and kept their Head Quarters that Night at Abington, within five Miles of Oxford, where they continued five or six Days, and Essex marched from thence to Ipsley, with Purpose to distress Oxford on the North Part, and left Sir William Waller at Abington on the South Part.

The King perceiving the Parliament's Intention to besiege Oxford, was resolved to endeavour to prevent it, by giving their Armies some distant Diversion, or at least to remove his Person from the Inconveniencies of a Siege. The Place resolved to go to, was Worcester, which he kept so private, that scarce any knew of it but himself: And to amuse the Enemy, on the third of June, he sent a Party of five or six hundred Horse, under the Command of the Earl of Cleveland, to alarm Abington, who bravely entered the Turnpike, and if he had had more Forces, might have carried the Town; but having done his Business, he retreated with his Party to Oxford, whilst Waller drew his Troops about Abington, expecting the King's March that way; but that Evening appointed his Rendezvous at Northley, about eight Miles from Oxford, where he drew up his Army, consisting of about seven thousand Horse and Foot, twelve Drakes, and sixty Carriages; and having refreshed himself at one Mr. Parret's House there, from whence he marched to Burton-on-the-Water, a Village between Burford and Stow-on-the-Wold, and there lodged at Dr. Temple's, the Parson there.

From Burton the King went to Parishore, and from thence to Worcester.

Essex and Waller having Notice of the King's march, eighteen Hours after he was gone, pursued him two several ways; Essex was in some trouble to know what to do, considering that fighting would not so much waste his Men, as tedious Marches after the King's light Army, when his was incumbered with a heavy Train of Artillery; so that he thought it more prudent to put Waller upon this Service, and to stay for him at Burford to consult about the Prosecution of it. At Burford it was resolved that Essex should march Westward, to bring those Counties into the Obedience of the Parliament, whilst Waller should get what Forces he could together, to join with him in Pursuit of the King, who was yet at Worcester; from whence, on the 11th of June, he sent a Party out to relieve Dudley Castle that was besieged, and having Intelligence that the Parliament's Armies were now severed, and hearing that Waller came nearer by tedious and hungry Marches, the King advanced to Budeley, where he staid four Days, and Waller imagining his Intention to be to march towards Prince Rupert, hastened into Staffordshire to get before him; but the King turns back with Resolution to be furnished with more Men and Ammunition from Oxford, and in order thereunto, on the 18th of June, he came to Witney, where he staid 'till some Forces came to increase his Army, and being as well provided as he could in so short a time, he marched towards the Parliament's Associated Counties, and

Winchester yielded to Sir William Waller.

Waller to recruit his Army from the Garrisons of Gloucester, Warwick, Coventry, Northampton, and Kenilworth Castle, had on the 26th of June, a Rendezvous in Keinton Field, whereof the King having Notice, turned his March towards him, and quartered that Night at Brackley. Two Days after the King's coming before Banbury, he found Waller drawn up in Battalia Westward from the Town on the Side of Crouth-bill, taking Advantage of the Hills, Boggs, and Ditches, so that the King marched to Daintry, leaving a Guard of Dragoons at Cropledy Bridge, to secure his Pass over the River, and thereupon the Army marched over, and the Musketeers that guarded the Bridge were gone off; when Waller greedily apprehending to make some Advantage upon the King's Rear, puts over two thousand Horse, with a great Body of Foot, and fourteen Pieces of Cannon, sufficient as he thought to disorder it: The King's Rear consisted of the Earl of Cleveland, and the Earl of Northampton's Brigades of Horse, and Sir Bernard Ashley's tertias of Foot: These faced about, and routed all the Enemy that had passed the Bridge; and the Earl of Northampton seeing some of Waller's Horse endeavouring to ford the River, charged and repulsed them. In this Fight, three hundred of Waller's Soldiers were slain, and Weems their General of the Ordnance, was taken Prisoner, with two Lieutenant-Colonels, three Captains, two Lieutenants, four Cornets, with other Ensigns and Officers; an hundred and eighty common Soldiers, five Gunners, and fourteen great Guns. There was slain on the King's Part, Sir William Butler, and Sir William Clark, the Lord Wilmot General of the Horse, was twice Prisoner, but rescued once by Sir Frederick Cornwallis, and the second time by Mr. Robert Howard, who was Knighted for the Service of that Day. Colonel Nevil was also hurt, and some other Officers and others were taken Prisoners; but there were not above twenty slain.

The King sends a Message to the Parliament about a Treaty of Peace.

York besieged by Manchester, Fairfax, and Lesley: Is relieved by Prince Rupert.

Marston-Moor Fight, wherein the King's Party was at last defeated.

The King marched to Evesham after this Fight, from whence he sent a Message to the Parliament to invite them to a Treaty of Peace, and from thence he went on to Bath. Sir William Waller was not in a Condition to follow him, but after some time, he went to London, to solicit Recruits, whilst the King march'd after Essex into the West. In the Beginning of this Month, Prince Rupert marched out of Lancashire with a considerable Army for the Relief of York, wherein the Marquess of Newcastle had been besieged two Months by three Armies, under the Command of the Earl of Manchester, the Lord Fairfax and General Lesley: They all upon approach of the Prince, drew off their Army, and thereupon the Prince and the Marquess of Newcastle marched after them to a Plain called Marston-Moor, where on the third of July, a terrible Fight began, in which the Prince at first had much the better, taking their Ordnance, and many of them Prisoners, insomuch that General Lesley and the Lord Fairfax thinking all had been lost, fled many Miles from the place where the Battle was fought, and never came to the Remainder of their Army, 'till two Days after the Fight: But in Conclusion, by a wonderful and an unexpected fatality the fortune of the Day turned, and the Parliament Forces recovered their lost Ordnance, and took some of the Prince's Baggage, and with it Sir Charles Lucas, Colonel Porter, and Colonel Tilliard Prisoners. In this Battle were slain on his Majesty's Part, the Lord Cary, Sir Thomas Metham, Colonel Eure, Colonel Towneley, with some others of Note, and about fifteen hundred common Soldiers. On the Parliament's Part were slain Sir Charles Fairfax, with many other of their Commanders, and at least three thousand Soldiers.

After this Battle the Parliament Army fat down again before York, and Prince Rupert marched away with about six thousand Horse and Dragoons into Lancashire, and from thence to Chester; but the Marquess of Newcastle, and his two Sons, General King, the Lord Falconbridge, the Lord Widdrington, Earl of Carnwarth, Bishop of London-derry, Lord William Carnaby General Pay-Master, Sir Edward Widdrington, Colonel Carnaby, Colonel Basset, Colonel Mozen, Sir Wal. Vavasor, Sir Hugh Cholmley, Sir Fran. Mackworth, and Sir Charles Cavendish, did all take Shipping at Scarborough, and were from thence transported to Hambrough.

The sudden Departure of the Marquess of Newcastle, and so many other considerable Persons at this time, was thought to be occasioned by a general Dissatisfaction among the Officers, concerning the Abilities and Integrity of the King, whose Direction had a great Influence upon the Action of that Day; but however it came to pass, so it was, that being a Scotchman, he was very hardly spoken of among the North-ern Commanders, as neither so great a Soldier as the World believed him, nor so zealous in the Cause, as perhaps he would have been, if it had not been against his own Countrymen.

The Parliament's Army had now lain twelve Days before York, since their last Approach to it, and Preparation was made for a Storm; but Sir Thomas Glemham the Governour, sent a Trumpeter out late at Night for a Parley, for his Provisions and Ammunition was much wasted; and he had not above a thousand Soldiers, besides those that were sick and wounded, to defend the Town: So that upon the 16th of July, the City was surrendered upon very honourable Terms; amongst which, the two or three first were, That all Officers and Soldiers should march out with their Horses and Arms, flying Colours, Drums beating, Matches lighted, Bullets in Mouth, with Bag and Baggage, and a Convoy to Skipton, and that no Soldiers shall be plundered. But the Soldiers that were to guard them, in Violation of these Conditions, plundered many of the Waggons, at which the Earl of Manchester and Cromwel were so much displeased, that many of them were censured at a Court Martial, but little Restitution was made, and most of them that were accused, agreed in one Excuse, viz. That they never heard it was any Part of the Agreement, that they should march away, and be protected with their Bag and Baggage, and that many of Sir Thomas Glemham's Soldiers for York surrendered to the Parliament.

1644. set them on to plunder, discovering to them which were the Waggon of Papists; in rifling whereof they assisted and got their Share.

Having endeavoured hitherto, in the Actions of this Year, to apply them to the times whereon they were acted, we must now return to describe the Motions of the Earl of Essex, and the King, in the Western Parts, which for some Weeks together administered the greatest Matter for Story.

Whilst the King was at Bath, he received Advice that Essex was, about the 16th of July, marched from Teverton in Devonshire towards Plymouth, to raise the Siege, which Sir Richard Greenvil had at that time before Plymouth, and dispersed his Forces, which was the Result of a Council of War then had, when two other Questions were proposed, either to march back to meet the King's Forces, or to besiege Exeter; but neither of those were approved, and they were not very earnest to attempt Exeter, now they knew they had frightened the Queen from thence, who about the fifteenth or sixteenth of July, safely arrived at Brest in Britany, where she was very well received, though she got not thither without much Hazard, having an hundred great Shot made at her, and those few small Vessels of her Guard, by a Squadron of the Parliament's Ships that lay to intercept her.

As soon as the King heard of Essex's Advance towards Plymouth, he marched with his Army into Somersetshire, and at Kinsmore, he summoned the Gentry of the Country, and recommended to them the Care of that County in his Absence, and not to suffer themselves to be drawn away from his Service: And hearing that upon the March of Essex's Army towards Plymouth, Sir Richard Greenvil had raised his Siege thereof, and was marched into Cornwall, with his own Regiment, and the Regiments of Colonel Fortescue, Colonel Carew, and Colonel Acktland, and that Essex was marching after him with his Army, he immediately advanced with all his Forces towards Cornwall; but before he could get thither, Essex had much distressed Greenvil, having almost enclosed him with three Regiments of Horse, and a Company of Dragoons, under Colonel Bear.

On the first of August the King entered Cornwall, passing over the Tamor at Polton Bridge, and he marched directly to Liscard, where for some time he settled his head Quarters: The Country was very cordial to him, insomuch that not any of Essex's Men could straggle from their Quarters without Danger to be killed or taken Prisoners by the Country-People, which made him (who then quartered at Liffithiel, about eight Miles from Liscard) keep his Army very much together, and call back those he had sent to attempt on Sir Richard Greenvil; but all his Care did not prevent the Loss of some of his chief Officers, for Quarter-master General Dalbeir, Colonel Allured, Lieutenant-Colonel Carleton, and Lieutenant-Colonel Bartley, with some other Officers, being at the Lord Mobun's House at Boconnock at Dinner, were all, except Dalbeir, surprized by a Party of the King's Horse, and brought Prisoners to Liscard on the 4th of August.

The King, by the Addition of Prince Maurice's Army, was much increased in Strength, and in all Appearance, likely to give himself (as it after happened) a Conquest over Essex, but the Tenderness he always had towards his Subjects, made them try rather (according to his Custom) first to seek Peace, before he proceeded to the Rigour of War; in order whereunto, he writ from Liscard, a Letter to Essex, dated August the 6th, which he sent to him by his Nephew, the Lord Beauchamp; but no Return was made to it, and a Day or two after, another Letter was writ to him by the Officers of the Army; to which he sent a negative Answer to the Earl of Forth, importing, That he had received a Letter from his Lordship, and some other Commanders, by which a Treaty was desired with him for a General Peace, which he could not admit of, without Breach of the Trust reposed in him by the Parliament, having no Power by his Commission to treat in a Matter of such Importance. During this Conjunction of Affairs, an unhappy Accident fell out in the King's Army; for in the Consultation amongst the Officers, of the Letter to be sent to Essex, a very earnest Debate was had of the Matter of it, and the Manner of the Address, and some Expressions uttered by the Lord Wilmot therein, of making the Prince of Wales Mediator in the Business, which by some disaffected to that Lord was improved to his Prejudice, as if he intended to make a Division in the Army; and thereupon the King was perswaded to secure him, and send him away with a Guard to Oxford, which caused a great Consternation in the Army, for he was very well beloved among the Soldiers; and if great Care had not been used to temper the Minds of many of them, great Inconveniencies might have ensued: But nevertheless, the King lost hereby the Counsel and Conduct of one of his best Officers, who by all the Actions of his Life, before and after, gave such evident Marks of his Loyalty, that even his Enemies were ashamed and sorry for their Apprehensions of him. General Goring was at the Instant of his Remove put into his Command, and the King began to use all possible Means to distress the Enemy, by almost encompassing them with his Forces; he himself and Prince Maurice quartered at Boconnock, Greenvil fastened himself at Lanbetherock, three Miles West of the King, and possessed himself of Leprin Bridge, a Mile above Liffithiel, to which Place the Tide flowed up from Foy; so that it was not fordable but at one Pass between that and the Sea. The King's Army encamped between Boconnock and a Heath that passed his Quarters and the Enemy, and placed Guards on all Places on the River leading from his Quarters at Liffithiel to Foy, possessing a House of the Lord Mobun's over against the Town, and a Fort that commanded the Mouth of the Haven; so that Essex had no Place for Relief by Water, but at a small Creek, Mimibilly and St. Blase's Bay, but neither safe for Ships, but retained a large Space of Ground Westward: Whereupon Goring was sent with most of the Horse, and Sir Thomas Bassett with fifteen hundred Foot to those Parts, to stop all Provisions coming in at St. Blase, by which Means Essex and his Army were reduced to such Straits, that 1644. Sir William Belfour with five and twenty hundred of their Horse, broke away before Day in the Morning, on the 31st of August, between the Quarters of his Majesty and Prince Maurice as they lay encamped, and got to Salisbury, and the same Night Essex himself and the Lord Roberts, deserted the Army, and got away in a Boat to Plymouth.

The King has good Success in the West.

The next Day Skippon with the Foot endeavoured to march to Foy, but the King having notice of their Motion, marched soon after them, and that Day took five of their Ordnance, falling into their Rear within two Miles of Lisfithiel; the next Morning they made a Stand, and with their remaining Horse, regained some Fields from whence they had been forced before; whereupon the King sent Captain Edward Breet with the Queen's Troop, who in his View forced them to retire, regained the lost Ground, and got more, and returned in good Order, with the loss only of four of his Men, and himself shot in the Arm; for which good Service the King immediately knighted him. In the Evening their Men were so harrassed, they could scarce be made to stand to their Arms, and in that their Condition, Lieutenant Colonel Butler came to desire a Parley of the King, which was granted, and a Treaty followed, by which the King had delivered up to him all the Train of Artillery, consisting of Forty-nine Brass Pieces of Ordnance (with those taken before) two hundred and odd Barrels of Gun-Powder, with Match and Ball proportionable, seven hundred Carriages, and betwixt eight and nine thousand Arms; and many of the common Soldiers deserted their Officers, and voluntarily offered their Service to the King; but this Victory did not lessen the King's Inclination to Peace, insomuch that on the 8th of September he sent a second Message to the Parliament from Tavestock, though this, as that before, had no Answer; nor was any Treaty agreed on 'till January following, as will be hereafter mentioned. But instead of this Message, if he had gon with his Army towards London, in all Probability he might have made an End of the War, the Army of Essex being thus broken, and that of Manchester not returned from the Northern Service.

About this time the Marquess of Montrose was very victorious for the King in Scotland, having obtained a great Victory over the Covenanters upon Newbigging-Moor, and taken Perth, and within fourteen Days after this, he gained another Victory near unto Aberdeen, and soon after took that City, and marched from thence into the Earl of Argyle's Country, which he wasted with Fire and Sword, and did many great Services, even to Admiration, considering the smallness of his Beginning and the little Assistance he had from England; but we shall leave a while the Narrative of his Fortune, to return to the Transactions in England, which were the remaining Part of this Year prosecuted in several Places with various Success: In the West, after the great Victory over Essex's Army, Ilford-Comb, Barnstable, and Salisbury, submitted to the King's Arms, and Basing-House, that had been eighteen Weeks besieged, was relieved by a Party from Oxford under Sir Henry Gage, and a little after, he with the Earl of Northampton raised the Siege of Ban- bury-Castle, which had been a Month beleagured by Colonel John Fiennes, and slew and took many of his Men, and one Piece of Ordnance; but the good Fortune of the Parliament in several Parts, ballanced this Success with Advantage; Monmouth was, in September, taken by Colonel Massy, and the Town and Castle of Newcastle, which had long endured the utmost Force of the English and Scotch Armies, was taken by Storm, with great Loss to the Assailants on the 27th of October, and a while after, Liverpool in Lancashire was surrendered to Sir John Meldrum: But the great Business that concluded this Year, were the Battle of Newberry, and the Treaty at Uxbridge, which will come next to be related, interwoven with some other of the most remarkable Occurrences that then happened.

The Earl of Essex and Manchester, and Sir William Waller, had drawn a great Army together, with a Resolution to hinder the King's March to Oxford; but he not believing that Essex could have so soon appeared at the Head of an Army, fought, or was willing not to decline Engagement. Essex and Manchester, on the 23d of October rendezvoused their Army in Aldermaston Park, and the next Night came privately over the Water at a Ford near Padworth, and next Morning to Bucklebury Heath near Newberry, where the King then was, and about twelve of the Clock drew down their whole Army, between Thacham and Shaw, and skirmished with the King's Horse: On Saturday both Armies plyed one another with their great Ordnance, but without much Hurt done. Then some of Manchester's Troops, and London Trained-bands crossed the River Kennet between the Hill and Newberry, and did some Execution upon those that kept the Pass against them: But Sir Bernard Ashley coming to their Rescue, forceth the other over the River. Again, in the Afternoon four thousand of Essex and Waller's Horse and Dragoons with five hundred Pikes, charged the Royal Army on the West side of Newberry, where were the Cornish Foot, and the Duke of York's Regiment, with five Field Pieces, and Prince Maurice's Brigade of Cornish Horse, all which having not unmanfully sustained the rough charge of the Parliamentarians, were yet forced to retreat back in some Disorder, and here some of the King's Field-pieces were taken. The Essexians following their Success, advanced with five hundred Horse, and a sufficient strength of Musqueteers betwixt Newberry and Spine, upon the King's Life-Guards, and Sir Humphry Bennet's Brigade, whom they over-powered, and had much more endamaged, if the Lord Bernard Stewart had not come up to their Assistance, and secured their Retreat on the East-side of Spine; the Parliamentarians having settled three Bodies of Foot in certain Inclosures, advanced over a Ditch, with a great Body of Horse to break through the King's Guards; but first they were obliged to fight with General Goring and the Earl of Cleveland's Brigade, (who charged stoutly and beat back the Enemy, but pursuing disorderly, were repulsed with Loss.)

Upon the North East of Newberry stood the Lord Ashley, with Colonel George Lisle, against whom the Earl of Manchester's Horse and Foot, with 1644. with the Trained Bands of London, came down the Hill and worsted Colonel Lisle's Guards: But Sir John Brown, Lieutenant Colonel of the Prince of Wales's Regiment of Horse, charged the Foot, and stopp'd them, and then received a Charge of a thousand Horse, and was forced to retreat.

Manchester in the next Place forces his Way to charge the Reserve, commanded by Colonel Thelwell, and after a smart Dispute, beat them out of the Field, and gains their Colours, and two pieces of Cannon: In this Battle on the King's Part were slain Sir Anthony St. Leger, Lieutenant Colonel Leak, Lieutenant Colonel Topping, and Captain Catlin; the Earl of Cleveland, and some few were taken; the Earl of Brainford, and Forth, Sir John Greenville, Sir Richard Camfield, Major Alford and Captain Walgrave, and others, were wounded; many private Soldiers slain and taken Prisoners. The Fight endured 'till eight of the Clock at Night, and was ended to the Advantage of the Parliamentarians; for the King perceiving that most of his Brigades were shattered, and fearing a total Overthrow if the Battle should be renewed, marched away secretly to Dennington-Castle, and there left behind him his great Pieces of Ordnance, and so hastened to Willingford. General Essex lodged himself in Newberry, and having in vain summoned and assaulted Dennington-Castle, he marched away on the 29th of October, committing the Care of that Siege to a Party which he left behind him.

The King after this Fight, made what hast he could to recruit and refresh his Army, that he might relieve Dennington-Castle, which was not sufficiently provided, and bring from thence the Ordnance, Ammunition and Baggage which he left there; and that he might also succour Basing-house, which was again besieged; and therefore on the 6th of November, he had his Rendezvous at Bullington-Green, betwixt Wallingford and Oxford, and from thence, he marched two Days after to Dennington; but upon his Approach to the Castle, the Enemy drew off their Forces, and he put into the Garrison a Supply of such things as they wanted, and then drew off the Train of Artillery, and other Carriages which he left there: And hearing Sir William Waller was with an Army about Hungerford, he march'd thither to engage him, but they would not venture an Encounter, and from thence Sir Henry Gage was sent with a Party to relieve Basing-house; but before he came, the Besiegers drew off, and left the Work very easy to him. After these Performances, the King returned to Oxford, and disposed his Army to Winter Quarters; and there he was attended by the Earl of Denbeigh, and some of the House of Commons, as Commissioners from the Parliament, with Propositions for a Peace; which produced an Overture for a Message to be sent from him to the Parliament by the Duke of Richmond, and the Earl of Southampton, which was agreed to, and from thence a Treaty was had at Uxbridge, which began about the first of February after, of which we shall make further mention in its Place.

About the end of this Month Sir Alexander Carew, who was Governour of St. Nicholas Island at Plymouth, was tryed by a Court Martial for endeavouring to deliver up the Island to the King, and sentenced to be Beheaded, which Sentence was a few Days after executed upon him on Tower-Hill; and by the same Court Martial Sir John Hotham and his Son were in like manner arraigned, found guilty, and executed for designing to quit their Party, and by some Service to ingratiate a Return to their Allegiance to the King.

In this Heat, Roger L' Estrange, the Son of Sir Hammond L' Estrange of Norfolk, was condemned to dye by the same Court, being taken with a Commission for reducing of Lyn. He was betrayed by one Leman, and Haggard, under the horridest Oath of Secresy imaginable: He was sentenced by a pack'd Committee unheard: And upon his Appeal to the Lords, reprieved in order to a Hearing, which he expected almost four years, in Newgate, and came off at last without it.

By this severe and sanguinary way of proceeding, the Parliament made themselves very terrible, especially to their own Party, against whom any particular Crimes could be objected; but where the Offences were General, and the Persons of great Interest in their Army, they were more cautious in their Methods; and it happened at this time, that they were much perplexed at the ill Conduct of their Armies, in suffering the King to make that Progress he lately did in the Relief of Dennington and Basing-House; for by his Appearance there, the Quarters of the Parliament's Army on that side, were at Reading, Henly, Abington, and Farnham, and the King's Troops were quarter'd at Basing, Odiam, Newberry, Blewberry, and Marlborough.

Essex began to be suspected as careless or discontented, and Colonel Norton writ a Letter that he had received a Warrant from a chief Commander of the Army to withdraw from Basing; and the Earl of Manchester made a long Relation in Writing concerning the Carriage at Dennington, wherein he made his own Defence, but accused Colonel Cromwell. Upon this the House of Commons fell into Consideration of the slow Proceedings of their Armies, alledging that many of their Officers were deficient in not prosecuting Advantages, which tended to the Prolongation of the War, and that the Differences among their Commanders were commonly most where Command was the greatest; which produced this Resolution, viz. That no Member of either House of Parliament shall (during this War) enjoy or execute any Office or Command Military or Civil, which hath been granted or conferred on any Member of either House, or by any Authority derived from either House, and that an Ordinance be brought in to that Purpose.

This Vote and the Ordinance thereupon, was very much opposed by the Peers; but Petitions from the City and several Counties were framed and presented to move their Compliance, which in the End prevailed upon them: In the mean time, though it was now Winter, and not ordinarily a time of Action, the War went on in several Places, and several new Garrisons were made by both Parties, to the miserable Spoil and Destruction of the Country. Sir Jacob Ashley possessed himself 1644 himself of Cirencester with three Brigades of Foot and four Regiments of Horse, and became so formidable, that he commanded Contribution to the very Gates of Gloucester; nor were the Garrisons in Worcester, Hereford, and Bristol, less active; and Monmouth that had been before taken from the King, was regain'd by the Lord Herbert of Ragland. But in the midst of this good Fortune on the King's side, a Garrison was form'd at Abington, a Town within five Miles of Oxford, by order from the two Houses of Parliament, under the Command of Colonel Brown; the King and Council looking on, and suffering the Intrenchments to be made, the Works to be rais'd, and the Ordnance to be planted on the same. It cannot be denied, but that Sir Henry Gage, and many of the chief Commanders which were then in and about Oxford, offered their Service to the King, and earnestly desired leave to prevent that Mischief, which by the Intrenchments of this Town, must needs fall upon them. But the Lord George Digby, not long before made Principal Secretary of State, had perswaded the King unto the contrary, upon Assurance that he held Intelligence with Brown, and that as soon as the Town was fortified and furnished with Victuals, Arms and Ammunition, at the Charge of the Houses of Parliament, it would immediately be delivered into his Majesty's Hand. In which Design he was deluded, and expos'd to some loss of Reputation: For Brown having brought his Project to the highest Round of the Ladder (as himself expressed it) thought it high time to turn it off, and to declare himself for the two Houses against the King; printing not long after, all the Letters which passed between him and the Lord Digby upon this Occasion. But now when it was too late, Sir Henry Gage was sent with a commanded Party out of Oxford and Wallingford, to raise a Fort at Cullum Bridge within half a Mile of Abington, but the Design being discovered he was prevented, and in the Attempt unfortunately received a Shot, whereof wherein two Hours he died, and with him Lieutenant Colonel Lower, the Deputy Governor of Wallingford, and Major Green of that Garrison, with several others of great Courage and Reputation.

Archbishop Laud beheaded on Tower-Hill.

On the same Day, or the Day before, William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, was beheaded on Tower-hill, after he had been kept four Years a Prisoner in the Tower, his Rent sequestred, and his Books, Papers, and all his Goods seized; his Charge was, A constructive Treason under several Heads, reducible into two Particulars;

1. For endeavouring the Subversion of the Laws of the Land.
2. And a like endeavour to overthrow the Protestant Religion.

His Tryal was at the Lords Bar, and Mr. William Pryn of Lincoln-Inn, his profest Enemy, was made his Prosecutor, wherein nothing was omitted to aggravate his Offences, though when all that could be, was said, nothing that did amount to Treason could be proved against him; but the Scots who were at that time very prevalent, would not be satisfied unless he were put to Death, to manifest thereby their Zeal against the Episcopal Hierarchy, to usher in the Presbyterian Government at the approaching Treaty, so that by an Ordinance of Lords and Commons, he was adjudged guilty of High-Treason, though at the passing thereof in the House of Peers, there were but seven present, viz. * the Earls of Kent, Pembroke, Salisbury, and Bullingbrook, and the Lords North, Grey, and Bruce.

He ended his Life with such a modest Confidence and so much Piety, that his greatest Enemies then present, who came to behold the Execution with Hearts full of Joy, returned back with Eyes as full of Tears.

In pursuance of several Messages from the King for a Treaty, it was assented to by the Parliament, and at Uxbridge Commissioners met on the 30th of January for the King, on one Part, and for the Parliament of England and the Parliament of Scotland on the other.

The first things to be treated on, were,

1. Religion.
2. The Militia.
3. Ireland.

The Matters of the Treaty.

The first Paper at the Opening of the Treaty was concerning Religion, which was delivered from the King's Commissioners to the others, in these Words;

1. That Freedom be left to all Persons of what Opinion soever in Matters of Ceremony, and that all the Penalties of the Laws and Customs which enjoin these Penalties be suspended.
2. That the Bishops shall exercise no Act of Jurisdiction, or Ordination, without the Consent and Counsel of the Presbyters, who shall be chosen by the Clergy of each Diocese, of the Learnedst and gravest Ministers of that Diocese.
3. That the Bishop keep his constant Residence in his Diocese, except when he shall be required by His Majesty to attend him on any Occasion; that if he be not hindered by the infirmity of Old Age or Sickness, he Preach every Sunday in some Church within his Diocese.
4. That the Ordination of Ministers shall be always in the publick and solemn Manner, and very strict Rules observed concerning the Sufficiency and other Qualifications of those Men who shall be received

5. That competent Maintenance be established by Parliament, to such Vicarages as belong to Bishops, Deans and Chapters, out of the Improvements, according to the Value of several Parishes.

6. That no Man shall be capable of two Parsonages or Vicarages with Cure of Souls.

7. That toward the settling of the publick Peace, 100000 l. shall be raised by Parliament, out of the Estates of Bishops Deans and Chapters, in such manner as the King and Parliament shall think fit, without the Alienation of any of the said Lands.

8. That the Jurisdiction in Causes Testamentary, Decimals and Matrimonials, be settled in such a manner as shall seem most convenient by the King and Parliament. And likewise that Acts to be passed for regulating of Visitations, and against immoderate Fees in Ecclesiastical Courts, and Abuses by frivolous Excommunications, and all other Abuses in Ecclesiastical Jurisdictions, as shall be agreed upon by King and Parliament.

And if the Parliaments Commissioners will insist upon any other things which they shall think necessary for Religion, the King's Commissioners shall very willingly apply themselves to the Consideration thereof.

The Parliament Commissioners, after they had perused this Paper, delivered one of theirs to the King's Commissioners, which was as followeth :

That a Bill be passed for abolishing of all Arch-Bishops, Bishops, &c. according to the Third Proposition.

That the Ordinances concerning the Calling and Sitting of the Assembly of Divines, be confirmed by Act of Parliament.

That the Directory for publick Worship, already passed both Houses, and the Propositions concerning Church-Government annexed and passed both Houses, be enacted as a Part of Reformation of Religion and Uniformity, according to the First Proposition.

That his Majesty take the Solemn League and Covenant, and that the Covenants be enjoined to be taken according to the Second Proposition.

To this was annexed the following Paper.

That the ordinary way of dividing Christians into distinct Congregations, and most expedient for Edification, is by the respective Bounds of their Dwellings.

That the Minister and the Church-Officers in each Congregation, shall join in the Government of the Church, as shall be established by Parliament.

That many particular Congregations shall be under one Presbyterial Government.

That the Church be governed by Congregational, Classial, and Synodical Assemblies, to be established by Parliament.

That Synodical Assemblies shall consist both of Provincial and National Assemblies.

These Papers were debated on three Days without any Determination on any one Controverted Point, and on the 4th of February, the Parliament Commissioners delivered in the following Proposals concerning the Militia.

We desire that the Subjects of England may be armed, trained, and disciplined as the Parliament shall think fit; and that the like be for Scotland, as the Parliament there shall think fit; and that his Majesty give his Royal Assent to the Acts following.

1. An Act for Settling the Admiralty, and all Forces at Sea, and Moneys thereto for Maintenance, to be as the Parliament shall think fit. The like for Scotland.

2. An Act for settling all Forces by Sea and Land in Commissioners to be named by Parliament, to be such as both Kingdoms shall confide in, with Power to suppress all Powers and Forces contrary thereto, and to act as they shall be directed by Parliament.

And so for the Kingdom of Scotland.

That the Militia of the City of London, and the Parishes without London, and the Liberties within the weekly Bills of Mortality, be in the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council.

That the Tower of London may be in the Government of the City, and the chief Officers thereof nominated, and removable by the Common-Council.

That the Citizens or Forces of London may not be drawn out of the City without their own Consent, and the Example of drawing them out in these distracted times, may be no Precedent for the Future.

These Papers were likewise debated three Days, and then the Parliament Commissioners presented a Paper concerning Ireland to this Effect.

That His Majesty give His Royal Assent to an Act to make void the Cessation of Ireland, and all Treaties of the Rebels without Consent of Parliament, and to settle the Prosecution of the War of Ireland in the Parliament, to be managed by the joint Advice of both Kingdoms, and His Majesty to assist, and to do no Act to discountenance or molest them therein.

The King's Commissioners in the Debate of this Proposition, did lay open the eminent and inevitable Necessity which caused the King to make the Irish Cessation, which he was in Honour obliged to make good; nevertheless they offered to condescend to any thing for the Security of the King's Protestant Subjects: But the Parliament Commissioners were so bound up by their Instructions, that they could admit of no Alteration of what they offered.

The Matter of Religion was then resumed, and that was to be concluded before they proceeded to any other Proposition. But so many Difficulties occurred in the Debate thereon, that no Accord could be made; for the Parliament to endear the Scots to them, had caused every Member of each House to take the Scotch Covenant, whereby they bound themselves to the Preservation of the Religion of Scotland, in Doctrine, Worship, Discipline and Government; and, to endeavour the Extirpation of Episcopacy, and the Reformation of Religion in England and Ireland, according to the Example of the best Reformed Churches. Whereby they could mean nothing less than to bring them to the Discipline of Scotland, because they had sworn to the Preservation of the Religion there: Moreover, they had sworn in this Covenant against detestable Indifference

The Scotch Covenant taken by both Houses.

1644 ferency and Neutrality, (to keep their own Words) whereby it seemed apparent, that tho' at first the Contrivers of this Oath pretended only for Liberty of Conscience, they now would allow none to any: Wherefore the King's Commissioners were at a stand; for the King took himself bound by the Oath of his Coronation, not to alter the Government of the Church, and they were bound by their Instructions to insist thereon; so that the Treaty became desperate upon this Account, though on the King's Part it was offered, That if the Articles proposed by them, did not give Satisfaction, that then so great an Alteration as the total Abolishment of a Government established by Law, might (for the Imparance of it, and any Reformation in Doctrine for the Scandal of it) be suspended, 'till after the Disbanding of all Armies, when the King should be present with the Parliament, and calling a National Synod, might receive such Advice both from the one and the other, as should be necessary; and as any Reformation thus calmly made, would needs prove for the singular Benefit, so whether the contrary, that is an Alteration even to things, though in themselves good, could by the Principles of Christian Religion, be enforced upon the King or Kingdom.

The Treaty proves ineffectual.

This would not be admitted, and the time allowed for the Treaty being but twenty Days, nothing was effected therein; for the Parliament were resolved to have no Peace but on their own Terms, believing all the King's Proposals for Peace, to proceed either from an Inability to hold out the War, or from the Weakness and Irresolutions of his Council.

Shrewsbury taken.

After this, followed the taking of Shrewsbury, a Place of very great Importance to the King, as the Gate which opened into Wales, situate on a rising Ground, and almost encompassed about by the River Severn; that Part which is not environed by Water, being wholly taken up and made good by a very strong Castle. By the loss of which Town the King's former Intercourse with his Loyal Subjects of North Wales was not only hindered, but a present Stop was given to an Association which was then upon the Point of concluding between the Counties of Salop, Flint, Chester, Worcester, &c. to the great Prejudice of the King's Affairs in those Parts of the Kingdom.

Pomfret Castle relieved by Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and the Lord Fairfax's Army defeated.

But to make a Recompence, in some Measure, for this great Loss, about the beginning of March this Year, Pomfret Castle in Yorkshire, was relieved by Sir Marmaduke Langdale, who there defeated the Lord Fairfax's Army that lay before it; and in his going thither, he defeated a great Party of the Parliament's Forces, commanded by Colonel Rossiter, near Melton-Mowbray in Leicestershire.

The Prince of Wales sent into the West to perfect the Association.

The King at this time thought fit to send the Prince of Wales into the West, to perfect the Association which had been begun in the end of the last Summer, and in those Countries to advance such further Forces as might not only serve for the Defence of themselves, but give some reasonable Increase to his Army; so that upon the fifth of March he set forwards toward Bristol, accompanied by the Lord Culpepper and Sir Edward Hyde, as his principal Counsellors, and some of the chief Gentry of the West, 1644 who were of most Authority in their several Countries.

The King having advised with such of the Members of both Houses of Parliament as had assembled at Oxford, from their last Meeting in November, after their Prorogation, to the tenth of March; He then being resolved for Action, dismissed them to their several Countries.

And now both Sides prepare for Action, in 1645. order whereunto, the Parliament had passed their Ordinance which they called Self-denying, wherein all and every the Members of either House were to be discharged of all their Command, Military or Civil, and in Pursuance thereof, they elected Sir Thomas Fairfax to be General of their Army, which they now modelled out of their other Armies, consisting of eleven Regiments of Horse, and ten Regiments of Foot. Oliver Cromwell, though a Member of the House of Commons, was particularly excepted out of the Ordinance, and so was Skippon the Major-General, and Ireton the Commissary-General of the Horse; and to make way for these Officers, the Earls of Essex, Manchester, and Denbigh, surrendered their Commissions in the Lords House, and the Earl of Warwick also surrendered his Commission of Admiral.

The Parliament pass their Self-denying Ordinance. Sir Thomas Fairfax made General of their Army. Cromwell, Skippon, and Ireton excepted out of their Ordinance. Essex, Manchester, and Denbigh surrender their Commissions, and Warwick his Admiralship. Fairfax goes to Windso to gather up his Army.

April the third, Sir Thomas Fairfax sets forth for Windso, where he applies himself to the gathering together of his Army, to which Place Lieutenant-General Cromwell came to him, and was immediately ordered to march towards Oxford, with a Brigade of one thousand one hundred Horse and Dragoons, to intercept a Convoy of Horse, which Prince Rupert had sent from Worcester to fetch off the King from Oxford with his Train of Artillery, and some Foot with Intention to take the Field; and at Ips, Cromwell falls upon them, which after some Dispute he routed, and took divers Prisoners, and about two hundred Horse, and from thence he pursued several of them that escaped to Blechingdon House, where Colonel Windebank kept a Garrison for the King, which was surrendered to him upon the first Summons, but the Colonel was soon after condemned by a Court of War at Oxford, and shot to Death for parting so easily with the Place. A few Days after Cromwell marches to Farrington, and assaulted that Garrison, but was repulsed with the loss of near two hundred Men, besides many that were wounded and taken Prisoners. The King perceiving that Fairfax intended to besiege Oxford, sent for Prince Rupert and General Goring to march to him thither, and these about the beginning of May came to Oxford and fetch'd off the King, who quickly increased his Army, and advanced with it towards the Relief of Chester; but Goring returned to the Siege of Taunton, from whence he had been called to this Service.

Fairfax in Commiseration of the distressed Condition of Taunton, marched with his Army to the Relief of it as far as Blandford; but upon second Thoughts, he sends Colonel Welden with near two thousand Horse and Dragoons, and five hundred Foot to Taunton, and returns to Newberry, where he receives an Express to march to Oxford, 1645. Oxford, and lay close Siege to it: In the mean time Welden makes haste to Taunton, and the King's Forces before the Town being informed it was the whole Army, resolved to give one furious Assault, and if that took not effect, to quit the Place; which was performed, and they entred the Town, and fired two Streets, but the Governour retired to the Castle, and they could not force that, wherefore they drew off, and suffered Colonel Welden to enter the Town; but Goring, Greenvil, and Barkley uniting their Forces together, did so press upon Welden, that they besieged him and the Town again. By this time the King had relieved Chester, and from thence marched to Leicester, and taken it by Assault, wherein were many Prisoners of Note, and good store of Arms and Ammunition, and from thence he went to Darventry. Fairfax having Intelligence as he lay at the Siege of Oxford, of this fortunate Progress of the King's Arms, was resolved to raise his Siege, and march directly towards him, with an Intent to give him Battle; and in Pursuance hereof, on the fifth of June his Army rendezvous'd at Great Brickhill, and from thence he marched to Gilbrough, within four Miles of Northampton, and five Miles of Brough-hill, which was one of the Quarters of the Royalists.

The King relieves Chester, and takes Leicester by Assault.

The King hereupon drew off from Brough-hill, minding to march Northward to the Relief of Pomfret, which was again besieged; but Fairfax being eager to engage, sent Ireton with a flying Party of Horse, who fell into Naseby Town, and took many Prisoners, giving such an Alarm to the whole Army, that the King at Midnight left his own Quarters, and for Security hastened to Harborough, where he raised Prince Rupert, and called a Council of War, where it was resolved to give Battle; and because Fairfax had been so forward, they would not stay for him, but seek him out, and at a Place near Naseby in Northamptonshire the two Armies met on Saturday the fourteenth of June.

The Fight at Naseby.

The King himself commanded the main Body, Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice the Right-Wing, Sir Marmaduke Langdale the Left, the Earl of Lindsey, and the Lord Abley the Right-Hand Reserve, the Lord Bard and Sir George Lisle the Left. Of the Parliament's Army, Fairfax and Skippon commanded the main Body, Cromwell the Right-Wing, with whom was Rositer, who came with his Forces but a little before the Fight; and Ireton had the Left: The Reserves were brought up by Rainsborough, Hammond and Pride. Prince Rupert charged the Parliament's Left-Wing, commanded by Ireton, who made a notable Resistance, but at last was forced to give Ground, Ireton himself being run through the Thigh with a Pike, and into the Face with a Halbert, his Horse shot under him, and himself taken Prisoner. For a while Prince Rupert follows the Chase almost to Naseby Town, and in his Return summoned the Train, who made no other Answer but with their Fire-Locks: But in the mean time Cromwell charg'd furiously on the King's Left-Wing, and got the better, forcing them from the Body, and prosecuting the Advantage, quite broke them and their Reserve; during which, the main Bodies had charged one another with incredible Fierceness, often retreating and rallying, falling in together with the But-Ends of their Muskets, and coming to handy-Blows with their Swords: But Fairfax's Foot coming up seasonably to the Horse, and Cromwell coming in with his victorious Right-Wing, they all charged together upon the King's main Army, who maintain'd the Fight 'till over-born with fresh Numbers; and being out of Condition to dispute it any longer, retired out of the Field toward Leicester, in the greatest Disorder and Confusion imaginable, leaving (as Heaven would have it) a compleat Victory to the Parliamentarians, who pursued them within two Miles of Leicester; and the King finding the Pursuit so hot, leaves that Town and hastens to Litchfield. This Battle was exceeding bloody, both Armies being very courageous and numerous, not being five hundred odds, fought in a large fallow Field on the North-West Side of Naseby, about a Mile broad, which Space of Ground was wholly taken up: On the Parliament's Side were wounded and slain above a thousand Officers and private Soldiers: Major General Skippon, who was an old experienced Soldier, and was ordered to draw up the form of the Battle, fought stoutly that Day; and although he was sorely wounded in the beginning of the Fight, and the General desired him to go off the Field, he answered, he would not stir so long as a Man would stand, and accordingly staid 'till the Battle was ended. Ireton, as is said before, was dangerously hurt, and taken Prisoner for a while, after he had done his Part; but in the Confusion of the Fight got loose again, and saw the Victory atchieved. The General and Lieutenant-General performed their Work with sufficient Resolution (had their Cause been as good) and by their own Examples infused Valour into their Followers; so likewise did the other Officers, of whom divers were wounded.

On the other Side, the King shew'd himself that Day a courageous General, keeping close with his Horse, and himself in Person rallying them to hot Encounters: The Earl of Lindsey, Lord Abley, Col. Rastol, and others were wounded, twenty Colonels, Knights, and Officers of Note, and six hundred private Soldiers slain: But much more was the Damage that the King sustained by what was taken; viz. six Colonels, eight Lieutenant-Colonels, eighteen Majors, seventy Captains, and seventy Lieutenants, two hundred Ensigns, and other inferior Officers; four thousand five hundred common Soldiers, and many Women; thirteen of the King's Household Servants, four of his Footmen, twelve Pieces of Ordnance, eight thousand Arms, forty Barrels of Powder, two hundred Carriages, all their Bag and Baggage, with store of rich Pil-lage; three thousand Horse, the King's Standard, one of the King's Coaches, and his Cabinet of Letters and Papers, which were after published by the Parliament (with less Decency and Civility then became such an Assembly). Sir Marmaduke Langdale hastened away the same Night to Newark. The next Day General Fairfax sent up Col. John Fiennes to London, with the Prisoners and Colours taken in the Fight.

1645. The King having saved himself by Flight, gathered together some part of his scattered Forces, but never was able to make Head against the Conquerors, losing this Year one Garrison after another, till his whole Strength was almost reduc'd to Oxford. I shall take notice only of some of the Principal; namely, Leicester, Carlisle, Pomfract-Castle, Bridgwater, Scarborough, Bristol, Hereford, and West Chester, on which so great a part of his Affairs did most especially depend.

Leicester and Carlisle surrendered up to the Parliament.

On the 16th of June, Fairfax sat down before Leicester, and summoned the Governour, the Lord Hastings, to deliver up the Town, which he refusing, Warrants were issued for the Country to bring in Ladders and other Necessaries for a Storm; and Hastings continuing yet obstinate, he assailed it in several Places, and at the Newark Side he made so wide a Breach, that the Governour desired a Parley, which was granted; and thereupon a surrendering ensued upon very fair Terms. There were in the Town fourteen Pieces of Ordnance, thirty Colours, two thousand Arms, five hundred Horse, fifty Barrels of Powder, and Ammunition proportionable; and about a Week after, Sir Thomas Glemham, Governour of Carlisle, having been long besieged by the Parliament Forces, and despairing of Succours, yielded up the Town. The low Condition of Col. Welden, and the Town of Taunton, caused the Committee of both Kingdoms to order Gen. Fairfax to march thither, which he readily obeyed; but upon his Approach to the Town, General Goring, on the 10th of July, drew off from Taunton, and retreated to Langport. The next Day Fairfax being at Long-Sutton, within two Miles of Langport, he drew out his Forces early in the Morning in Sutton-Field; Goring likewise drew forth at that time, and took a Pass leading to Bridgwater, and lined the Way to it with Musqueteers: Fairfax sent Major Bethel to force the Pass, but he was repulsed; then Desbrough was sent with two Hundred Horse, who press'd so hard upon the Royalists, that they were put to a disorderly Retreat into Langport, setting one End of the Town on Fire, that the Smoke thereof might hinder the Enemies Pursuit of them; but Lieutenant General Cromwell, with some Troops press'd through, and pursued them within two Miles of Bridgwater.

In this Fight Goring lost about two hundred of his Men, who were slain, and about fourteen hundred taken Prisoners, of which Col. Brel-trige, and Col. Slingsby, were the chief. On Fairfax's Side, Col. Cook, Col. Butler, and Major Bethel were wounded, and a Captain of Butler's slain, and about a hundred of the Soldiers killed and wounded.

Sir John Digby, who was Major-General of the Horse to Goring, was shot in the Elbow, and carried into Bridgwater, where shortly after he died of his Wound, and was very much lamented by his Party; he was about forty five Years of Age at the time of his Death, and in all his Life was scarce ever heard to swear or seem angry; he had very great Courage and Conduct in Martial Affairs, and was competently learned also in many Sciences. Goring

after he had refreshed himself for some time in Bridgwater, march'd away to the North of Devonshire: Sir Thomas Fairfax presently thereupon sits down before Bridgwater, and summon'd the Town; but being resolutely denied by Sir Edmond Windham, the Governour, he storm'd the lower Part thereof, which is divided from the rest by a Bridge, and gain'd it; and the next Day he shot hot Steel Plugs into the Town, by which means, and by some Intelligence he had with the Town, most of the Houses that were thatch'd were fired; whereby the Townsmen were so distracted, that they left the Works, and flung down their Arms to endeavour to save their Houses. In the midst of this Consternation, Fairfax sent a Trumpeter in to the Governour, whereby he acquainted him, that he purposed to assault the Town, but in Compassion to the Women and Children therein, he offered to permit, as many of them as desired it, to go out of the Town; upon this, there was so great a Distraction in the Garrison, that the Governour was forced to yield to a Treaty; and thereupon, on the 23d of July, the Town was surrender'd upon Condition only of fair Quarter, but all, except Townsmen, that were in Arms, to be Prisoners at War, of which there were a thousand Officers and Soldiers; and in their Stores they found forty four Barrels of Powder, and four hundred Weight of Match; and in the Town forty four Pieces of Ordnance, and fifteen hundred Arms: And two Days before, Pomfract-Castle, after three Months Siege, was delivered up to Major-General Pointz, upon Condition, for the Officers and Soldiers to march away with their Arms, Drums beating, Colours flying, and Bullet in Mouth, with six Shot of Powder, and Bullet proportionable: And on the 25th of July, the Castle of Scarborough had the like Fate, it being then surrender'd, by Sir Hugh Cholmley, the Governour, to Sir Matthew Boynton, who commanded the Forces before it, upon very honourable Conditions; amongst which it was provided, that the Governour, and all his Officers, and Soldiers, should have a safe Convoy to Newark; and from thence, after six Days notice, as many as desired should have a Pass to go into Holland, or any other Place abroad; and none were to be plundered or forced to take up Arms against their Wills, but have Passes to go home if they desired them. They had kept this Castle so well, that at the Delivery thereof, many of the Officers and Soldiers were so sick and weak, that they were brought out in Sheets: There were about thirty five Pieces of Ordnance in the Castle, besides many Arms, but very little Victuals or Ammunition.

Bristol comes next, a Place conveniently seated for the Trade of Spain, the River capable of great Ships, and the Port well guarded: At the taking of this City by the King's Forces, to such Strength as before it had, there was added a Fort-Royal, then conceived impregnable. Into this City Prince Rupert had put himself at the present, and was besieged not long after by General Fairfax, who came before it on the 25th of August. The Prince made several Sallies, and did some Execution upon the Enemy, but not without considerable Loss to his own Party; amongst

Pomfract-Castle delivered up to Gen. Pointz.

Scarborough-Castle surrendered to Sir Matthew Boynton.

1645. amongst which, Sir Bernard Aspley, and Sir Richard Crane, died of Wounds they received in one of them.

Fairfax had Intelligence that the Works in many Places were very weak and imperfect, and withal, he heard that the King did purpose to join with Goring to raise the Siege, but first expected that they should weary themselves so long before the Town, till he should be able to draw together a Force sufficient for such an Enterprize: Upon Consideration whereof, a Council of War was called, and Resolution taken to storm the City, which was done in this Order: Colonel Fortescue, with four Regiments on Somersetshire Side; Colonel Montague, with the like Number on both Sides of Lawford-Gate; and Colonel Rainsborough, on this Side the River From, from the Sally-port to the Fryers-port; and other Regiments were disposed in several Stations to second the Assaults and enter the Lines: Fortescue fail'd in his Attempt, but Montague and Rainsborough effected their Business; and Rainsborough possess'd himself of Fryers-port; and all the other Forts, except the great Fort, were taken: The Way being thus made by the Foot, the Horse entered the Town, and the Prince's Horse hastened to get themselves into the Fort-Royal; but the Parliamentarians from the Fryers-port did so command the Gate and Entrance into the great Fort, that none could go in or out; so that the next Day a Parley was had, and Articles concluded on for the Surrender thereof; and in the Place they had above two hundred Pieces of Ordnance, eight thousand Arms, two hundred Barrels of Powder, eighty Tun of Beer, and great store of other Provisions. In the Storm, on the King's Side, Major Price, Major Williams, and ten other Officers were slain, and many Soldiers, and Colonel Taylor wounded. On the Parliament Side, Lieutenant-Colonel Purefoy, and Captain Hill, and Major Cromwell, with thirty more Officers were killed; and Major Bethel, Major Gettings, with some others of less Note were wounded. The Prince, on the 11th of September, march'd out of the City with eight Lords in his Company, five hundred Horse, and fourteen hundred Foot; the Foot march'd with their Musquets and other Arms; but when they came within twenty Miles of Oxford, they were to lay them down.

Bristol being thus reduced, Fairfax march'd into the West, towards the Prince of Wales, who was now in the middle Parts of Devonshire, intending to take in Exeter, but there were so many Blocks in his Way, that it was a long time after, before he gained that City, as will be hereafter related.

The quick Surrender of Bristol did much trouble the King, for he thought that City so well fortified and furnished with Victuals, Arms, and Ammunition, would rather have given a turn to his Affairs, by the Ruin of the Parliament Army against it, than otherways; but the Line being so very large, they had hardly Men enough to Man the Works, especially being kept by frequent Alarms upon continual Duty; so that in the end, partly out of Weariness, and partly out of Discouragement to see the Parliament carry all before them, the Prince was necessitated to deliver it up, for the People would stand by him no longer. Soon after this Disaster, Col. Legg was removed from his Government of Oxford, and Sir Thomas Glemham appointed in his stead.

Hereford next followed the same Fortune of Bristol, which having been besieged by the Scots, from the 13th of July to the 1st of September, (at which time they were forced to draw off upon News that their Help was required in their own Kingdom, where Montrose was very prevalent, having defeated an Army imployed against him in a Battle fought in Kelsie Field near Glasgow): The Town was suddenly surprized by Colonel Birch and Colonel Morgan, (the last then Governour of Gloucester) on the 18th of December. The King a little before this time had got a small Army together in Wales, and seeing Bristol lost, was very desirous to free Chester (a City of very great Importance in those Parts of the Kingdom) from the Siege then before it, by Sir William Brereton, Colonel Jones, and others; to effect which, he march'd with his Army, consisting of about five thousand Men and most Horse, to relieve the Town; but in his March towards it, he was fought by General Pointz at Routon-Moor, within two Miles of Chester, where being out-power'd with Numbers, his Army was worsted; and amongst others, the L. Bernard Stuart, Brother to the Duke of Richmond then newly made Earl of Litchfield, was slain: He was a young Nobleman of great Hopes, and therefore was his Loss very much lamented by the King. Upon this Discomfiture, the King drew his broken Army towards the North-East, and commanded the Lord Digby, and Sir Marmaduke Langdale, to march for Scotland, and to join with the Marquess of Montrose, who was very successful there, and only wanted Horse to enable him to reduce that whole Kingdom to the King's Obedience. These in Obedience to their Order marched Northward, and at a Village called Sherborne, they surprized seven hundred of the Parliament Foot, with their Arms and Baggage; but staying there for Carriages, some of General Pointz's Forces commanded by Colonel Copley, Colonel Lilborne, and Colonel Allured, fell upon them, and routed them, killing and taking about a hundred Officers, three hundred common Soldiers, six hundred Horse, with their Furniture, and the Lord Digby's Coach and Horses, and therein his Cabinet of Letters: But he with his Remains of his shatter'd Brigade, making towards Scotland, was a second time met upon Carlisle Sands, and utterly defeated, he himself escaping to the Isle of Man, from whence he got a Passage into Ireland. The King was got to Newark when this Misfortune happened to the Lord Digby; but so great was the Discontent he found there, that he was put to much Trouble thereby. Sir Richard Willis was a little before removed from the Government of the Town, and the Lord Bellasis made Governour thereof in his Place; which Alteration caused great Heats among several noble Persons, as they stood severally affected to either Party, insomuch that Indelicencies of Language and Behaviour passed even in Fairfax marches into the West to the Prince of Wales.

1645. in the King's Presence; and the Feud, in all probability, had proceeded further, if his Majesty had not interposed with his Royal Authority to compose it. But all this was not yet sufficient to extinguish the Animosities which were contracted upon this Dispute; although for the present they were so far pacified and allayed, as not openly to break out into any notorious Act of Violence or Mischief. This Matter hath been reported several Ways, and all with so great Uncertainty, that I have rather chosen to deliver the Truth in Generals, than to run the hazard of a Mistake in a more particular Relation. In the close of this Affair, the two Princes, Gerard, the Lord Hawley, and Sir Richard Willis, with some others of their Friends, retired to Norton-House, fourteen Miles from Newark; from whence they sent to the Parliament for a Pass to transport them out of the Kingdom, and obtained it.

The two Princes, Gerard, Lord Hawley, and Willis, depart the Kingdom.

Basing-house taken by storm, and in it the Marquess of Winchester. Shelford-house taken by storm, and Col. Stanhope, with many others slain.

The King leaves Newark, and comes safe to Oxford, whither the two Princes came to him and regain his Favour.

The King sends Offers of Peace to the Parliament, but they would not consent to any other Terms of Accommodation, than to have all their Demands drawn up into Bills, to be presented to him for his Assent: Yet in the mean time the King omitted not to use all ways in his Power to relieve his Garrisons; and the Prince of Wales in the West was very active: But the Spirits of Men became so much depressed by the vigorous Progress of the Parliament's Troops, that nothing succeeded.

Dartmouth surrender'd and two Days after, Dartmouth was surrender'd to Fairfax.

These Traverses were accompanied with unwelcome Intelligence from most Places; for about this time the King received the ill News of the taking from him of Basing-House by Storm, (the Defendants not having a sufficient number to man their Works) and therein the Marquess of Winchester, who had long and gallantly defended his House, taken Prisoner, with about two hundred others, and about a hundred were slain in the Defence of the Place. And as one Misfortune is commonly followed by another, he had Notice about the same time of the Loss of Shelford-House taken by Storm, wherein the Governour, Colonel Stanhope, a Son of the Earl of Chesterfield, and near two hundred more were killed after the House was entered.

Newark at this time, became so in-secure, that the King thought it inconvenient to continue longer therein, and therefore with a Guard of three hundred Horse, he got safe to Oxford on the 3d of November; and thither the Princes, Rupert and Maurice, came to him from Worcester, after a serious Reflection upon themselves for their Miscarriages towards him, and were perfectly reconciled to his Favour.

The King's Forces, in most Parts, became very much lessened, and though by the Endeavours of the Queen, and some of his Ministers abroad, foreign Aids was promised him against the next Summer; yet the King, in Affection to his People, was rather inclined to try all other Ways, than accept of those Succours; and to that Purpose, from the 15th of December to the 23d of March following, he sent nine or ten Messages to the Parliament with Offers of Peace; and for the better Accomplishment thereof, he proposed to have a personal Treaty with them, but they would not consent to any other Terms of Accommodation, than to have all their Demands drawn up into Bills, to be presented to him for his Assent: Yet in the mean time the King omitted not to use all ways in his Power to relieve his Garrisons; and the Prince of Wales in the West was very active: But the Spirits of Men became so much depressed by the vigorous Progress of the Parliament's Troops, that nothing succeeded.

The Siege of Plymouth was raised by Fairfax; and two Days after, Dartmouth was surrender'd to him by Sir Hugh Pollard, the Governour thereof: And from thence he marched to Exeter, and summon'd it, and there he left Sir Hardress Waller to block up the City, whilst himself, with the rest of his Forces, went to find out the Prince's Army, then commanded by the Lord Hopton, he himself being gone into Cornwall to raise the Trained-Bands, and what other Soldiers he could, to strengthen his Troops. Whilst these things were acting in the West, the King at Oxford was again intent upon the Relief of Chester; and for that Service several Forces were by Sir William Vaughan drawn out of the Garrisons of Hereford, Ludlow, Worcester and Bridge-north, who with seven hundred Horse, and seven hundred Foot, advanced to his Relief; but the Enemy drawing out a Party of one thousand four hundred Horse, and a thousand Foot, encountered and utterly routed him; so that after this Attempt, all Hopes of Relief failing, on the same Day the City was delivered up to Sir William Brereton.

The King's Forces sent to the Relief of Chester, routed; and the City delivered up to Sir William Brereton.

And on the same Day Belvoir Castle was by Sir Gervase Lucas surrendered to General Pointz, upon Conditions, that the Governour and his Lady, with the Officers and Soldiers, were with a Convoy conducted to Litchfield. At Torrington in Devonshire, Fairfax found the Lord Hopton with his Army, which he resolved to engage; Hopton having the lesser Number, drew up his Men into several Clofes, and Fairfax press'd upon him very hard; but a great Part of the time was spent in Skirmishes by several Parties, 'till both retired; at length the forlorn Hopes of both Armies engaged; that of the Parliament's, with its Reserve, was at first beaten back to the main Body of their Army, but that advancing, the Fight began about eight o'Clock at Night, nigh the Town, to which the Royalists retreated; and there they maintained the Charge so resolutely, that had not Fairfax's Soldiers been heartened with fresh Supplies, they had utterly given it over: But the other over-power'd by their fresh Numbers, gave back, whereby the Enemy gained the Town; which being entered into, the Magazine in the great Church was fired by a Train, and destroyed Fairfax more Men than he had lost in the Battle; for there was no less than eighty Barrels of Powder. Upon the firing of the Magazine, Sir John Digby took Advantage of the Enemies Amazement, and gave them a resolute Charge, in which he did some Execution, and so fell off, and marched with the rest of the Forces into Cornwall; whither Fairfax follow'd with so much Speed, that he compelled the Royalists in disorder to quit Launceston; whereupon the Prince of Wales marched away towards Pendennis Castle, accompanied with the Lord Capel, the Lord Culpepper, and Sir Edward Hyde, and took Shipping there on the 1st of March, and arrived safe at Scilly. The Lord Hopton soon after finding it in vain to make Resistance with his broken Army, being summoned by Fairfax to disband, consented to it upon very honourable Conditions: But having experienced how ill Articles had been observed, and being likewise sensible of the ill Effects of the King's gracious Proposals for Peace, he chose, rather than to go to Oxford, (whither

After the disbanding of these Forces, all the King's Garrisons and Forts in Cornwall yielded, except Pendennis Castle, and St. Michael's Mount, and General Fairfax returned to the Siege of Exeter.

All these Mischances thus happening on the Neck of one another, all the King's Hopes and Expectation rested upon the coming of Sir Jacob Astley, created Lord Astley of Reading two Years since; who having kept together some Remains of the King's Forces since the Fight near Chester, and increasing them with the Accession of some fresh Supplies, marched towards the King, and was to have been met upon the way by Sir John Campsfield, with the Oxford Horse. But either through the want of Intelligence, or the Necessity of Fate, or some occasional Delays, it was so long before Campsfield was upon his March, that the News came of the Lord Astley's being vanquished by Colonel Morgan, at a Place called Dunnington, near Stow on the Wold, on the 21st of March; in which Fight himself was taken Prisoner; and with him all the King's Hopes were lost of preserving Oxford, 'till he could better his Conditions.

The King having often sent to the Parliament (as hath been said) to invite them to a Treaty of Peace, offering to come to Westminster in Person, had, on the 30th of March, a Message from the Parliament, wherein they told him, That it would be unsafe for him or them to return to Westminster, until he had assented to the Propositions which they were framing, &c. And to prevent his coming to London without their Knowledge and Consent, they voted, That if the King should come, or attempt to come within the Lines of Communication; that then the Committee of the Militia of London should have Power, and were thereby enjoined to apprehend and secure such as should come with him, to prevent Resort unto him, and to secure his Person.

The Parliament Vote against the King's coming to London in order to a Treaty.

Exeter was at this time so much distressed, and without Possibility of Relief, that the City was on the 13th of April surrendered to Fairfax upon very good Conditions; Sir John Berkley, the Governour, was to march out with his Soldiers, both Cornish and others, in the Height of Honour, with Drums beating, Colours flying, Bullet in Mouth, Matches lighted, &c. The first into their Country, and the others to Oxford. The Princess Henrietta, youngest Daughter to the King, (who ever since her Birth had continued in this City, under the Care of the Lady Dalkeith) was sent up to London, there to be disposed of by the Parliament, 'till soon after she was by her Governess conveyed privately to her Mother in France. To the Fortune of Exeter, Barnstable Town and Fort, St. Michael's Mount, Dunston Castle, Woodstock, and many other Garrisons soon after submitted; so that Fairfax's victorious Army, having cleared the West, was now resolved to march up to a close Beleaguering of Oxford, (which had some time before been extremely straitened by the continual Alarms of Fleetwood and Rainsborough) which made the King begin to think of some way for his safety; and at last, on the 27th of April, the King, disguised, departed out of Oxford, and accompanied only with Mr. Hudson a Minister, and Mr. John Ashburnham, and few or none else were acquainted with this Design; so that tho' many knew that he was gone, yet various were the Opinions whither; some said to Wales, others to Montross in Scotland; but the most general Opinion was, that he was come up and lay in London concealed: To discover which, the Parliament passed an Order, That whatsoever Person should Harbour or Conceal, or know of the Harbours or Concealing of the King's Person, and should not immediately reveal it to the Speakers of both Houses, shall be proceeded against as a Traytor to the Commonwealth, forfeit his whole Estate, and die without Mercy. But contrary to all Mens Expectations, he is at length heard of at the Scots Camp before Newark; many wondered how he durst trust his Person with them; but the Parliament having Notice of it, immediately Ordered that the Commissioners, and the General of the Scottish Army should be desired, That his Majesty's Person might be disposed of, as the two Houses should desire and direct, and that he be thence disposed of, and sent to Warwick Castle; and, That John Ashburnham, and the rest that came with him into the Scots Quarters, should be sent for, as Delinquents, by the Sergeants at Arms, and that the Commissioners of the Parliament, residing before Newark, should make a Narrative of the King's coming thither, and present it to the House. But the Scots were not yet base enough to comply with these Orders.

The Parliament sues to the Scots for the Disposal of the King's Person.

In the mean time, the Garrison of Newark, (which had been for a long time valiantly defended by the Lord Bellasis both against the Scots and English Forces, and had many fortunate Sallies upon the Besiegers) upon the fourth of May, the Day before the King came into the Scotch Camp, entered upon a Treaty, and on the 9th was agreed to be surrendered.

Newark surrendered.

About this time also was Banbury Castle surrendered, and not long after Carnarvon Town and Castle were delivered up upon Articles, by the Lord Byron, and the Scots having conveyed the King from Southwel to Newcastle, for the more sure Possession of him, he on the 10th of June, by their Advice, published a Direction to Sir Thomas Glemham, Sir Thomas Tilsely, Colonel Washington, and Colonel Blague, Governours of Oxford, Worcester, Litchfield, and Wallingford, and to all other Commanders of any Towns, Castles, or Forts within the Kingdom of England and Dominion of Wales, giving them an Account of his Resolutions to comply with the Designs of his Parliament in every thing that might be for the Good of his Subjects, and leave no Means unattempted for the removing of Differences betwixt them; and the more to evidence the Reality of his Intentions therein, he required them upon honourable Conditions to quit the Towns and Forts intrusted to them, and to disband all the Forces under their several Commands; which some of them however demurred upon, in regard of his Majesty's Restraint: But before Notice hereof came to Oxford, the Governour and Lords there had come to a Treaty, to begin at Haddington the 17th of May, between

And after a tedious Treaty continued to the 25th of June, without any Cessation of Arms, Oxford delivered up to the Parliament.

The Duke of York, with the rest of the King's Children, committed to the Care of the Earl of Northumberland.

it was delivered upon Conditions sufficiently Honourable, had they been as honourably performed: The whole Number of the Garrison was supposed to amount to seven thousand Soldiers and Scholars in Pay, who all marched out, but many of the Nobility and Gentry had leave to tarry for Passes; the Chief of whom were the Duke of York, the Princes Rupert and Maurice, the Earls of Dorset, Hertford, and Southampton; the Lords Cottington, Dunsmore, Secretary Nicholas, and others. The Duke of York was conveyed to London, and at St. James's committed with the rest of the Royal Children to the Tuition and Care of the Earl of Northumberland and his Lady. The two Princes Rupert and Maurice had Passes granted them to go beyond Sea; but before their Departure, by the Parliament's Leave, they had a Visit made to them by their Brother the Prince Elector.

Two Days after the Surrender, all the Seals of Estate were sent up from the General to the two Houses at Westminster, to wit, the Great Seal of England, carried by the Lord Keeper Littleton to the King in the Year 1642. The Privy-Seal, Signet, King's Bench, Exchequer, Court of Wards, Admiralty, and Navy Seals, together with the Sword; the Seals were immediately voted to be broken in Pieces, which was accordingly performed by a Smith in the House of Lords, the Commons standing by, and the broken Silver given in reward to the two Speakers; but the Sword was laid up safe in the Wardrobe. All other Garrisons were soon after surrendered according to the King's Order: Ragland Castle was one of the last held out in England or Wales, which the old Marquess of Worcester, a Man of Fourscore and four Years of Age, delivered up on very good Conditions, when the King had neither Field-Army nor scarce a Garrison besides it in England.

The King's Children were not long kept together under that Restraint the Parliament put upon them, the Princess Henrietta being in a short time after conveyed into France by the Lady Dalkeith, and the Duke of York after, as will be related hereafter.

The Scots desirous to haste home in safety with that Spoil and Plunder which they had gotten in their marching and re-marching betwixt Tweed and Hereford, were impatient at the Caution of the King's Governours (as aforesaid), and therefore pressed his Majesty to reiterate his Orders: But that which they most earnestly importuned was, That the Marquess of Montrose should lay down his Commission, who having twice beaten the Marquess of Argyle out of the Field, followed him home, and wasted his Country with Fire and Sword: And having vanquished Baile, one of the best Soldiers of the Faction, (commanding over a well formed Army) in a set Battle fought between them, and followed his Blow so well, that he made himself Master of the City and Castle of Edinburgh, releasing divers of his Friends who had been seized and imprisoned there when he first took up Arms, was at last (for want of Supplies) totally overthrown by Lesley, with six thousand Men out of England. And yet about this time he was beginning to make Head again, and in a hopeful way of proceeding, till he received his Majesty's Command to disband; which he immediately did, and took Shipping, and put himself into a voluntary Exile.

Whilst the King was at Southwell he had written to the Parliament for a Treaty, which, after many Debates, was so far complied with, as to send Propositions to him by the Earls of Pembroke and Suffolk, Mr. Godwin, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Hippsley, and Mr. Robinson; but they were so high both in Relation to the Rights and Prerogatives of the Crown, and tending to the Change of Religion established, that he could not consent to them. Nevertheless, he sent them a Message, proposing a Personal Conference with them, where he should be ready to hear their Reasons in behalf of the Propositions they made him; and promising his Consent to all such Bills as should be for the Good and Peace of his People, without regard to himself.

The King's Presence in the Scotch Army occasioned at first some Dissention between the English Parliament, and those of that Nation; the first demanding that the King should be delivered up to them, and the others as stoutly refusing the same. But these Disputes were by Degrees changed into an infamous Negotiation; in which the Scots agreed, upon the present Payment of two hundred thousand Pounds, and the Promise of the like Sum, to leave the Kingdom, and surrender up the King's Person. And the first Payment being made at Newcastle, according to the Compact, &c. they delivered the King to the Earls of Pembroke and Denbigh, the Lord Montague, Sir James Harrington, Sir John Holland, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Cook, Mr. Crew, and Major-General Brown, who were Commissioners appointed by the Parliament to receive him; and with these, on the eighth of February, the King set forward towards his House at Holdenby in Northamptonshire, where he arrived on the sixteenth of the same Month: The Scots two Days before the King's Departure, marched from Newcastle, which was possessed by a Garrison of English, and a few Days after, they also put Berwick and Carlisle into the Parliament's Hands, and marched quietly home to Scotland. The King at Holdenby was kept so close, that none of his domestick Servants that had attended him since he left London, nor any of his Chaplains were suffered to have access unto him, nor so much as a Common Prayer-Book allowed him for his private Use. And the Parliament having now the King in their Possession, and all his Armies and Garrisons subdued by their Forces, they began to be much divided amongst themselves under the Names of Presbyterians and Independents.

1646. The first whereof, who were the major Part in both Houses, were those who in compliance with the Scots, thought themselves obliged by the Covenant to set up the Presbyterian Discipline of Geneva, as it was exercised in Scotland, under the Government of Congregational, Clafical, Provincial and National Affsemblies, (to whom the City of London very much adhered) but the others disliked that sort of Government, as too rigorous, imperious, and conclusive, holding that Churches should not be subordinate, as Parochial to Provincial, and Provincial to National, but co-ordinate, without Superiority; and from hence they were called Independents: Whereof the first eminent Appearance was in the Assembly of Divines, which met in the Year 1643, at Westminster, to consult about Matters of Religion; for the major Part of these being Presbyterians, were in Consideration of a Directory and Model of that Government to be proposed to the Parliament, when five of their Members, viz. Thomas Goodwin, Philip Nye, Sidrach Simpson, Jeremiah Burroughs, and William Bridge, made some Opposition, and desired Toleration to be indulged to them, that they might not be concluded by the Votes of the Assembly; but the rest of the Members opposed their Toleration, and some moved their Ejection out of the Assembly, except in convenient time they would comply therewith: Whereupon the Dissenters appealed from the Assembly, and presented an Apologetical Narrative to the Parliament, wherein they petitioned for some Favour to them, whose Consciences could not join with the Assembly in all Particulars; concluding, That they pursued no other Interest or Design, but a Subsistence in their own Land, as not knowing where else with Safety, Health, and Livelyhood to set their Feet on Earth.

An Assembly of Divines sit at Westminster.

Upon this Petition, they found such Favour, that they were secured from further Trouble; and from this Beginning they grew to so great an Increase, that they had the best Preferments left in the Church, and opened and shut the Door of Preferment to others.

Lieutenant-General Cromwell, and Commissary-General Ireton, and the greatest Part of the Army, consisting now of Men of several Sects of Religion, did much favour these Independents, who to ingratiate themselves with them (though in their Confession of Faith and Doctrine they wholly agreed with the Presbyterian) held out a Liberty of Conscience to all other Sects in the Profession of their Faith and Exercise of their Religion.

1467. This Inclination of the Army to the Independents, made the Presbyterians, who were the major Part of the Parliament, very watchful over their Actions, and observing that the Army at their Courts of War laid hold on all Pretences of Scandals and Crimes to disband and cashier Presbyterians, that Independents might be put in their Places, resolved to disband all of them except five thousand Horse, a thousand Dragoons, and five Companies of Firelocks, for which they wanted not a good Pretence, that the People might be eas'd thereby of a great Part of the Taxes impos'd upon them for their Maintenance, and that some of them might be sent into Ireland, where there was a want of English Soldiers. And for this

Purpose, they borrowed two hundred thousand Pounds of the City of London. The head Quarters of the Army was at St. Edmunds-bury in Suffolk, when these Matters were debated in Parliament; but by the Intelligence they kept at Westminster, nothing thereof was concealed from them, and by the Independent Party in the House (as it was commonly said) they were so practised on, that they were resolv'd not to disband; yet when something of this was suggested in the House of Commons, Cromwell with his Hand upon his Breast, said, In the Presence of God before whom he stood, that he knew the Army would disband and lay down their Arms at their Doors whensoever they should command them. Upon this Assertion, Orders of both Houses for disbanding were sent to the Army, with Instructions for determining the Accompts of the Soldiers; but instead of Obedience to these Orders, a Council of Officers met at St. Edmunds-bury to consider thereof, began to debate of the Matter with much Dissatisfaction, and two Soldiers out of each of sixteen Regiments of Horse and Foot, as Agitators or Agents of their respective Regiments, were allowed to meet also in a kind of Council on the same Business, and both of these Assemblies agreed upon the same things in Substance, namely, against disbanding; and in a Petition to the General, they desired the Army might be speedily drawn to a Rendezvous, and that he would use his utmost to Endeavour that it be not disbanded 'till publick Grievances should be redressed, and all such Persons called to Account who had been Intenders, Contrivers, or Promoters of their Destructions, (for so they termed those of the Parliament that voted them to be disbanded). These Requests of the Officers and Soldiers produced a General Rendezvous of the Army at New-market on the 4th of June, and the Agitators the Day before privately sent Cornet Joyce with a Party of Soldiers to seize on the King (as will be mentioned hereafter) and at this Rendezvous they associated themselves together, as a kind of distinct Body from the rest of the Kingdom, and subscribed a solemn Engagement of their Resolution, wherein they to this Purpose expressed themselves, viz.

We, the Officers and Soldiers of the Army subscribing herunto, do hereby declare, agree, and promise to, and with each other, that we shall not willingly disband or divide, nor suffer our selves to be disbanded or divided, until we have Security, that we as private Men, as other the free born People of England, shall not remain subject to the like Oppressions and Injuries as have been attempted, and shall have such Satisfaction and Security as shall be agreed upon by a Council to consist of those General Officers of the Army, who have concurred with the Army in this Resolution (for many moderate Men upon these Discontents left them) with two Commission Officers and two Soldiers for each Regiment, of such likewise as subscribed to this Agreement. But whilst these Contrivances were acted at the Head Quarters, there was a large Petition framed in the County of Essex against the Army: Upon this Cromwell goes to Walden, where the head Quarters of the Army then was, on Pretence of quieting the Distempers thereof, but nothing was effected; and in the Month of May they presented a Petition to their General, where-1647. wherein they desire to be satisfied, not only for their Pay as Soldiers, but that a Provision might be made for their Indemnity, and several other things relating to publick Settlement; of which Petition great Complaint was made by the Presbyterians; yet they rested not here, but were very active in framing another to be presented to the Parliament. But the Parliament shewed their high dislike of that Petition, and their Approbation and Esteem of their good Service who first discovered it: But declared, if the Subscribers would forbear to proceed any further therein, they should be retained in the Parliament's good Opinion, and that those who shall continue in the present Distempers shall be proceeded against as Enemies to the State.

The King brought from Holdenby to the Army by Cornet Joyce.

These and some other Alterations wrought at last so far, that on the 4th of June, a Party of Soldiers commanded by Cornet Joyce, came somewhat late to Holdenby, and desired to speak with the King, which being granted, he told him, he was come by Command of the Army to remove him from that Place, and so the next Day after Dinner he carried him towards the Army. But on the 6th of June, the General sent a Letter to the Parliament, pretending that he knew nothing of the Party that attended the King, professing that his Remove was without his Consent, or his Officers about him, but the Party that did it, told him that the Reason thereof, was from an Apprehension of some Strength gathered to take him away, thereby to make a new War, the Plot and Plotters whereof, they were able to prove when called thereunto: When this was known, it was ordered by both Houses of Parliament,

1. That the King should reside at Richmond.
2. That he should be attended by the same Persons that he was at Holdenby.
3. That Rossiter's Regiment should guard him.

The Army's Representation to the Parliament

But the Army, instead of complying herewith, sent a Representation to the Parliament, wherein they proposed,

That the two Houses might be speedily purged of such as ought not to sit there.

That such who abused the Parliament and Army, and endangered the Kingdom, might be speedily disabled from doing the like or worse.

That some determinate period of Time might be set to this and future Parliaments, according to the Act for Triennial Parliaments.

That Provision might be for succeeding Parliaments not to be adjournable or dissolvable by any Power, but by their own Consent during their respective period, and then to determine themselves.

That the Freedom of the People to present Grievances by Petition to Parliament may be vindicated.

That the exorbitant Power of Country Committees may be taken away.

That the Kingdom may be satisfied in the Parliament's Accounts for their vast Sums received, and also in divers other things wherein the Commonwealth have been long abused.

That after such Delinquents as have been of the King's Party have compounded for their Delinquencies, and paid their Compositions, an Act of Oblivion may be passed.

And immediately after this Representation, 1647. there was brought to the Parliament from the General and his Council of Officers, an Impeachment against eleven Members of the House of Commons, viz. Denzil Hollis, Esq; Sir William Lewis, Sir William Waller, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir John Clothworthy, Sir John Maynard, Major-General Massey, Mr. Glyn Recorder of London, Anthony Nichols, Esq; Colonel Edward Harley, and Colonel Walter Long, for things done for the most Part in the House, whereof one of the chief was, That by their Power in the House, they caused the Ordinance for disbanding the Army to pass. The impeached Members declared themselves ready to answer any Crime that could be objected against them; but the Officers of the Army requested that they might be forthwith suspended from any longer sitting and acting as Members: But this was denied, as a thing judged at this time too high, and too much against the Privilege of Parliament; but when the Army reiterated their Desire, those accused Members by leave of the House made a voluntary Secession for six Months. Concerning that Order of Parliament, that the King should go to Richmond, the General desired to be excused, intreating them not command, that 'till things were more quiet, and that they would appoint no Residence for the King nearer to London, than they would allow the Quarters of the Army to be: After which the King was conveyed to Roydon, thence to Hatfield, not long after to Causam, while the Army quartered at Reading, from whence when the General with his Army marched to Bedford, the King went to the Earl of Bedford's House near Wooborn, and during all this time he was received with all possible Demonstrations of Love and Duty, and some of his Chaplains were licensed to repair to him, and read the Book of Common-Prayer as in former times, and the way was open to all those of his own Party who desired to see him.

Eleven Members impeached by the Army.

The City of London's Militia, as it was settled by Ordinance of the 4th of May, was in the managing of Presbyterians, who were very active and industrious in compleating their Companies, both of the trained Bands and Auxiliaries, which was rumoured by the Independents as a very dangerous Conspiracy against the Army, and the General, in a Letter to the Parliament of the 10th of June, requested, that the Militia of the City might be put into the Hands of Persons better affected to the Army: Upon which Letter, the Commons upon the 22d of July, voted the repealing the said Ordinance of the 24th of May, and a new Ordinance for reviving the old Militia was presently passed.

The unexpected News of this changing their Militia, caused the City to meet in Common-Council, where because the repealing the former Ordinance was upon no other ground than the Army's Desires, they resolved to petition the House of Commons against it, which they did on the 26th of July by the Sheriffs and some of the Common-Council; but so it happened, that about a thousand Apprentices came down two or three hours after, with another Petition, therein complaining, That to order the City's Militia was the City's Birth-right, belonging to them by Charters confirmed by Parliament, for Defence whereof they had

The Petition of the City against the Vote for taking the Militia out of their Hands.

1647. had adventured their Lives as far as the Army, and desired the Militia might be put again into the same Hands in which it was put, with the Parliament and City's Consent by Ordinance of the 4th of May. Upon reading of which Petition, the Lords revoked the Ordinance of the 23d of July, and renewed that of the 4th of May, by a new Ordinance of the 26th of July, which they presently sent down to the Commons for their Consents, where some of the Apprentices in a Childish Heat were over clamorous to have the Ordinance passed, refusing to let some Members pass out of the House, so that at last it passed in the affirmative about three in the Afternoon, and most of the Apprentices departed; but after this, some disorderly Persons, when the House was rising, took the Speaker and thrust him again into his Chair, detaining both him and the rest of the Members, until they enforced from them a Vote, That the King should come to London.

The Speakers, and divers Members Aye to the Army.

After this Disorder, the two Houses adjourned for four Days, and many private Cabals were held what to do, and those that favoured the Army went thither; so that on the fourth Day both the Speakers being absent, new Speakers were chosen, the Lord Hunsdon for the Peers, and Mr. Henry Pelham, a Barrister, for the Commons, by whom it was that Day voted,

1. That the King should come to London.
2. That the Militia of London should be authorised to raise Forces for Defence of the City.
3. That Power should be given to the same Militia to chuse a General for those Forces.

It was likewise ordered, That the aforesaid eleven Members impeached by the Army, should return to their Seats in Parliament. The Citizens armed with these Orders, presently proceeded to the raising of Forces, which were to be under the Command of Sir William Waller, Major-General Massey, and Colonel Pointz, who were each of them busy in lifting of Soldiers; but Waller, who was a Person of good Experience and foresight, seeing great Numbers of reformed Officers, and Soldiers lately disbanded, flocking to them, advised that they should immediately seize on all the serviceable Horses in and about London, to the Number of six thousand, and bring them into Tuttle-Fields, where Saddles, Bridles, and Arms might be provided ready, and they would then have Soldiers quickly to Mount them, and in four and twenty Hours time, they might have a Body of Horse to join with the City Regiments, strong enough to oppose the Army if they should attempt any thing against the Parliament and the City: And of this, the Army were in great Fear; but some of their Friends, in the Common-Council, did so distract their Consultations, that it appeared impossible for them, suddenly to raise any Forces to withstand the Army, who by this time, upon Intelligence thereof made their Approaches towards London, whereupon the Aldermen and Common-Council were so terrified, that they sent to the General for a Pacification, which by the Consent of the Members of Parliament then with him, was granted to them upon these Conditions:

The City submits to the Army.

1. That they should desert the Parliament now sitting, and the eleven impeached Members.

2. That they should recall their Declaration lately divulged.

3. They should relinquish their present Militia.

4. They should deliver up to the General all their Forts and the Tower of London.

5. They should disband all the Forces they had raised: And do all things else which were necessary to the publick Tranquillity: All which things none of them daring to deny, were presently ratified.

In the mean time, the Lords and Commons, who had left London, consulting with the General and chief Commanders of the Army, made an Order, that all Acts and Decrees that had passed on the 26th of July and since, should be accounted null and void, and that they did adhere to the Declaration of the General and Council of the Army. It was likewise decreed, that the General with his Army should march to London; and on the 6th Day of August, he with his Army came to Westminster, and with him the Speakers of both Houses, together with the rest of the Lords and Commons, whom he restored all to their former Seats. Both the Speakers, in the Name of the whole Parliament, gave solemn Thanks to the General, and made him Commander of all the Forces in England and Wales, and Constable of the Tower of London: And a Month's Pay was likewise given as a Gratuity to the Army. The next Day General Fairfax, Lieutenant General Cromwell, Major General Skippon, and the rest of the Commanders, with the whole Army marched through London, from the Western Part thereof to the Tower, and at the Tower, the General made Colonel Tickbourne, an Alderman of the Independent Faction, to be Lieutenant of the Tower; and to humble the City, the Militias thereof were by Order of Parliament divided, and Authority given to Westminster, Southwark, and the Hamlets about the Tower, to exercise and command their own Militias;

The General comes with his Army to Westminster

The Members of Parliament in this Manner restored, and the Militia of London settled to the Army's good liking, the General marched out of London, and quartered his Army in the Towns and Villages adjacent, only leaving some Regiments about Whitehall and the Meuse, to guard the Parliament, his head Quarters being at Putney; and the King about the middle of August was brought to the most stately of all his Palaces, Hampton-Court.

The King brought to Hampton-Court.

But now the Members that were brought in by the Army, thought it necessary for the strengthening of their Factions, to proceed against all such of both Houses of Parliament, and others, that were in any Measure active in the late Troubles, and therefore Serjeant Glyn was outed of his Office of Recorder of London, and one Steele a Barrister of Gray's-Inn admitted in his Place, and Hollis, Waller, Clotworthy, Long, Massey, and Nichols, were summoned to attend the House on the 16th of October; and the Earls of Lincoln, Suffolk, and Middlesex, with the Lords Willoughby of Parham, Barkley, Hunsdon, and Maynard, were impeached of Treason, and committed to the Black-Rod, and Sir John Maynard acting in the late Troubles; and Sir John Gray of the House of Commons, and Sir John

Several Members and Citizens committed for the late Troubles;

1647. Gray Lord Mayor of London, with four Aldermen, Adams, Langham, Culham, and Bunch, were also impeached and committed to the Tower, where we shall leave them for some time, and look into the Affairs of Ireland during these Occurrences.

The Affairs of Ireland.

The Irish, when the Cessation of Arms was concluded with them at Singinston in the Year 1643. seemed very desirous of a Peace, but by their ill Observation of the Articles of Cessation, their reality therein was much suspected; for they were so far from ceasing from Acts of Hostility during that short Term of a Year, as they had agreed to, that they often pillaged and plundered the English, imprisoning and murdering their Persons, and particularly at the Castle of Wicklow, which they surprized, and put all the Men, Women and Children therein to the Sword; yet after this Treaty, they had the Confidence to send Commissioners to the King, to supplicate, that before the Expiration of the Cessation, a Peace might be concluded with them; but he referred them back to his Lieutenant Ormond, and he considering the Necessity of the King's Affairs, and his present Inability to prosecute that War, would willingly have reduced things to a Pacification; but the Irish having Correspondence with the Spanish and French, upon the Interest of the Romish Religion, spun out all Treaties with tedious Delays, in Hopes of Supplies of Men and Money, to be sent to them, so that in two Years, nothing was effected therein; and moreover at the same time, when they were in Treaty with the Lord Lieutenant, they were likewise agitating under hand, an Agreement elsewhere, pretending the King's Commission to authorize the Proceeding: Which His Majesty utterly disowned, with Expressions of much Indignation, that his Name should be made Use of, to so odious a Purpose, as the Advancement of the Popish Religion, and the Discouragement of the English Clergy in that Kingdom. While these things were transacting, matters went still worse and worse with the English, so that in Conclusion, all the strong Places in the Province of Leinster, except Drogheda and Dublin, were possessed by the Irish. One of the principal Actors in this Affair was seized and taken into Custody by Order of the Lord Lieutenant, who struggled as far as in him lay, to prevent further Inconveniencies: But about the time that the King went to the Scots Army near Newark, he was forced to conclude a Peace with them, and upon Conditions very advantageous to the Natives; but nevertheless, all of them would not submit to it: For the Pope's Nuncio had drawn a great Party of the most zealous of their Religion to protest against it, as a Peace wherein there was not sufficient Security for the free Exercise of the Roman Catholick Religion. Ormond thought to profit himself of that Division, and made himself ready to joyn with those that adhered to the Peace, to suppress the others, not doubting upon his Success herein, to be Master of such a Force as might make the King's Terms in England easier to him: But in the midst of all these Hopes, when he was ready with a Party to march to Kilkenny to joyn with his new Friends, he was inform'd of a Design against his Person, which was related to him with such Circumstances, that he was confident of the Truth thereof, and if he had not retreated to Dublin, he and his Party had been lost: In this Extremity he thought it better to put Dublin and the Forts yet in English Hands, in the Parliament of England's Power, than suffer them to be possess'd by the Irish, and brought under foreign Jurisdiction; in order whereunto, he sent to two Captains of the Parliament's Ships then riding near Dublin, and imparted to them his Desires of complying with the Parliament, if the King would give his Assent thereunto, and obtained of them Ammunition and Powder for his present Supply; and in further Prosecution of that Overture, having the King's Command for so doing, he capitulated with the Parliament Commissioners, and yielded up Dublin, and what remained under his Government to their Authority; who immediately sent thither Colonel Jones with 1450 Horse and Foot, who on the 17th of June took Possession of Dublin, and from that time such Supplies were sent to re-inforce the English, that every Week produced News of Victories over the Irish.

Dublin put into the Hands of the Parliament of England.

Whilst the King remained at Hampton-Court, he seemed not at all a restrained Man, but as a Prince living in the Splendor of a Court, so freely to his Presence were all sorts of People admitted to kiss his Hands, and do all Obeisances whatsoever; nor did the People from London only and the adjacent Towns resort to the King, but his Chaplains and such of his Servants who by Order of Parliament had been forbidden, as Mr. Ashburnham, and Sir John Barkley, now by permission of the Army had safe Recourse to him: The Marquess of Ormond likewise attended him there with an Account of the Irish Affairs, and was with much Kindness received by him, and about the beginning of October, the Duke of Richmond, the Marquess of Hartford, the Earls of Southampton and Dorset, and the Lord Seymour, repaired to him; but the Parliament were displeased at this Liberty; whereupon those Lords being told of it, after two Days stay at Hampton-Court, returned to their Houses: On the 7th of September Propositions agreed upon by both Houses of Parliament (the Commissioners of the Kingdom of Scotland concurring also) were sent to the King at Hampton-Court, to which they requested his Answer in six Days: The Commissioners appointed for this Business by the Parliament of England, were the Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Mountague, Sir James Harrington, Sir John Cook, Sir John Holland, and Major General Brown; and for the Kingdom of Scotland, the Earl of Lauderdale, and Sir Charles Erskins. Two Days after their Arrival, the King gave the Commissioners a Message in Writing to the two Houses of Parliament; the Substance of which was only to let them know, that he could not in Conscience comply with them.

Propositions sent from the Parliament to the King at Hampton-Court.

After the King had been seized by Cornet Joyce, and brought to the Army, he was at first treated by Fairfax, Cromwell and Ireton, the chief Commanders, with great Respect. They made the utmost Professions of Loyalty to him, and promised to espouse his Interest with the greatest Zeal and Fidelity; his Chaplains were allowed to come to him, which had never been permitted before; and many of his Friends and Servants came 1647. came to visit and attend him, and some Officers who had served under him, used to lye in the very Quarters where the Army was bestowed. But he had not been long at Hampton-Court, before he found an Alteration for the worse. Fairfax indeed meant well; for he was an honest, though a weak Man; but Cromwell and Ireton were false and treacherous: They had done their Business, and subdued their Opposers in the Parliament; and now the King stood in their Way, they began with lessening the Respects they had formerly shewn him, and discountenancing the Attendance paid him, so that in a short time the King perceiving this Change, grew apprehensive for the Safety of his Person: And by the Advice of Sir John Berkley, Colonel Leg, and Mr. Asburnham, he resolved to attempt his Escape out of England. On the 11th of November, at eight o' Clock at Night, he got away from Hampton-Court, and mounted a Horse that was provided for him, and in Company of those three Gentlemen took his Way towards Hampshire. But whether a Ship was not provided, or whether by some Misfortune, it was obliged to leave its Station, is not certainly known; but none was to be found where the King expected it. Upon this Disappointment new Measures were to be taken, and by some fatal Mistake the King was induced to go to the Isle of Wight, and put himself into the Hands of Colonel Hammond, Governour of that Place, who betrayed him.

The Parliament were at first surprized with this unexpected News of the King's Departure, and they dispatched Messengers to all Sea-Ports to prevent his going out of the Kingdom, and upon a Rumour that he was concealed in London, they ordered, that if any Man should closely detain the King's Person and not reveal it to the Parliament, he should be punished with the Loss of his Estate and Life: But in the midst of this Confusion, a Letter came to the Lords from Colonel Hammond, Governour of the Isle of Wight, dated at Cowes the 13th of November, wherein he acquainted them, that being that Morning on his way from Carisbrook Castle to Newport, Mr. Asburnham and Sir John Berkley overtook him, and after a short Discourse told him, the King was near, and that he would be with him that Night; and was come from Hampton-Court, upon Information, that there were some who intended to destroy him, and that he could not with Safety continue any longer there; and finding his Case thus, he chose rather to put himself into his Hands, being a Member of the Army (which he said he would not have left, could he have had Security to his Person) than to go to any other Place; and therefore weighing the great Concernment that the Person of the King was of, he resolved to use his utmost Endeavours to preserve his Person from any such horrid Attempts, and to bring him to a Place of Safety: Hereupon he went over the Water and found the King near the Water-side, and by his own Desire he brought him to the Isle of Wight.

The King is brought to the Isle of Wight.

The Parliament were well pleased to hear of the King's being at Cowes, and ordered thereupon the 10th of November,

1. That he should continue there and in the Castle.

2. That none that have borne Arms against the Parliament, but Inhabitants that have compounded, shall remain in that Island.

3. That no Delinquent or Foreigner should be admitted to come to him without Leave of the Parliaments of England and Scotland, and that Propositions should be speedily sent to him.

4. That five thousand Pounds should be advanced for his Accommodation: And,

5. That it should be considered who should attend his Person.

In the little Space of time betwixt the King's Departure from Hampton-Court, and his Arrival at Cowes-Castle in the Isle of Wight, many great Divisions happened in the Army.

Distempers appeared in the Army, which had been growing some while before, on this Occasion. The Agitators having some Jealousy, that Cromwell and Ireton, and the rest of the General Officers designed to establish the King, (and being acted and guided by divers Persons not of the Army that were for a total Subversion of Monarchical Government) possessed the Soldiers with much Prejudice against them, as that they had fallen from their Principles, and were in their Proceedings false and treacherous both to the Army and Kingdom, and by several Insinuations of this kind which they dispersed in printed Papers, they had made great Factions and Parties in the Army, and much divided the Soldiers from the Officers, and both Officers and Soldiers among themselves: These Disorders and Discontents were much encreased by the repair of the Agitators to the Head Quarters, where they assembled as a kind of Representative Council, and debated divers Matters of great Concernment: But the General doubting the Event of these Practices, and being willing to quiet the Discontents then growing among the Soldiers, in the first Place dismissed the Agitators to their several Regiments, and sent also most of the Officers then at the Head Quarters to their respective and particular Charges, to endeavour to satisfy and compose those Discontents and Divisions; and about a fortnight after, he contracted the Quarters of the Army, intending to draw them to several Rendezvous; the first whereof was to be in a Place called Cork-bush Field, betwixt Hartford and Ware, on the 15th Day of November; but as soon as the Agitators had Notice of these Orders, they and their Associates laboured to hinder the Execution thereof, and to draw divers Regiments from the Quarters and Rendezvous, to which they were ordered, to the first Rendezvous, near Ware; whereupon the General the Day before, called a Council of War at Hartford, and there agreed upon a Remonstrance, and Engagement, which was to be read at the Rendezvous at the Head of every Regiment, and subscribed by the Officers and Soldiers; but the next Day when the Army was drawn together, many of the Soldiers of five whole Regiments mutinied against their Officers, and wore certain Marks of Distinction to be known by from the rest; nor was this done in so tumultuous a Manner as usually Mutinies are made, but with some kind of Order, and had proved very dangerous, if Cromwell and Ireton and some of the rest of the Officers had not been very active in seizing on some of the Principal Mutineers; in the doing whereof, one or two were shot to Death before the Troops were 1647, reduced to Order and good Obedience: But though the present Distemper was thus ended, great Animosities remained, most of the Mutineers and the Officers that favoured them, were tryed at Court-Martials, and Cashiered, or otherwise punished; but Cromwell and Ireton, and their Faction were after this (to keep their Credit with the Army) to alter their Counsels, which brought great Miseries to the Kingdom, as will be shewn hereafter.

Whilst the Parliament were deliberating about Propositions to be sent to the Isle of Wight to the King, a Letter came to them from him, dated the eighteenth of November, superscribed, To the Speaker of the Lords House, to be communicated also to the House of Commons, which was read in both Houses. In which he delivered his Sense and Opinion concerning many things contained in the former Propositions to him, especially concerning the Abolition of Episcopacy, which he said, He could not consent to either as a Christian or a King, because he looked upon it as Apostolical, and had sworn at his Coronation to maintain it; but yet he was willing that Presbytery should be authorized for three Years, and in the mean time, a free Debate had between the Divines assembled at Westminster, and twenty that he should appoint for the future Settlement of Church-Government: He was also willing that the Parliament should dispose of the Militia, and have the Choice of his Privy Counsellors during his Reign, provided they would have it by Grant in Letters Patents from him, and that it might return to his Successors: He gave touches also concerning the Payment of the Arrears of the Soldiers, and the other Matters; of all which, he said, he hoped that he should satisfy the Parliament with his Reasons, if he might personally treat with them. Therefore he desired earnestly to be admitted with Honour, Freedom, and Safety, to treat personally at London. The Commissioners of Scotland likewise with great Vehemency pressed, That the Desire of the King might be granted; insomuch, that after a long Debate, on November the 26th it was concluded, that four previous Propositions being drawn up into the Form of Acts, should be sent to the King in the Isle of Wight to sign; which when he had signed, he should be admitted to a personal Treaty at London.

Four Acts sent to the King to be signed.

1. An Act for Raising, Settling, and Maintaining Forces by Sea and Land within the Kingdom of England and Ireland, and Dominion of Wales, &c.
2. An Act for Recalling of all Declarations, Oaths, and Proclamations against the Parliament, or those who have adhered to them.
3. An Act, that those Peers who were made after the Great Seal was carried from the Parliament, may be made incapable of Sitting in the House of Peers.
4. That Power may be given to the two Houses to adjourn themselves as they think fit.

The first of these Acts was concerning the Militia, which divested the King, his Heirs and Successors of the Power thereof for ever; for though it seemed to be but for twenty Years, yet it saith, That neither the King nor his Heirs or Successors, nor any other, shall exercise any Power over the Militia by Land or Sea, but such as shall act by Authority and Approbation of the Lords and Commons: It gives also an unlimited Power to the two Houses to raise what Forces, and what Number for Land and Sea, and of what Persons (without Exceptions) they please, and to imploy them as they shall judge fit, and to raise what Money they please for maintaining them. The Titles of the other Acts do sufficiently discover the Nature of them, and therefore we shall not enlarge upon them: The Commissioners of Scotland would in no wise give their Consent that these four Acts should be imposed on the King before he treated at London; and in a large Declaration they protested against it; notwithstanding which, they were sent by the Earl of Denbeigh, the Lord Montague, Mr. Lisle, Mr. Goodwin, Mr. Bunkly, and Mr. Kemp, Commissioners from both Houses of Parliament, and on the 24th of December they were presented to the King at Carisbrook Castle; but he willing to satisfy all Interests, and finding the Scots openly to protest against them, refused to give his Assent to any Acts 'till the whole Peace should be concluded; and the Commissioners returned to London with his Denial. This Refusal of his Majesty's, together with some other unhappy Circumstances, gave Cromwell a Suspicion that the King had some thought of deserting the Army, and casting himself upon the Presbyterian Interest; whereupon the Army marched to Windsor, where the head Quarters for some time remained, and the chief Officers had many Consultations about the present Transactions betwixt the King and the Parliament; for Cromwell and Ireton finding the Interest of the Scots was likely to be joined with that of the King, and that the City of London was very favourable to them, they feared a Downfall to their Greatness, if they did not prevent the Progress thereof, and strengthen themselves by drawing the inferior Officers and Soldiers who were much affected by the late Mutinies against the King and his Government, to have a good Opinion of them; to effect which, as a Pretence to procure an Unity in the Army, a Fast was solemnly kept amongst the Officers, and a whole Day spent in Prayer and Preaching, and at the Close thereof, all those Prisoners that were committed for the Mutiny at Ware, as the Mind of God, were set at Liberty. And now Cromwell and Ireton declared themselves open Enemies to the King; and the latter moved in Parliament, that a Vote might be passed, that no more Addresses or Applications might be made to him. He was seconded by others of his Party, with great Fury and Bitterness of Speech against his Majesty; whom they used before to treat always with Respect and Duty in Words, howsoever they conducted themselves towards him in Actions. But those who were not in the Secret with Cromwell, were startled at this new Spirit; and found that different Schemes were to be followed, from those which themselves had laid, at the Head of which, other Persons would preside; so that they opposed this Motion vigorously: The Debate was long and fierce, but at last Cromwell's Party carried the Question; and it was Resolved, that no Persons should make Applications of any Kind to the King, under Pain of High Treason;

The Parliament passes an Engagement.

The Parliament also made a publick Declaration about the beginning of February, with many invective Arguments in it against the King, laying open all those Errors of his Government together, which they had with Virulence and Malice formerly published in Parcels; but the more sober Part of the People knew too well by what Arts the Councils which produced these Actions were framed, to be persuaded by them, and so great were the Discontents in the City of London, and the Suburbs thereof, that Part of the Army was Quartered about Westminster, the Meuse, and other Places of the City, for fear of Insurrections; and the Month before these high Transactions, seven Lords, and thirteen of the House of Commons were chosen out of both Houses, to sit as a Committee in Derby-House (where the Committee of both Kingdoms of England and Scotland had sat before) who were empowered to suppress Tumults and Insurrections, and to that Purpose to raise Forces as they saw Occasion; the Names of these were, the Earls of Northumberland, Kent, Warwick, and Manchester; and the Lords Say, Wharton, and Roberts; and of the Commons, Sir Henry Vane, sen. Sir Henry Vane, jun. Sir William Armin, Sir Arthur Haslerig, Sir Gilbert Gerard, Sir John Evelyn, Lieutenant-General Cromwell, Nathaniel Fines, William Pierpont, and Oliver St. Johns, Esquires, Mr. Crew, Mr. Brown, and Mr. Wallop, these were pretty equally made up of Presbyterians and Independents; but the latter seemed to be most prevalent by the Influence of the Army, but they were less violent in their Actings than otherwise they would, that they might not too much exasperate the Scots; for their Commissioners had about this time, repeating the four Votes against the King, propounded to know, Whether the Houses by their Votes, That no Person whatsoever do presume to make, or receive any Application or Address to, or from the King, would debar the Scots to make or receive any Addresses to, or from him, and so put an Incapacity upon him to perform Acts of Government towards them: This Message caused great Debate, but at last it was consented to, That the Scotch Commissioners might make Addresses to the King; but these Carriages in the House of Commons, made the Army and their Independent Friends consult how to suppress or terrify the Presbyterians, who in that House, notwithstanding all the military Means, were yet the major Part, though least active; and to effect this, about the beginning of March the Lords sent a Message to the Commons (which had been six Months before rejected) to desire their Concurrence to an Engagement of those Members that fled to the Army, To live and die with the Army; which after eight Hours Debate, was carried by nine Voices in the Affirmative, when there were near two hundred present, after many Presbyterians, who were awed by the Threats of some of the Army's Creatures, had left the House, because it was late, not daring to Vote in the Negative: And it was intimated, that if they had not approved of the Engagement, a new Charge would be exhibited by the Army to the Lords against the principal Opposers; which prevailed upon the Weakness of many, though the wiser sort believed that they durst not attempt any such thing; for many Arguments at this time were published against those Proceedings, very well received by the People, some of which went so high, as not to allow the Lords any Judicature over the Commons, but others agreed, That the House of Peers was a Court of Judicature, but not without the King's special Authority, granted to them either by his Writ, or by his Commission: And the Lords by the four Votes before-mentioned, having denied all further Address or Application to the King, had cut off from themselves that Fountain from which they derived all their Power. During these Practices, to increase and strengthen the Independent Party, the Discontents of the People were much augmented in all Places, against the Parliament and the Army, for their Severity against the King; for upon his Denial to assent to the four Bills, or Acts lately sent to him, the Governour removed most of his Servants from him, and restrained him to the Circuit of the Castle within the Walls, and though he did it at first without the Authority of the Parliament, yet they afterwards approved of the Action. Those in the Island being nearest to the View of this Usage, were very much offended with it, and one Captain Burleigh lately an Officer in the King's Army and an Inhabitant there, beat up a Drum in Newport to draw some Soldiers together to rescue the King; but being too hasty in the Attempt, his Endeavours were frustrated, and he himself was taken Prisoner, and those that took Part with him suppressed: He was after some time sent in Custody to Winchester, where by a special Commission of Oyer and Terminer directed to Serjeant Wild of Worcestershire, the then chief Baron and others; he was tryed and condemned of High Treason; and on the tenth of February injuriously executed for the same.

During the time of these Restraints, the King betook himself to Meditation, and then composed that most excellent Book, entituled, ΕΙΣΩΝ ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΗ, Or, The Portraiture of his sacred Majesty in his Solitudes and Sufferings.

About the Month of June last, the Parliament sent Visitors to the University of Oxford, but their Authority was not submitted to by the Members thereof, who alledged, that they could not acknowledge any Visitors but the King, or his immediate Substitute, without manifold Perjuries: But about the 27th of April this Year, 1648. the Earl of Pembroke being lately before by Vote or Ordinance of the two Houses, made Chancellor of the University, resorted thither with some others that were with him made Visitors; and being armed with the Authority of a Vote of the Lords and Commons to expel all such Masters, Fellows, and Officers of Colleges, as refused to submit to their Power: The next Day after his Arrival, he went to Christ-Church College, and there by Force removed the Dean, and all the Canons and Students that did not comply with him, and take the Covenant, and put others in their Places; and in the like Manner he proceeded in the Colleges of All-Souls, St. Mary Magdalen,

An Insurrection of the London Apprentices.

This Summer the King, tho' a Prisoner, was as Formidable as ever since the beginning of his Troubles, and many of the more Moderate of his Subjects of both Kingdoms, which before had joined in Arms against him, began to look upon his Estate with Consideration, and they and others attempted by Force to try their Fortunes on his Behalf: And first, an Insurrection was made in London, where some Apprentices in Moor-Fields set upon a Part of the Trained Bands who were there keeping Guard, and over-powered them, by which Success their Numbers hourly increased, and they divided themselves into two or three Bodies, one whereof (which was the most considerable) having born before them an Ensign which they took from the Trained Bands, marched towards Whitehall; but being without any Arms but Sticks, a Troop of Horse from the Meuse charged and dispersed them; yet at Night they joined again, and surprised Newgate and Ludgate, and shut up the Gates thereof, and seized a Drake-piece from the Lord Mayor's House, which they planted within Ludgate, being animated hereunto by some of the Army, to make their Conquest of them more remarkable: The Morning following, they laboured to get Arms, and broke open some Salesmens Houses of Ammunition, and mastered the Magazine at Leadenhall, crying out in a tumultuous Manner, For God and King Charles; but the next Day General Fairfax entered Aldersgate with two Regiments, and marched to Leadenhall Street, and there charged this undisciplin'd Multitude; who, after a short Skirmish, were utterly dispersed, with little or no Loss to the Assailants.

Poyer and Laughorn refuse to submit to the Parliament.

In South Wales, about this time, Col. Poyer Governour of Pembroke Castle, refused to yield up his Charge (though commanded thereunto) but the better to countenance his Intention, his first Pretences were to have the Arrears of him and his Soldiers paid to him; but this produced some expostulatory Letters betwixt him and the Parliament, and in the mean time he fortified the Castle, and stored it with Provision for a Defence, and Major-General Laughorn, for the same Reason, refused to disband his Men, and so both resolved to run the same Fortune. Laughorn surprised Tenby Castle, with the Parliament Commissioners therein; and for the Support of their Soldiers, they raised Contribution from the Neighbouring Parts, and declared for the King, to whom one Colonel Powel, a valiant Soldier of that Country, joined. Colonel Horton was sent by Fairfax Commander in Chief against them, with thirty Companies of Horse and Foot, who sent out Adjutant-General Fleming to charge them, who when he came near, went to gain a Pass from Poyer, which he found quitted to his Hands, and going on improvidently, he fell into an Ambuscade which Poyer had laid, whereby his Men were disordered, and he with some few of them compelled to shelter in a neighbouring Church; but perceiving himself unable to hold it out, he died (as it is thought) by his own Sword, and the rest were taken Prisoners: This Success was attended with the Surprise of Chepstow Castle, which was taken by Sir Thomas Keymis for the King, in the Governour's Absence. And now Fairfax thought a greater Force was required than those with Horton to reduce South Wales, and therefore Cromwell himself was ordered to march with a strong Power into that Country; but when the News of his Advance came to Laughorn, he thought it best to fight Horton before his coming, and the other as willingly marched to meet him; and near St. Frago's on the eighth of May, the two Armies came in Sight of one another, Laughorn had many more than the other, but not well arm'd nor disciplin'd; and for that he did not so soon expect Horton, the Conquest was the easier, for as soon as his Men were charged, after a little Resistance, Horton's Men obtained a Victory, in which they killed and took fifteen hundred Officers, and three thousand common Soldiers, Laughorn himself, and Powel, escaped by Flight: Lieut. General Cromwell entered Wales, shortly after this, and stormed Tenby Castle, which yielded upon Mercy, and Chepstow Castle was retaken by Colonel Ewer, and from thence he marched to besiege Pembroke Castle: Sir John Owen, whilst Cromwell besieged Pembroke Castle, got together some Forces in North Wales for the King, which the Sheriff would have suppressed, but being too weak, was defeated, and taken Prisoner by him; but shortly after, the same Fortune befel Owen himself, by the Forces of Major-General Mitton. Pembroke Town and Castle held out courageously for a long time, but at length were so distressed, that they willingly would have surrendered, if they could have had any other Conditions, than to yield upon Discretion; and to force them thereunto, Cromwell gave a furious Assault to the Place, which the Besieged resolutely endured: But upon News that Duke Hamilton was preparing to march into England with an Army of Scots, he became inclinable to give them better Terms, and thereupon the Town and Castle was delivered up to him July the 13th on these Terms, viz. Powel, Laughorn, Poyer, and three other principal Actors, to submit to the Parliament's Mercy: The other Commanders, Knights, and Gentlemen, to depart the Kingdom within six Weeks, for two Years, the rest to return to their respective Dwellings, and the Townsmen to enjoy their Freedom and Liberties: Those that submitted to Mercy, were afterwards tryed as Traytors, notwithstanding the Prince's Letter in their Behalf to General Fairfax; but his cruel Favour was extended towards them, that they should cast Lots for their Lives, and so only Poyer suffered.

April twenty, The Duke of York, disguised in Womens Apparel, made his Escape from St. James's by Water, and landed at Dort in Holland, by the help of one Mr. Bampfild, sent over purposely on that Design by the Queen.

Whilst some by Arms were endeavouring to free their Country, others attempted by Petitions in a mild way to obtain that by Favour, which would not without great Hazard and Effusion of Blood be procured by Force. The County of Essex was the first that began, who supplicated the Parliament, That the Army might be paid and disbanded, and the King admitted to a personal Treaty: Surrey followed, and desired the

The Kentish Men in Arms.

The Kentish Men finding those of Surry so ill treated when they came in a peaceable Manner to petition the Parliament, resolved to make their Demand with Swords in their Hands, and to that Purpose a numerous Body of them were drawn together, against whom the Lord Fairfax (for so he was now by his Father's Death) marched with six thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; the Kentish were ten thousand, but unadvisedly they parted their Forces, and sent away a Brigade to besiege Dover Castle; the General advanced, and defeated some of them between Cranford-Heath and Gravesend, and from thence he sent Major Husbands before, who gained a Passage over a Bridge at Northfield, and took some Prisoners; Fairfax followed, marching in a full Body, expecting the Kentish, (who hovered in Sight of him) would have engaged, but they were not prepared for it, and so without any Resistance, he came near Maidstone, in which the Kentish Men were drawn up into a Body, and had planted some great Guns, and barrocadoed the Avenues of the Town.

Routed at Maidstone by General Fairfax.

Fairfax having his Army by this time encreased to ten thousand, on the second of June at seven o'Clock at Night storm'd the Town twice, and was both times repulsed, but the third time he got Entrance, yet then the Fight was more perilous than before, while the Assailants had to do not only with those who manned the Streets, but were also galled with continual shot from the Houses, getting all by Inches, nor could they master the Town till after six Hours fight, and much Loss on their own Side: But of the Kentish, two hundred were slain, and above one thousand and three hundred taken Prisoners, with four hundred Horse, and eight Pieces of Ordnance, and good Booty; and presently upon this, Roche was also quitted to the General's Mercy. Many of the Kentish Men after this Defeat kept still in Body and marched towards London, and rendezvous'd upon Black-beath, whither some resolute Persons repaired to them from London, 1648. and the Earl of Norwich at the Head of them gave them the best Encouragement he could; but the Kentish Men perceiving their Succours to come short of what they expected; they quitted their Commanders apace, and returned Home: Norwich with five hundred Men crossed over Greenwich Ferry into Essex, in which County the Committee-Men were already secured by some that were for the King there, and Sir Charles Lucas having gotten together two thousand Horse and Foot joyned with Norwich, who seized the Earl of Warwick's Armoury, and possessed themselves of Colchester, which now became a Seat of War, and the Country People flocked in unto them, and many also came from London, and the Lord Capel and the Lord Loughbrough from Hartfordshire, but General Fairfax leaving Colonel Rich, and Colonel Hewson to take in those Places which held out in Kent, which himself had not time to reduce, crossed over into Essex after the Enemy, and came before Colchester, which he immediately surrounded with a potent Army; neither were these Endeavours for the King only confined to the Land, but a considerable Part of the Royal Navy encouraged by Captain Batten formerly Vice Admiral to the Earl of Warwick, was put into the Power of the Prince of Wales, to be used for the King's Service; and with these the Prince with his Brother, Prince Rupert and the Earl of Brainford, the Lords Hopton, Wilmot, Willoughby, and Calpepper, with others of Quality came into Yarmouth Road; he had on board about two thousand Soldiers, and these he would have landed, but hearing of Colonel Scroop's coming against him with a Party of Horse and Foot more in Number, he sailed from thence to the Downs in Kent, seizing what Merchant Ships and Goods he could meet withal. Deal Castle was at this time besieged, for Relief whereof the Prince would needs attempt something, and therefore he set five hundred Men ashore, who at first charged handsomly, but being over numbred, were beaten, and several of them were slain and taken, but the rest got aboard again: Soon after this, Sandwich, Deal, and Weymore Castles were yielded up, and the whole County of Kent fully subdued. Whilst the Prince anchored in the Downs, the States of Scotland invited him to them, and engaged the publick Faith of that Kingdom, for his well being in Honour, Freedom, and Safety with them, or with their Army then in England, and to remove from them, or their Army, when or whither he pleased. But he having written to the House of Lords for promoting the Treaty with the King, and in vain summoned the Earl of Warwick (Admiral for the Parliament) to submit to him as highest Captain General under the King, and beginning to stand in need of Provision, went with his Fleet into Holland.

But the Earl of Holland being commissioned from the Prince, heads a fresh Insurrection, just as it were in view of the Parliament at Kingston upon Thames; his chief Associates were the Duke of Buckingham, and his Brother the Lord Francis Villiers, and the Earl of Peterborough; July 2d, they rendezvoused near Kingston, and had five hundred Horse, and some Foot upon the Heath

1648. Heath there, and from thence they marched to Darkeing, and would have possessed Rygate, but were prevented; for Colonel Rich and Major Gibbons marched towards him, and thereupon they retreated towards Kingston, and being closely pursued, they sent away their Foot before to secure their Retreat to the Town, and made a Stand between Ewel and Nonsuch Park, where the Pursuers overtook and engaged them; the Fight was short and smart, wherein the Lord Francis Villiers refusing Quarter, was slain with a Son of Sir Kenelm Digby, and others, and the rest put to flight, and many Prisoners of Note were taken: The Earl of Holland got into Kingston, but staid not long there, but fled with all Speed to Saint Needs in Huntingtonshire, where he was totally subdued, and taken by Colonel Scroop, and sent Prisoner to Warwick Castle; and Dalbier was there killed, but the Duke of Buckingham retired towards Lincolnshire, and escaped beyond Seas; Colchester yet held out courageously, making frequent Sallies upon the Besiegers with indifferent Success and good Hopes of Relief from the North; for the Parliament of Scotland had sat ever since the 2d of March, and were much disgusted at the English Proceedings in Reference to the King, which was not a little increased by the Report of their Commissioners now returned, so that notwithstanding that the Parliament of England made them fair Offers concerning the Payment of the Money due upon Account of their auxiliary Armies, both in England and Scotland, and on the 24th Day of July passed an Ordinance to establish the Presbyterian Government in England and Ireland, viz. under Classical, Provincial, and Parochial Assemblies: yet all would not serve, for they had framed a Committee of Danger, to consult of their Affairs in relation to England; the major Part whereof being of Hamilton's Faction, voted a War: And the Scots published a Declaration, wherein they proposed:

He is routed and the Lord Francis Villiers slain.

Berwick and Carlisle surprized.

Sir Marmaduke Langdale made Gen. of the English Forces for the King.

These actings drew many of the King's Party from the Northern Parts to Edenburgh, and Wogen a Captain in the English Army marched to them with his Troop, and fifty Foot, and two Companies of Foot landed out of Ireland at Chester, and marched thither also: Moreover Berwick was surprized by some Royalists, and Sir Thomas Glemham and Sir Philip Musgrave raised Forces for the King in Westmoreland and Cumberland, with which they seized on Carlisle, and with them joyned Sir Marmaduke Langdale, with some Horse, being commissioned to be General of the English Forces for the King, with which now increased to three thousand, he coasted about the Northern Counties.

July the 13th, a Scots Army under Duke Hamilton entered England, the Van was brought up by the Duke himself, the main Body by Major General Middleton, and the Rear by the Earl of Calender; these joyned with Langdale, and fell upon Major General Lambert near Appleby, and forced him to retire into the Town, from thence he retreated to Kirkby-Steven and after to Bowes, leaving some of his Forces behind him, to defend the Castle, which was besieged and taken August the 7th, by Sir Philip Musgrave; Colonel Boyn-ton Governour of Scarborough Castle declared for the King, and Pomfret Castle was taken by Major Morris; in Tinmouth Castle, Lieutenant Colonel Henry Lilbourne declared for the King, but the Castle was suddenly retaken by Sir Arthur Haslerig.

The Scots staid some time at Kendal in Westmoreland, and Major-General Lambert's Army increased daily with additional Forces, and Lieutenant-General Cromwell having quieted Wales, marched to joyn with him, and in the way took Pomfret Town, but not the Castle; Hamilton left Kendal and marched into Lancashire, intending for London, which the English Army resolved to hinder, and therefore marched to Preston, where Hamilton and Langdale lay with their Forces, reported to be twenty thousand strong; Cromwell and Lambert now joyned were reckoned to have five thousand Horse and Dragoons, and seven thousand Foot. August the 17th, both Armies faced one another, Major Smithson commanded the forlorn of the English, who charged furiously on the Scots Van, and routed them, and alarmed the whole Army, and so the Battles joyned on a Moor two Miles East of Preston, and the Fight was very hot for two Hours, and then the Scots gave Ground, which encouraged the English to pursue them, and that so fiercely, that they were forced to divide; one Part being a Body of three thousand Horse, moved towards Lancaster, and was followed and dispersed by Colonel Twisleton and Colonel Thornlow (who took multitudes of them Prisoners); and the other Part Horse and Foot marched over the River Rible, whom the main of the English Army followed, and at Rible-Bridge the Scots made a stand, defending the Pass stoutly for two Hours, even to the Push of Pike, but where then constrained to retire. The next Morning the Scots drew up on a Hill on the side of Preston, whence being forced by the English, they fled in great Disorder to Wiggon, which they plundered, and the next Morning after marched towards Warrington (the English pursuing all the way); near Warrington the Scots taking Advantage of a Pass, made another Halt, but were again beaten with the Loss of a thousand Men, and were pursued to the very Bridge, where the Foot in Number four thousand, being deserted by the Horse, laid down their Arms and submitted to Mercy: Hamilton got away with three thousand Horse to Nantwich, where the Country being up in Arms seized upon most of them: Lieutenant General Cromwell marched towards Cumberland, to meet Monroe who was marching with a Reserve of Scots, giving Order to all the Parliament Commanders in these Counties to follow the flying Scots, by some of whom Major General Middleton who commanded four hundred Horse was defeated and taken Prisoner, and the rest dispersed: Hamilton himself was met with at Utoxeter, and made to submit to Mercy by the Lord

The Scots Army defeated by Lt. Gen. Cromwell.

1648. Lord Gray of Groby, who sent him Prisoner to Abby de la Zouch: In this Day's Fight, the English took more Prisoners than their own whole Army amounted to, the Scots Ensigns, Cornets, and Colours taken, were afterwards hung up in Westminster-Hall, Sir Marmaduke Langdale was apprehended in an Inn: Cromwell improved his Success, and came to Durham to look out Monroe supposed to be about six thousand strong, but the stricter Presbyterian Party in Scotland having now recovered the Sword, ordered him to return, which he obeyed more for Fear of the English, than Obedience to them, and joyning with the Earl of Lanerick, both together they made eight thousand Horse and Foot; to oppose whom, the Anti-Hamiltonians provided an Army, whereof the Earl of Argyle was Commander in Chief, and David Lesley Lieutenant General, but being too weak to fight them, Cromwell entered Scotland by their Invitation, and to smooth his way, he published the following Declaration.

Whereas we are marching with the Forces of the Parliament of England into the Kingdom of Scotland, in pursuance of the remaining Part of the Enemy who lately invaded the Kingdom of England, and for the Recovery of the Garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle: These are to declare, that if any Officer or Soldier under my Command shall take, or demand any Moneys, or shall take any Horses, Goods, or Victuals without Order, or shall abuse the People in any sort, he shall be tried and punished with Death by a Court Martial.

To him Argyle, Lowden, Leven, and other of the Scotch Nobility repaired, and contracted with him for subduing of the publick Enemy: And so much feared was he in Scotland, that the following Agreement was consented to by them.

First, That the Armies under Argyle, and the other under Lanerick and Monroe with all the Forces in any of the Garrisons in Scotland be disbanded, and Berwick and Carlisle be delivered to the English.

Secondly, That the Settlement of Religion at home, and promoting Reformation abroad, be ordered by the Determination of the General Assembly, and all Civil Differences be referred to a Parliament speedily to be called.

Thirdly, That no Party that were in the last Engagements against England, be of the new Parliament, or of the General Assembly. And so he returned into England after he had been invited to Edenburgh to Feasts and Banquets, and highly caressed by the States of Scotland with all Expressions of Honour: And in Yorkshire as he marched homewards, he was desired to reduce Scarborough and Pomfret Castles, which was then promised, but not till some time after effected: Colchester had endured a tedious Siege, and was now brought to such Scarcity of Provision that the Besieged had not Horse Flesh enough to serve them one Day (that being the Food which they had fed on almost a Fortnight, and not purchased without much Blood spilt in divers Sallies for dead Horses), and now perceiving all Hopes of Succour utterly frustrated, they were necessitated to yield.

The Prisoners of Quality were the Earl of Norwich, Capel, and Loughborough, eleven

Knights, twelve Colonels, eight Lieutenant Colonels, nine Majors, thirty Captains, and sixty five Gentlemen, the private Soldiers were about three thousand; three of the Knights were condemned to die by a Court-Martial, viz. Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Lisle, and Sir Bernard Gascoign a Florentine; but the last was reprieved because a Stranger, and the other two shot to Death, the first having (as the General said in his Letter to the Parliament falsified his Word with him) the second directed the shooting of poisoned Bullets against the Laws of Arms.

And so General Fairfax after much Loss of Time and Men, and difficult service for a quarter of a Year, took Possession of the Town of Colchester, August the 27th, after which he marched up and down the Counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Hartford, to settle Peace, and visit the Garrisons, and then returned to St Albans his Head-Quarters: And thus we have briefly described the Military Actions of this Year; and whilst the Army was busied in fighting, the Parliament were taken up with Petitions from the several Counties for a Treaty with the King; the City of London among the rest had preferred one, and withal desired as in one before, the release of their imprisoned Citizens, which were the Aldermen Langham and Bunch, and Serjeant Glyn their Recorder, to which the Houses readily consented, and likewise repealed their Orders against the Earls of Suffolk and Middlesex, and the Lords Berkley, Hunsden, Maynard, Willoughby of Parham, and the eleven Members, for they became very well inclined to Peace with the King, now they were freed from the Insolency of the Army by their Distance from them, and a Treaty was resolved on, and the Earl of Middlesex, Sir John Hopesley, and Mr. Bulkley were sent to the King, to let him know this their Resolution: Who returned with his ready Compliance thereunto; upon which the Parliament Voted.

That the Votes of Non-Addressees should be recalled.

That such Persons as he should send for, as necessary to him in the Treaty be admitted.

That he be in the same State of Freedom as at Hampton-Court, with such Servants as he desired.

That five Lords and ten Commons be chosen Commissioners to treat with the King, and the Place to be Newport in the Isle of Wight: And that the King be admitted to invite the Scots thereunto to Treat only concerning that Kingdom.

Which Votes were sent down to the King, who was to treat Personally with these Commissioners, viz. the Earls of Northumberland, Salisbury, Pembroke, and Middlesex, and the Lord Say, for the House of Lords; and the Lord Wainman, Mr. Pierpoint, Sir Henry Vane the younger, Sir Harbottle Grimston, Sir John Potts, Mr. Brown, Mr. Crew, and Mr. Bulkley for the House of Commons, and with King. these were joyned Mr. Hollis and Mr. Glyn.

The first was for calling in all the King's Declarations, which he assented to, with this Proviso, That neither of this Concession, nor any other of his, Advantage should be taken, unless the whole were concluded. The second Proposition was, Concerning the Settlement of the Church, in reference to which he condescended to settle the Directory, and to pass an Act to confirm the Assembly, and to establish the Presbyterian Government for three Years, reserving Liberty to himself and his Party to use the old Form: But would not agree to the utter Abolishing of the Episcopal Hierarchy, nor the Selling of their Lands. The third Proposition was, For settling the Militia in the Hands of the Parliament for twenty Years, solely; to which he assented. Likewise to the Fourth, For making void the Cessation of Ireland, and remitting the Government of it, both Civil and Military, to the two Houses at Westminster. And to the Fifth and Sixth, For nulling all Honours and Titles since the carrying away of the Great Seal, and for Payment of publick Debts. The seventh Proposition concerning Delinquents, to whom the Parliament proposed great Severity; the King moderated thus, he was contented that they should be fined, and prohibited Access to Council or Court without the Parliament's Consent; that they should be deprived for three Years of their Right of sitting in the Parliament, and brought to Tryal (if the two Houses should think fit) to suffer according to the Merit, whereof they should be legally convicted: But he would by no Means hear of branding them with Treason, nor taking away either Lives or Possessions from any, but such as after a legal Tryal should be found guilty of breaking the established Laws of the Land. The Eighth, For empowering the Parliament to confer all Officers of the Kingdom, and the chief Magistrates for twenty Years, he agreed to: And to the Ninth, For confirming the new Great Seal, with all Grants and Commissions sealed by it. And to the Tenth, For ratifying all Privileges, Grants, Charters, and Immunities to the City of London, with Power to dispose of the Tower, and their own Militia to be confirmed to them: And the Citizens to be exempted from Military Service out of the Liberties of the City, unless at the Parliament's Appointment. The last was, For total Exterminating the Court of Wards, which was also consented to, so as an hundred thousand Pounds might be yearly paid to the King by way of Compensation for it.

The Earl of Ormond had gotten back into Ireland, and raised Forces there, in Opposition to the Parliament, by the King's Commission; but the King assured the Commissioners, That if the Treaty should take Effect, the Irish Affairs should be managed at the Discretion of the Houses only.

The Parliament vote a full Agreement with the King.

The King having thus far complied with the Parliament, they likewise at his Desire voted;

That he be in Honour, Freedom, and Safety, according to the Laws. Secondly, That he have his Revenue as before, excepting the Deductions for such Forts and Garrisons, as were of Old accustomed to be maintained. Thirdly, That he have Compensation of the Court of Wards.

Fourthly, That an Act of Oblivion be passed with such Exceptions and Limitations as should be agreed on by both Houses.

Most Men thought now that the King and Parliament would have united, and so in all likelihood they had, nothing being in Difference but only the Business of Episcopacy: But whilst the King was treating for Peace at the Isle of Wight, with the Commissioners of the Parliament, the Officers of the Army were contriving at Windsor the Destruction of both. And having Force in their Hands, which is the last and most cogent Reason, they resolved to employ it. And first, General Fairfax, who was all along over-reached by Cromwell, was persuaded by him to command Colonel Hammond by his Letters to deliver up his Charge of the King's Person to Colonel Ewer, by whom the King was conveyed out of the Isle of Wight to Hurst-Castle, the 30th of November. But the Parliament declared their Resentment of this Action, and Voted, That the seizing upon the Person of the King, and carrying him Prisoner unto Hurst-Castle was without the Advice and Consent of the Houses.

Col. Ewer put in place of Hammond.

And thus the Treaty was violently broken off, yet the Lords voted the King's Concessions a sufficient Ground for Peace, and forthwith adjourned, and the major Part of the Commons voted the same. But the Army being now come up to London, and quartered at Whitehall, St. James's, the Meuse, and several Villages near, they resolved to hinder these Proceedings, and therefore discharged the Trained Bands from being a Guard to the Parliament, and ordered Colonel Pride's and Rich's Regiment to supply their Places, by whom above forty Members coming to the House were seized and committed to Guards in several Inns in Westminster, and the Parts adjoining: And not satisfied with this, they accused Major-General Brown, and above Ninety Members for inviting in the Scots the last Summer, and therefore required they might be excluded the House: At these Proceedings the Commons (being displeased) adjourned for four or five Days, in which Space the Army was busied in compleating their Model of Government, wherein it was, amongst other things proposed;

Divers Members of Parliament excluded by the Army.

The Parliament adjourned.

That the present Parliament should be dissolved the last of April next: And that the Representatives of the whole Nation should consist of three hundred Persons, half which Number should suffice to make an Act of Law, and that in the Intervals of Parliament a Council of State should govern.

The Model of Government proposed by the Army.

And this Declaration, together with half a Score of Modifications, they filed, The Agreement of the People; which was afterwards presented to the House of Commons by Sir Hardress Waller and sixteen Officers, when the House new moulded by the Army, met again, (for besides those that they forced out, a great Number absented themselves); and to testify their Submission to the Army, they restored the Votes of Non-Addressees, and repealed those which appeared of the King's Concessions, and Voted, That no Message be received from the King upon Pain of Treason; That the General should take Care of his Person; And, that the Council of War

The Parliament new moulded by the Army met again.

Their Votes.

1648. War should draw up a Charge of Treason against him; which manifested that impious Intention to destroy him, which before they had determined: But before this open and avowed Acting, some secret Practices were designed upon his Life, as appeared in the Letters and Informations of one Dowcet and Osburn against Captain Rolph, who commanded a Company of the Guards about the King, whom Osburn particularly accused to have projected his Death, by Poison or Pistol, and not without the Privy of Colonel Hammond and some Chiefs of the Army that incited them thereunto: And tho' great Endeavours were used to obstruct any Proceedings in the Business, yet the Clamour of the People was so great, that they were forced to commit him to Prison, and subject him to Trial; but by the stickling of some of the prevailing Party in his Behalf, the Indictment against him was found Ignoramus by the Grand Jury of Hampshire, at Southampton or Winchester, by the Advice of Maynard, of Council with him, because there was but one Witness to each Fact, as in Cases of Treason there ought to have been two.

December the Tenth, the King was brought from Hurst Castle with a strong Guard to Winchester, next Day to Farnham, and the next Day to Windsor: In the mean time the two Houses differed among themselves; the Commons asserted, That it is Treason for the King to levy War against the Commonwealth, and drew up an Ordinance for his Trial as a Traytor; and the Lords denied that the King can commit any Treason against the Commonwealth, and therefore rejected the Ordinance of the Commons, and declared, That no Act of the Commons is binding without their Consent; and adjourned for a Fortnight: Upon which the Commons voted, That all Members and others appointed to act in any Ordinance with the Peers, are empower'd and enjoyn'd to sit, act, and execute, notwithstanding the Peers joined not therein; and so earnest were both the Commons and the Army about the King's Trial, that the Queen desiring to see her Husband before his Arraignment, could not obtain a Pass for her secure coming and returning.

January the Sixth, the Ordinance for the King's Trial was turned into an Act of the Commons alone, and engrossed, and Proclamation was made two Days after in Westminster-Hall, Cheapside, and the Old Exchange, for Witnesses to come in against him, and Commissioners were appointed about it; and now the City (or rather a contemptible Party therein, suborned to that Purpose) petitioned the House for Justice against the King. And Hillary Term, beginning January the twenty third, was adjourned 'till fourteen Days after, to give Place to the Proceedings against him.

January the 19th, the King was brought from Windsor to St. James's House, and all things were prepared for his fatal Tragedy, in which the Commons proceeded notwithstanding the Dissent of the House of Lords, and the Remonstrance of the Parliament of Scotland, now convened against it: The Act of Parliament which directed the Trial of the King, appointed a new Tribunal, called the High Court of Justice, who were empowered to convene, hear, judge, and execute Charles Stuart King of England. His Title in Writs they abrogated, and ordered the Great Seal of England to be broken, and a new Seal to be made with the Cross for England, and the Harp for Ireland thereon, and these Words, The Great Seal of England, and on the Reverse, the Picture of the House of Commons sitting, with these Words, In the first Year of Freedom by God's Blessing restored, 1648.

Thus this great, though unfortunate Prince, Monarch of three mighty Kingdoms, was now through the inscrutable Providence of the Omnipotent Disposer of all things, subjected to the miserable Condition of a calamitous Prisoner to his own Subjects, by whom he was tried, condemned, and lastly executed, yet not without a sharp Retaliation (however late) upon the Heads of the greatest Part of those that were the chief Contrivers and Actors of so abhorred a Fact, as in the Sequel of the Story will appear.

Of his TAXATIONS.

KING James dying, left his Son a large Dominion, but a poor Exchequer, which was the Occasion that his Taxations were more frequent than before in his Father's Reign.

In his first Year, the Parliament at their first Session granted him two Subsidies from Protestants, and four from Popish Recusants, and from the Clergy three; and 'till the Parliament took Order therein, he continued the Levies as in his Father's time of Tonnage, Poundage, and other Sums by way of Imposit upon Merchandise imported and exported.

In his second Year he engaged in a War with France, and for the Relief of Rockell, he raised near two hundred thousand Pounds by Loan.

In his third Year, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, they gave him five Subsidies.

In his sixth Year, he revived an antient * Custom or Usage by which all that were qualified by the Law for Knighthood, were to take upon them that Order, or to make Fine for Respite of the same, whereby an hundred thousand Pounds was brought into the Exchequer.

In his ninth Year, by the Advice of his Attorney-General, and other his Council learned in the Laws, several Writs were issued under the great Seal of England; for the Charging of the Ports, Towns, Cities, Boroughs, and Counties of this Realm respectively, to provide and furnish Ships for the Defence of the King and the Kingdom, whereby great Sums were raised. And in a Parliament holden in Ireland, the Deputy obtained some Subsidies for the Payment of the Army of that Realm, and the Encrease of his Majesty's Revenue there.

In his sixteenth Year, the Earl of Strafford obtained of the Irish Parliament the grant of four Subsidies: And the Convocation of Bishops in England gave him an ample Benevolence of four Shillings in the Pound for six Years, to be assessed on all the Clergy in England, towards the carrying on of a War with Scotland then begun.

And in the same Year, the Parliament of England then assembled, granted to him four entire Subsidies for the Relief of his Army then raised against against the Scots, and for Relief of the Northern Parts of the Kingdom then much burthened by an Army of the Scots quartering in those Parts, who imposed great Taxes on the Inhabitants where they lay for their Maintenance.

In his seventeenth Year, the same Parliament granted two Subsidies for the further Relief of his Majesty's Army, and the Northern Parts of the Kingdom; and likewise a Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage, and other Sums of Money payable upon Merchandise exported and imported, from the twenty fifth of May, to the fifteenth of July following, and when that Act was expiring, they granted another for the same Duties from the fifteenth of July to the tenth of August following; and by five other subsequent Acts, the Parliament granted the like Subsidy and Imposition upon Merchandise to the third of May, 1642. And the said seventeenth Year, several Sums of Money were by Act of Parliament charged upon Persons according to their Ranks, Dignities, Offices, Callings, Estates and Quality, by way of Pole, for the speedy disbanding two Armies then in the Bowels of the Kingdom.

This Year also a Contribution and Loan was granted for the Relief of Ireland, where a bloody Rebellion had broken forth the Year before.

And in his eighteenth Year, an Act passed for Raising and Levying of Monies for the necessary Defence and great Affairs of the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, and for the Payment of Debts undertaken by the Parliament.

These were all the Taxations either by Loan or otherwise raised by Royal Authority during the King's Reign. But the War which the Parliament raised without his Authority, and against it, was supported and maintained by great and vast Sums of Money illegally levied on the Subjects by Contribution, Assessments, and Excise, which cannot be properly here inserted.

Of the LAWS made in his REIGN.

THOUGH it is certain this unhappy, but worthy Prince, was sometimes misled to extend the Royal Power beyond its legal Bounds, yet as Extremes easily pass from one into another, so in no Reign were more excellent Laws made for the Security of the Subjects Liberties. In his third Year, the Petition of Right was made a Law; by which no Subject can be compelled to any Gift or Contribution to the King, but by Consent of Parliament: Soldiers are forbidden to be quartered in private Houses; and Martial Law is annulled. In the 16th Year of his Reign was passed, what was then called the Triennial Act, entituled, A Bill to prevent Inconveniencies from long Intermiſſions of Parliaments. By this Act, if the King should refuse to summon a Parliament at the end of three Years Intermiſſion, the Chancellor or Keeper might issue out Writs to summon the Peers, and elect the Commons: If the Chancellor or Keeper should neglect this, any Twelve of the Peers might summon the Parliament: If the Peers should not send out their Summons, the Sheriffs in Counties, and other Magistrates might cause Elections to be made; and if these should omit their Duty, the Electors might assemble themselves and chuse Members. The Court of Star-

Chamber had been so much distorted from its original Institution, to the Infringement of the publick Liberty, as had also the High-Commission-Court, that two Acts were passed for taking them away for ever. An Act was also passed to dis-annul the Claim of Ship-Money, and for vacating all Proceedings thereon. There having great Vexations arisen to the Subject, from the Uncertainty of the Limits and Extent of the Royal Forests, a Law was made at that time for ascertaining the same. An Act was also passed, for regulating the Office of Clerk of the Market, which had been grievous in some Cases to the Subject. Another Law was made, for preventing all vexatious Proceedings touching the Order of Knighthood; by which the Inconveniencies arising from an old Law, by which all Persons of such an Estate were obliged to receive Knighthood from the King, were taken away. Two other remarkable Acts were passed, of which one is expired, the other repealed: The first, for continuing the Parliament 'till they should dissolve themselves; the other, for taking away the Bishops Votes in Parliament. These were the principal Laws made in this Reign; the others of less general Concern, being not of Importance enough to be particularly recited.

AFFAIRS of the CHURCH in his Time.

AT the beginning of his Reign the Division occasioned by Arminius's Doctrines, in Holland, crossed the Seas hither, and continued with great Heat on both Sides; though the Doctrines themselves were so obscure, and therefore so frivolous, that the great Use that can be drawn from them is, that nothing is so trivial, that may not be made a Ground of Quarrel. This Controversy was succeeded by another of a little more Weight and Import concerning the Observation of the Lord's Day; which some were for keeping with a Judaical Strictness; while others ran into another Extreme, and were for allowing of Liberties rather too light and extravagant for so solemn a Day. Archbishop Laud closed in with the latter Party, and persuaded the King to issue out a Declaration for tolerating certain Sports, after divine Service of that Day; as Dancing, Whitsun-Ales, setting up May-Poles, &c. But this Declaration produced great Inconveniencies; some Ministers refused to publish it, and upon that Account were suspended by the High-Commission-Court, which furnished Matter of Complaint at that Day of Account, which arrived at the Meeting of the Parliament, in 1641. Many pious Persons of the Laity were also offended at it, and thought an Innovation of this kind, made with so little Reason, might be the Forerunner of others of the like Nature. And the natural Seriousness of the English Temper produced so general a Dislike to it, that in no long time it grew antiquated and dis-used. When the Parliament met, in 1639, the Convocation met at the same time; which was continued after the Parliament was dissolved. They composed seventeen Canons, but of no great Importance, and scarce any time in Use: One thing was done by them, which gave great Exception;

1648. on; the framing an Oath to prevent Innovations in Doctrine and Government; which Oath had an Ec. in it: It began thus; I A. B. do swear, that I approve the Doctrine of the Church of England; and afterwards it went on, nor will I ever give my Consent to alter the Government of this Church, by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, and Archdeacons, &c. as it stands now established. For this and other Reasons; these Cannons were so much opposed, that little was heard of them afterwards.

Pembroke College in Oxford built and endowed.

Pembroke College in Oxford was erected and built in the Place where formerly Broadgates-Hall stood, at the Charge of Thomas Tisdale of Glympton in the County of Oxford, who gave five thousand Pounds thereunto; and Richard Wightwick Rector of East Isle in Berkshire gave to it Lands of the yearly Value of an hundred Pounds, and hereupon King James in the latter end of his Reign gave his Licence for the building the College, and granted to it a Charter of Mortmain of seven hundred Pounds a Year; but the College was not built 'till the first Year of this King's Reign, and he gave to it the perpetual Patronage of the Church of St. Aldates near adjoining. Sir Foulk Grevil, Lord Brook, founded a History Professorship in the University of Cambridge, and gave a hundred Pounds a Year thereunto for ever; and Sir Thomas Adams a competently learned and worthy Citizen, and sometime Lord Mayor of London, erected and endowed an Arabick Professorship in the same University.

An Arabick Professorship erected and endowed there.

Oriel College in Oxford new built.

Anthony Blencow sometime Provost of Oriel College in Oxford, gave twelve hundred Pounds towards the re-edifying of the Front of that College, and by his Example some other Benefactors did so largely contribute, as to new build the whole College, which from a very old and decayed Building, is now as handsome a uniform Pile as any in that, or any other University in Europe.

The King and Queen great Benefactors to Jesus and Queen's College in Oxford.

The Queen Henrietta Maria, Wife to this King, of her great Goodness and Love to Learning, procured of the King her Husband the perpetual Patronage of several good Parsonages in Hantsire to be granted to Queen's College in Oxford; and the King out of his Care to have the Inhabitants of Jersey and Guernsey well educated, gave some Fellowships in Jesus College and Pembroke College in Oxford, to the Natives of those Islands.

A new Court in St. John's Oxford built by Archbishop Laud.

Sir William Paddy, Knight, Doctor of Physick, gave two perpetual Parsonages to St. John's College in Oxford, and beautified the Chappel thereof, and endowed some Singing Men and Choristers to make a Choir therein; and William Laud Archbishop of Canterbury, built a new Court in the same College, a very elegant Fa-brick, and was otherwise a good Benefactor thereunto; he also enlarged the publick University Library, and purchased to it at a great Price many Manuscripts of the Eastern Languages; and by that Example, Sir Kenelm Digby, a valiant and learned Knight, gave a numerous Collection of choice and excellent Books to it.

The antient Hall of Clare-Hall in Cambridge, and many Lodgings there were built at the Charge of Barnaby Oke, Proctor of the University, and Fellow thereof, and some other Benefactors (procured chiefly by his Sollicitation,) which is for so much of it, as handsome a Building as any in England.

The King was very sollicitous to repair the antient Cathedral Church of St. Paul in London, which was much decayed with Age, and advised with Archbishop Laud; and some others of his Council, how to effect so pious and so noble a Purpose, which was after some time resolv'd on, and he himself at his own Charge repaired some Part thereof, and by his Inducement, Sir Paul Pindar, a wealthy and worthy Citizen, and many others, contributed largely thereunto, so that the Work went on very fast, and had not the Civil Wars made an Interruption to it, in few Years St. Paul's Church would have been made the most magnificent Structure of Europe.

Mr. John Eggor erected and endowed a Free-School in the Parish of Alton in Hantsire, which was confirmed by Act of Parliament.

The King also, by his Letters Patents, gave Power to the Town of Plymouth to erect a new Church there. The Citizens of Edinburgh in Scotland also built a new Church in that City called the Fronekirk, and covered it with Plates of Copper, and one Heriat, a Citizen of that City founded an Hospital there, which is one of the most beautiful Buildings of that Kingdom. There were many Free-Schools besides those here mentioned, and many Alm-houses erected in several Parts of England; and some Hospitals; but we have not now so particular Information thereof, as to make mention of them in this Place, but by what has been here expressed, we may see the pious and charitable Effects of the just Security and Peace of the first fifteen Years of the King's Government, which is all the time he reigned freely, and without Opposition.

A new Church built at Plymouth. The like at Edinburgh.

Of Casualties happening in his Time.

IN his first Year, the Plague broke out in London more dangerously than in the Beginning of his Father's Reign, insomuch that the King was fain to adjourn the Parliament, because of the thin Appearance of the Members by Reason of the Contagion.

In his second Year, were great Earthquakes in many Parts of the Kingdom.

In his seventh Year, May the 29th, a Star appeared visible at Noon, the Sun shining clear at what time the King rode to St. Paul's Church to give Thanks for the Queen's safe Delivery of her second Son Prince Charles.

In his eighth Year, a Fire broke out on London-Bridge, by which most of the Houses which were built upon it (which when they were all standing, made up a very beautiful Street) were burnt down to the Ground.

In his sixteenth Year, the Earl of Haddington in Scotland, having recovered some Pieces of Ordnance which the Garrison of Berwick had seized at Dunee, return'd back to Douglafs, where sitting merry at Dinner, with about twenty

A sad Accident at Douglas in Scotland. Knights and Gentlemen, on a sudden the Magazine of Powder that lay in a vaulted Room, took fire by Accident, whereby the Earl and his company were blown up.

A Pond in Cambridge became red as Blood, the Water whereof being taken up in Basons, retained still the same Colour. Many Sights also were seen in the Air, as Armies fighting one against the other, which were looked upon as the sad Prefages of the ensuing Wars: Neither is that strange Thunder and Lightening unworthy of mention which happened at Witbecombe in the County of Devon in the fourteenth Year of his Reign, where a Ball of Fire was seen to come into the Church in the time of divine Service, whereby three Persons were killed, and threescore and two hurt, divers of whom had the Linings of their Cloaths burnt, though their outward Garments were not so much as singed, and most of the Seats were turned up-side down, and the Pillars, Steeple, and Church, more endamaged than the Expence of three hundred Pounds could repair.

Strange Thunder at Witbecombe.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Mary the Daughter of Henry the fourth King of France, whose Marriage was solemnized in the Year 1625, being the first Year of his Reign; he had Issue by her, four Sons, and as many Daughters; the eldest Son born before the time, was baptized Charles, and lived not above two Hours: His second Son born May the 29th, 1630. was also named Charles, and afterwards created Prince of Wales: And in the Year 1660, restor'd (after many Years Seclusion in foreign Countries) with the universal Congratulation of his Subjects to his Father's Throne: His third Son was born October the 13th, 1633. and was baptized James, and created Duke of York: His fourth and last Son was born the 20th of July, 1640. and christened Henry, afterwards created Duke of Gloucester: His eldest Daughter Mary, was born November the 4th, 1631. and afterwards married to William of Nassau, Prince of Orange, by whom he had one Son named William, Heir and Successor to his Father in his Dignities; she quickly followed her Brother the Duke of Gloucester, viz. the 24th of December, 1660: His second Daughter Elizabeth, was born the 28th of December, 1635. She died at Carisbrook in the Isle of Wight, September the 8th, 1650. for Grief (as it is believed) of her Father's unfortunate Death: His third Daughter Anne, was born the 17th of March, 1636. who died very young: His fourth and last Daughter Henrietta, was born June the 16th, 1644. at Exeter, from whence she was brought up to St. James's, but afterwards conveyed into France by her Governess the Lady Dalkeith; she was married to the Duke of Anjou, Brother to Lewis the fourteenth, the present King of France.

Of his Death and Burial.

WE are now come to recite as mournful a Story as the English History affords: If we consider both the Greatness and Innocence of the Sufferer, and the barbarous Usage he underwent. The Leaders in the Army and Parliament (if this last might be called so, where so many Members had been outrageously driven away) had, after many Consultations agreed to bring the King to a publick Trial. This was done to avoid the Odium of a private Assassination; for they were resolved to put him out of the Way. And though it was a thing without Precedent in the Times past, and so incredible to the present, that none could believe it would be attempted 'till they saw it done; yet the Authors of it had that wicked Forecast, as to consider well the Consequences of it, and to know that it suited their Ends: For if the King should plead to such an illegal Court, it would be such a Submission to their Authority, as was next to a Confirmation of it; if he did not, it would give them an Opportunity of putting him to Death with some Form of Law, for standing mute.

To effect this, an unheard of Court, called an High Court of Justice, was erected, consisting of about 150 Persons, of whom the major Part might proceed. These Judges were partly composed of those Members of Parliament, and Officers of the Army who had been most notorious for their Enmity to the King; and partly of some Citizens and Country Gentlemen remarkable on the same Account, but otherwise of very ordinary Figure and Condition. Besides these, there was one chosen to be the Speaker, or Prolocutor to this wicked Assembly, under the Name of a President, who was named John Bradshaw, a Lawyer of Gray's-Inn, a Person little known in Westminster-Hall, but of good Chamber Practice. Scaffolds were erected in Westminster-Hall, as is done usually upon Impeachments, for the Trial of a great King by some of the meanest of his Subjects.

These Preparations being made, the King was brought to St. James's, as was said above: And the next Day after his Arrival there, he was made to appear before this Tribunal. A Chair was set for him within the Bar, to which he was conducted by the Mace of the Court. The King entered the Place with great Unconcern in his Countenance, and sat down, and looked resolutely about him, without stirring his Hat; which Bradshaw the President had the Insolence to reprehend, then spoke to him, and told him, that he was brought thither to hear the Charge against him by the Commons of England. The Charge was then read, importing, That he had been admitted King of England, and trusted with a limited Power to use the Government according to Law, and by his Oath and Office, was obliged to use the Power committed to him for the Good of his People; but that out of a wicked Design, to erect to himself an unlimited and tyrannical Power, and to overthrow the Rights and Liberties of the People, he had traiterously levied a War against the present Parliament, and the People therein represented. Then were mentioned his first Appearance at York with a Guard, then his being at Beverly, then his setting up his Standard at Nottingham, the Day of the Month and Year in which the Battle of Edgehill was fought, and all the other several Battles that were fought in his Presence; in which it was laid to his Charge, that he had caused many many Thousands of his People to be slain; that after he was a Prisoner, he had caused many Insurrections to be made; that he had been the Author and Contriver of those unnatural and bloody Wars, and was guilty of all the Murders, Rapines, and other Mischiefs committed therein; that therefore he was impeached for those Crimes, on the Behalf of the People of England, as a Tyrant, Traytor, and Murderer; and it was prayed that he might answer to all the Particulars alledged against him.

Bradshaw, with great Impudence, told the King he had heard his Charge, and that the Court expected his Answer to it. The King replied with great Resolution, That he first desired to know by what Authority they called him thither, and who gave them Power to judge of his Actions; though they were such as he had no Reason to be ashamed to own. He told them he was their King, they his Subjects, who owed him Duty and Obedience; that no Parliament had Authority to call him before them, nor were they the Parliament. And after having proved this by such lively and cogent Reasons, as admitted no Answer, he told them, he should betray his Royal Dignity, and the Liberties of his People, if by answering any thing there alledged against him, he should acknowledge their unlawful Authority.

This was the Substance of what he said for three successive Days together, when he was brought before this illegal and traitorous Court, which he insisted on with those convincing Arguments, and that admirable Courage, Steadiness and Magnanimity, as must have overcome and melted any Hearts, on which Reason, Shame, or Sense of Vertue could make any Impression. In his Passage thither and back again, on those Days, the Soldiers were ordered by their Officers to cry out, Justice, Justice, Execution, Execution, as he went along, some of them being beaten for not joining in the Cry; while others of a more barbarous Nature, treated him with many other Scoffs and Indignities; some of them blowing the Smoke of their Tobacco in his Face (a thing very grievous and distasteful to him) and one of them arriving to that Pitch of Insolence and Barbarity, as to spit upon his Cheek. All which this Royal Sufferer underwent with an invincible Fortitude, and a patient and Christian Submission to the unsearchable Decrees of the Almighty.

The Authors of this wicked Judicature, were much confounded that the King refused to submit to its Authority; and it was the Hopes that he would alter his Mind, and not a Sense of Justice or Mercy, (of which they were equally incapable) that induced them to bring him so many times before them. But when they found his Constancy invincible, they resolved to revenge it, by deferring no longer their last and impious Blow. Two Days were spent by them in Consultations, about the Circumstances and Manner of putting him to Death; in which several cruel and horrible Proposals were made. At last it was agreed, that he should be beheaded at the Gate of his own Palace at Whitehall, over against the Banqueting House.

Then on the following Day, the King was brought again before the High Court of Justice,

Bradshaw the President being in a scarlet Gown, to shew the King what he was now to expect. Bradshaw began, addressing himself to the Spectators, and telling them, that the Prisoner having been several times brought before the Court, had stood contumacious, and declined the Authority of the same: Upon which they had agreed to pass Sentence upon him; but that he having desired to be heard a few Words first, they had consented to it. The King then told him, that if he had refused to plead to his Charge, and acknowledge their Jurisdiction, it might from thence appear, that the Interest and Liberties of his People were dearer to him, than his own Safety; for had he loved his Life as well, he might still have prolonged it, by pleading to the Charge, and making his Defence, but he could not resolve to do that. He then desired, that before Sentence were given, he might be heard in the Painted-Chamber, before the Lords and Commons; that he would then make some Proposals that might tend to the Peace and Happiness of the Kingdom. It is thought that his Intention was to offer to resign his Crown to the Prince of Wales; but whether his Enemies had a Suspicion of this, or whether they were resolved on his Death is uncertain: But after having withdrawn half an Hour, they returned; and the President told him, that Judges could no more delay Justice, than they could not deny it, and therefore they had unanimously agreed to proceed to Sentence and Judgment. The King pressed them again and again to hear him, but was so stiffly denied, that he said no more. After a long Speech by Bradshaw, the Sentence was read, importing, That he having refused to give his Answer to the Charge against him, the Court adjudged, that as a Tyrant, Traytor, and Murderer, he should be put to death, by severing his Head from his Body. This monstrous Sentence being pronounced, the King was taken away.

Only two Days were allowed him before Execution, which he spent in a devout Preparation for his approaching Change; in which he was assisted by Dr. Juxon Bishop of London, whose Attendance was granted him. He was visited by those of his Children who were then in England, the Lady Elizabeth, and the Duke of Gloucester; but he refused to see any other Persons, though several Noblemen, who had been formerly in his Service, came to take their last Farewel of him. He received his Children with great Joy and Pleasure. The Duke of Gloucester was not eight Years old, and not capable of understanding the Misfortunes of his Father; but the Lady Elizabeth being above Thirteen, and of a Maturity of Understanding above her Years, the King addressed himself chiefly to her: Seeing her Face all covered with Tears, he exhorted her to comfort herself, since the Death he should die was glorious; being for the Laws and Liberties of his People: He then advised her to read Bishop Andrews's Sermons, Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, and Archbishop Laud against Fisher, to establish in her a Sense of Piety and Devotion, and a Knowledge and Love of that Religion she professed. He ordered her to remember him to the Queen her Mother, and to assure her, that she had ever been present sent to his Mind, and that to the last Hour of his Life his Thoughts would never wander from her: He charged her with his Blessing, to order her Brothers and Sisters to love one another, to be obedient to their Mother, and to forgive their Father's Enemies. Then taking the Duke of Gloucester upon his Knee, he said, Sweet-heart, now they will cut off thy Father's Head, (upon which Words the Child looked very wishfully on him) mark Child what I say, they will cut off my Head, and perhaps, make thee a King; but mark what I say, you must not be a King as long as your Brothers Charles and James are alive; for they will cut off your Brothers Heads, if they can catch them, and cut off your Head too at last; and therefore I charge you, don't be made a King by them. At this the young Prince said, sighing, I will be torn to Pieces first; which Saying, expressed with so much Spirit, rejoiced the King extremely: Then in Kisses and Embraces, he took his last Farewel of them, and commended them to the Blessing and Mercy of God.

On the Morning of the Day on which he was to be put to Death, he rose from a sound Sleep of four Hours, earlier than usual; and gave it as his Reason, that he had a great Work to do that Day. Bishop Juxon attended him, and performed divine Service before him; and it happened that the History of our Saviour's Passion came to be read in Course for the second Lesson, which comforted and delighted the King exceedingly. He then received the Holy Sacrament from the Bishop's Hands, and having spent some time in religious Exercises, he left St. James's about Ten of the Clock. He went on Foot through the Park, attended by the Bishop on one Hand of him, and Colonel Tomlinson, who was his Guard, on the other; a Regiment of Foot surrounding him. The Soldiers marching slow, according to the Custom of Military Order, he spoke to them to go faster, telling them that he now went to strive for a heavenly Crown with more Eagerness, than he had before encouraged his Soldiers to fight for an Earthly Diadem.

The Scaffold on which this odious Act was to be perpetrated, not being ready, an Hour or two extraordinary were added to the King's Life, which he spent in Acts of Devotion. A Dinner had been prepared for him, but he refused to eat any thing, 'till the Bishop persuaded him to drink one Glass of Wine, and eat a Piece of Bread: Then, at One of the Clock, he rose up, and came out upon the Scaffold, with that Intrepidity, which Death itself, when duly prepared for, cannot daunt or dismay. The Scaffold was hung with Black; and two Executioners attended there dressed in Frocks, with Vizards on; and that no shew of Cruelty might be wanting, there were Ropes, with Hooks and Staples provided, by which he was to be drawn down to the Block by Force, if he shewed any Reluctance: But the divine Goodness so assisted him, that he was not shocked or affrighted at so strange and unexpected an Instance of their Barbarity. The Scaffold was surrounded by so numerous a Guard, both of Horse and Foot, that the other Spectators, who, with bleeding Hearts stood to behold this mournful Sight, were far removed out of hearing. Upon this the King addressed himself to Colonel Tomlinson, and Dr. Juxon, in a long Speech, in which he cleared himself of the Imputation of having begun the War, and of the Blood-shed consequent upon it: He declared his Forgiveness of his Enemies; and his Profession of the Protestant Faith according to the Church of England: He then prepared himself for the fatal Stroke, and put his Hair under his Cap: He gave the Executioner the Sign, by which he should know when to strike; which was by stretching out his Hands: He then said a few Words to himself as he stood, and immediately after laid his Neck upon the Block: The Executioner put his Hair farther under his Cap, which made the King believe he was going to strike; upon which he called to him to stay for the Sign. Then after a little Pause, he stretched out his Hands, and the Executioner, with one Blow, severed his Head from his Body; which ended at once his long Warfare and Afflictions, and conveyed his Soul to those bright Realms, where an immortal Crown was waiting for him.

His Head being off, the Executioner held it up, and shewed it to the People; which done, it was, with the Body, put in a Coffin covered with black Velvet for that Purpose, and conveyed into his Lodgings at Whitehall; and from thence it was carried to his House at St. James's, where his Body was embalmed, and put in a Coffin of Lead, and laid there a Fortnight, to be seen by the People: And on Wednesday Seven-night after, his Corps embalmed, and coffin'd in Lead, was delivered chiefly to the Care of four of his Servants, viz. Master Herbert, Captain Anthony Mildmay, his Sewers, Captain Preston, and John Joyner, formerly Cook to his Majesty, who (with others) cloathed in Mourning Suits and Cloaks, accompanied the Hearse that Night to Windsor, and placed it in that which was formerly the King's Bed-Chamber: Next Day it was removed into the Dean's Hall, which Room was hanged with black, and made dark, with Lights burning round the Hearse, in which it remained 'till Three in the Afternoon, about which time came the Duke of Richmond, the Marquess of Hertford, the Marquess of Dorchester, and the Earl of Lyndsey, having obtained an Order from the Parliament, for the decent Interment of the King, their Royal Master, provided the Expence thereof did not exceed five hundred Pounds: At their coming into the Castle, they shewed their Order of Parliament to Colonel Whitcomb, Governour of the Castle, desiring the Interment might be in St. George's Chapel, and by the Form in the Common Prayer Book; but this last was denied by the Governour: They then went to seek a convenient Place for the Burial of the Corps; and after some Search, they discovered a Vault in the Middle of the Choir, wherein, as it is probably conjectured, lieth the Body of King Henry the VIIIth, and his beloved Wife, the Lady Jane Seymour, both in Coffins of Lead. In this Vault (there being Room for one more) they interred the Body of the King, with only the following Inscription on the Coffin:

M.DC.XLVIII.

Princeps, ne prisco Natus ab Inacho; nil Interest, an Pauper, & infima de gente: sub dio jacebit, victima nil miserentis Orci.

Of his PERSONAGE and CONDITIONS.

His Character.

HE was of a comely Stature, straight, and well timbered, and very active and indefatigable in all Exercises; his Hair was of a darkish brown; one Imperfection he had, viz. a little Hesitation in his Utterance, which he so ordered by Custom, that whereas the like in others subtracted from their Eloquence, it was a kind of Grace and Ornament to his Speech. He was a Prince of great Wisdom, and all Princely Vertues, but so modest in the Exercise of them, that they appeared not in their full Splendor, 'till his Afflictions made them almost useless to any but himself; his Religion was in a Degree even to Perfection, both in the Theory and Practice of it: In the first, (especially in those Points in Controversy, concerning the Doctrine and Discipline of our Church,) few of his Clergy (though the most Learned in Europe) were more knowing; and in the Practice and Exercise of Holy Life, he was both an Example and Precept to them and all others in his Court and Kingdoms; Temperance, Sobriety, and all other moral Vertues, were almost inimitable in him; nor was his Courage less conspicuous, which sufficiently appeared in all Actions where he was present, and had more, if the great Care of his Safety in those about him, had not thereby given him less Occasion to shew it.

His Sufferings were such, as nothing but their Story at large can in any Measure express; such was his Fortitude, that in the greatest of his Prosperity and Misery, he retained an equal Temper of Mind: And although his Indulgence to his People induced him to condescend to divest himself of some Part of his Prerogative for his own time, to satisfy the causeless Jealousies of his Enemies, yet he would not consent to diminish the Regal Power of his Successor; and in what concern'd Religion, where he believ'd his Conscience unsatisfied, no human Consideration could alter him: His Clemency was very transcendent; for although no King ever received more Reproaches and Indignities from seditious Subjects, he never was heard to revile any of them, but rather to pray for the Conversion of the most, and commiserate such others whom the malicious Arts of his Enemies had perverted.

In several Battles in our unnatural War, where the Success was to his Party, he always lamented his Victory, and never had any signal Conquest, but he used it rather to invite his Enemies to receive his Mercy and Pardon, by offering Treaties of Accommodation, than by improving those Advantages to their Ruin, which Lenity was imputed by many to him, as one of the main Causes of his Misfortunes.

In Council he was quick and discerning, but somewhat too deliberate in Execution, and tho' none of his Counsellors equalled him in Parts, yet was he so diffident of his own Judgment, that he frequently declined that to follow the Advice of others (most commonly to the worse) as was in two things remarkably observed: In being persuaded to assent to the Act for perpetuating his last Parliament; and to the Earl of Strafford's Death; of the first indeed he never openly complained, because he did it to shew his Confidence in his People, (though ungratefully deceived in it) but of the latter he often repented.

To his Domesticks he was more like a familiar Friend than a Master, but did so temper his Affability with a Majesty of Port, that it begot in most of them a Reverence and Love; yet such was the Ingratitude even of some of these, that they mingled and joined in the Cry with the most virulent of his Enemies. To conclude, Though his Death was horrid and ignominious, and acted in the most immense Degree of Annoyance, by a wicked, mean, and inconsiderable Part of his People; never died Prince more lamented by the Generality of them.

Of Men of Note in his Time.

THE first fifteen Years of his Reign (following the many Years of Peace that went before in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth and King James,) gave small Encouragement to Martial Men, yet many of the King's Subjects of Spirits addicted thereunto, lifted themselves in the Service of Foreign Princes and States, and gave signal Proofs of their Courage; amongst which, those of most Remark that have come to our Knowledge, we shall mention in this Place: In this Number, Sir Charles Morgan bred in the Wars of the States of the United Netherlands, against the Spaniards, deserves a famous Memory, who being employed in Germany with six thousand English, more disquieted Count Tilly, the Emperor's General, than the King of Denmark could do with a far greater Army. Sir John Burroughs also at Cadix and the Isle of Rhe, perform'd Services never to be forgotten, and was a great Captain; and Sir Simon Harcourt also in Ireland, as before in many other Parts, gave such Proof of his Excellency in Arms, as made his * Loss much lamented by all good Men. In the Wars of Germany, the Names of Ruthin, Lesley, Fleetwood, Douglass, and Hamilton are recorded to Posterity. Lesley arrived to great Honours in the Emperor's Court, and was made a Count of the Empire; but of all the others, Ruthin only served in our unhappy Wars, and deservedly had the Title of Earl of Brainford and Forth, conferred on him: Many others brave and expert Commanders there were, whose Eminences appeared not, 'till the King's Service called them to the Defence of his Crown and Dignity; of all which, if we should here make mention, they would fill a Volume. Those of most Note were, the Marquess of Montross, the Earls of Lindsey, Rochester, and Carnarvon; the Lords Jacob Ashley, Arthur Capel, George Goring, and * He was killed at the taking a Castle from the Irish.

Ralph Hopton; Sir Henry Gage, Sir Richard Greenvil, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Lisle, and Major-General Hurrey; each of which were able for Skill, Courage and Conduct, to command Armies. We may name amongst these, the Earl of Strafford, from the little time of whose Employment in War, great Signs appeared of rising Glory, and more had been, if an untimely and unmerited Death had not cropt his springing Laurels.

The most famous Men of Learning in his Time were of the Clergy, whereof Davenant Bishop of Salisbury, Andrews Bishop of Winchester, Morton Bishop of Durham, Laud Archbishop of Canterbury, Hall Bishop of Norwich, Prideaux Bishop of Worcester, Usher Archbishop of Armagh, and his Successor Bramhall; Sanderson Bishop of Lincoln, Mr. Chillingworth of Trinity College in Oxford, and Dr. Hammond, one of the Canons of Christ-Church, in the same University; and Mr. Mead of Christ's College in Cambridge, and Mr. Hales of Eaton, are most celebrated: But others there were of great Learning, as Lucius Lord Faulkland, Secretary of State, a great Master of all Sorts of Learning; Sir Edward Cook likewise, that famous Common Lawyer, and Mr. John Seldon of the same Profession, a most renowned Antiquary, and Thomas Hobbs of Malmesbury, that excellent Mathematician and Philosopher, all flourished in his Reign. Nor may we omit the Poets then famous, which excelled or equalled all that went before, and shall come after; such as were Mr. Benjamin Jonson, Mr. Edmund Waller, Mr. Thomas Carew, Sir John Suckling, Mr. Thomas Randolph, Mr. Thomas Cartwright, Mr. Abraham Cowley, and Sir William Davenant; the First whereof, by his profound Learning and Judgment, shewed a Poet was to be as well made as born; and the Latter, though he wanted Learning, made as high and noble Flights as Fancy could advance without it.

The First Thirteen YEARS OF THE REIGN OF King CHARLES II.

KING CHARLES the First being deprived of Life on the Thirtieth of January, One Thousand six Hundred Forty and Eight, in the Manner before-mentioned, his eldest Son Prince CHARLES, by unquestionable Right succeeded to the Crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, in the Eighteenth Year of his Age. Proclamation and Coronation, the usual Ceremonies attending Royal Successions, could not now have their due Course, nor are they in this Kingdom necessary Circumstances of our Monarchy; for by our Law (which admits of no Interregnum), the Successor to the Crown has all the Rights thereof, from the first Moment after the Death of his Predecessor. The ruling Part of the House of Commons, who Usurped the Government with Violence on the Person of the late King (as hath been related) knew they could not be secure if they rested there; so that immediately thereupon they published an Act even against Kingly Government it self, expressing therein;

An Act against proclaiming the King.

That whereas several Pretences might be made to this Crown, and Title to the Kingly Office set on Foot, to the apparent Hazard of the publick Peace. Be it Enacted and Ordained by this present Parliament, and by the Authority of the same, that no Person whatsoever do presume to proclaim, declare, publish, or any ways to promote Charles Stuart, (Son of the late King Charles) commonly called the Prince of Wales, or any other Person to be King, or chief Magistrate of England or Ireland, or of any Dominions belonging to them, by Colour of Inheritance, Succession, Election, or any other Claim whatsoever, without the free Consent of the People in Parliament, first had and signified by a particular Act or Ordinance for that Purpose, any Law,

Statute, Usage, or Custom to the contrary notwithstanding: And whosoever shall, contrary to this Act, proclaim, &c. the said Charles Stuart, shall be deemed and judged a Traytor, and suffer accordingly.

Yet this Inhibition did not deter many Loyal Subjects from doing their Duty; and on the second of February this Year, the following Proclamation was printed and scattered about the Streets of London.

We the Noblemen, Judges, Knights, Lawyers, A Proclamation Gentlemen, Freeholders, Merchants, Citizens, Yeomen, Seamen, and other Freemen of England, do, proclaim-according to our Allegiance and Covenant, by these Charles to Presents, heartily, joyfully, and unanimously acknowledge and proclaim the illustrious CHARLES be King of Prince of WALES, next Heir of the Blood Royal England. to his Father King CHARLES (whose late wicked and traiterous Murder we do from our Souls abominate, and all Parties and Consenters thereunto) to be by hereditary Birth-right, and lawful Succession, rightful, and undoubted King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, and the Dominions thereunto belonging; and that we will faithfully, constantly, and sincerely in our several Places and Callings, defend and maintain his Royal Person, Crown and Dignity, with our Estates, Lives, and last Drop of our Bloods, against all Opposers thereof, whom we do hereby declare to be Traytors and Enemies to his Majesty and his Kingdoms. In Testimony whereof, we have caused these to be published and proclaimed throughout all Counties and Corporations of this Realm, the first Day of February, in the first Year of his Majesty's Reign.

God save King Charles the Second.

Coronation,

1648. Coronation, which is the next Solemnity, the Exclusion of the King by the Malice of his Enemies, made impossible at this time to be celebrated. The Army had been before modelled suitable to these Designs of changing the Monarchy of England and Ireland, to a Commonwealth; for neither this Alteration, nor the Death of the late King could have been effected, without a Military Assistance, which was first discovered when Colonel Pride secluded, or terrified from sitting, near two Hundred of the Members of the Commons House of Parliament, being those who had on the fifth of December before, by Vote approved of the late King's Concessions for a Peace at the Isle of Wight, and those that remained after this Violation, complied so far with the Army herein, that after a seeming Dislike of their Proceedings, they resolved and decreed, never to re-admit them; and such others who had given their Negatives to the said Concessions, were likewise Ordered not to sit in Parliament, 'till they had entered their Dissent to them.

Monarchy and the House of Lords declared useless by the Commons.

The House of Peers continued yet sitting, and in regard the Commissions of the Judges were determined by the King's Death, they sent to the Commons for a Conference, about that and other Matters relating to the Settling of the Government; but they, without returning an Answer, declared the Kingly Office to be unnecessary and burthensome, and that the Lords House was dangerous and useless, and therefore to be laid aside; but that they might not be totally excluded from Government, they declared that they might be capable of Elections into the House of Commons, of which afterwards Three of them only accepted, namely, the Earls of Pembroke and Salisbury, and the Lord Howard of Esrick; but the Peers in General very much resented these Indignities put upon them by a small Part of the House of Commons, and in a Protestation by them published in the Name of all the Peers and Barons of the Realm;

The Protestation of the House of Lords against the Proceedings of the Commons.

" They asserted their own Privileges, and the Fundamental Laws of the Nation, and disclaimed and protested against all Acts, Votes, Orders or Ordinances of the said Members of the Commons House, for erecting of new Courts of Justice, to try or execute the King, or any Peer or Subject of this Realm, for altering the Government, Laws, Great Seal, Antient Forms of Writs, or legal Process, raising new Forces, and imposing new Taxes, or Oaths, granting Commissions, or making Officers; as likewise against the traitorous Murdering of the late King, and the dis-inheriting of his Son the Prince of Wales, and particularly against that Insolent and Frantick Vote (as they call'd it) of February the Sixth, concerning their Abolishing the House of Peers as useless and dangerous, all which Acts, Votes, and Orders, they declared to be not only illegal, and therefore void, but likewise detestable and destructive to the Rights and Beings of Parliaments, the Fundamental Laws of the Realm, and the Lives, Liberties, and Properties of the People.

This made little Impression upon the Commons, and to prevent the Assembling of the Lords, the Army, by their Appointment or Connivance, set a Guard upon the Doors of their House; and in further Prosecution of their former Votes against Monarchy, they formed and passed An Act for the Exheredation of the Royal Line, the Abolishment of Monarchy in this Kingdom, and the setting up of a Commonwealth; which they ordered to be published and proclaimed in all Parts of the Kingdom.

An Act for the Abolishing of Kingly Government.

Alderman Reynardson, the then Lord Mayor of London, a Person of great Integrity and Loyalty, refused to publish this Act in London, and was therefore discharged from his Office, and with three of the Aldermen that were of his Judgment, committed Prisoners to the Tower of London, and one Andrews was by a Common-Hall chosen in his Place; who, with Pennington, Atkins, Wollaston, Fowk, Edmonds, and Pack, then Aldermen of London, and some others, proclaimed this exorbitant Act in several Places of the City. But this great Alteration so much amused the Generality of the People, that the Parliament thought fit to give them some Satisfaction, which was endeavoured by a Declaration, to shew the Reasons of their Proceedings; wherein many plausible Pretences were exhibited, the chiefest whereof imported, A Promise of Deliverance from the Bondage introduced by the Norman Conquests, and of maintaining the antient Laws (which they extolled for their Excellency and Equality) adding, That they might well consist with the present Government of a Republick upon some easy Alterations of Form only, leaving the Substance entire, and reforming the Abuses thereof. They promised likewise, The Establishment of a firm and safe Peace, the Advancement of the true Protestant Religion, and the liberal Maintenance of a Godly Ministry; the settling of Treaties and Alliances with Foreign Princes and States, the Encouragement of Manufactures for the Increase and Flourishing of Trade, and the Maintenance of the Poor in all Places of the Land.

Alderman Reynardson the then Lord Mayor or committed to the Tower.

A Declaration for justifying their Proceedings.

About the time of publishing this Declaration, to compleat the Model of their Government, they abolished all the antient Forms of Sovereignty, in the Style and Teste of Writs, Commissions, and other publick Instruments, and ordered for the Future, all of them to be issued, In the Names of the Keepers of the Liberties of England by Authority of Parliament; and likewise they caused the Old Great Seal to be broken, and a New one to be made, having on one Side a red Cross and Harp, as the Arms of England and Ireland, with this Inscription, THE GREAT SEAL OF ENGLAND, and on the other, the Picture of the House of Commons, with these Words, viz. IN THE FIRST YEAR OF FREEDOM BY GOD'S BLESSING RESTORED, 1648. And as another Ensign of their Dominion, they appointed that all the Money which from that time was to be coined, should, instead of the King's Impression, bear the Cross and Harp, with this Motto, GOD WITH US: Those Clauses in the First of Queen Elizabeth, and the Third of King James, which enjoined the taking the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance to the Kings and their Successors, were repealed by them, and a new Oath was framed to be tendered

A Council of State erected.

The Parliament of Scotland did by their Commissioners protest against these Actings in England, and particularly they disclaimed the Proceedings against the late King, but the New English States resolutely answered,

That they of Scotland were at Liberty to act in their own Affairs, but were not to limit or impose upon others, with many extravagant Expressions to justify their Actings; but in the close they invited them to a Resemblance with themselves, saying, That if Scotland thought fit to vindicate their own Freedom and Liberty, they should be ready to afford them all Neighbourly Assistance.

Before this Answer could arrive in Scotland, the Scots had taken other Resolutions; for on the third of February in this Year, the King was proclaimed at the Cross at Edenburgh; and the Scotch Commissioners here, were about this time called home: But just at their Departure, they sent an Expostulatory Declaration to the sitting Members of our Parliament, wherein they put them in Mind of all their Vows, Oaths, and Protestations for the Maintenance of the King's Person, and just Rights; and upbraided to them their shameful Abjuration and Infringement of them by what they had lately acted.

The Scots Commissioners send the Parliament an Expostulatory Declaration.

This was so ill received by the Parliament, that they imprisoned the Messenger that brought it, and voted the Paper scandalous and seditious, and all such Persons Traytors as should join with, or adhere to the Subscribers; they also sent after the Commissioners, and secured them 'till a Copy of the Paper was sent into Scotland, to know if the Parliament and Estates there would own the same: Upon which a Messenger was sent from Scotland to our States, to justify what their Commissioners had done, and to complain of the Imprisonment of them, as a thing contrary to the Law of Nations; and thereupon the Commissioners were released and returned home: But these Proceedings on either Side increased the Distrust and Jealousies of each other.

They are stopped in their Journey home, and secured.

They are justified by a Message sent from the Estates of Scotland.

They are released.

In the Summer of this Year, several Loyal Persons unsuccessfully in many Places attempted by Arms to free the late King from great Oppression and imminent Danger, under which he then lay, as was shewed in the History of that time; of which Number the Duke of Hamilton, the Earls of Holland and Norwich, the Lord Capel, and Sir John Owen were about the latter end of February, or the beginning of March following, tried and condemned by a High Court of Justice erected for that Purpose, (a Copy of that fatal Original made for the Destruction of the late King) of which the Duke of Hamilton, the Earl of Holland, and the Lord Capel were Duke Hamilton, Earl of Holland, Lord Capel are tried by a High Court of Justice.

Executed the Ninth of March; but the Earl of Norwich and Sir John Owen were pardoned: The Earl of Norwich, upon an equal Division of the House of Parliament in a Vote for his Life, was saved by the casting Voice of Lenthall the Speaker; but Sir John Owen had on his Behalf the Suffrage of many more Voices than those against him, which was reported to be done at that time in a kind of popular Generosity; for that the Noblemen had all great Intercession made for them by those of their Allies (in Favour with some Grandees in Power;) but Sir John Owen a Commoner, coming from a remote Part, had none that interceded on his Behalf.

Duke Hamilton, who first came upon the Scaffold, in his Speech declared his Affection to this Kingdom, and the Reason of his coming into England with an Army, that is to say, his being commanded thereunto, by the peremptory Command of the Parliament of his own Country, which if he had disobeyed, he had suffered the same Penalty he was to suffer here for obeying. He said many things in Vindication of himself, from the Imputation of having been inconstant in his Religion, or false and unfaithful in his Actions towards the King his Master; he seemed also to intimate a Readiness to serve them in what they so much desired of him; namely, the Discovery of those who were the Inviters of him in, so that his Life might have been spared; with other things which concerned his Condition as a dying Man.

The Next that came after him, was the Earl of Holland, who touched upon the Honour of his Family, and the Nobleness of his Education, professed his sincere and constant Adherence to the true Protestant Religion, justified himself as to the Matter for which he was condemned, alledging his Defection from the Parliament, not to have been out of any ill Design against the State or Kingdom, or any Abjuration from his first Principles, which led him faithfully to serve the Parliament, whose Service he should not have deserted, had not the Changes and Alterations among them carried them beyond what was reasonable, or what, perhaps, they themselves at first intended. He prayed God to bless this Kingdom, and to settle it in the antient way of Government by the King, Lords and Commons, and wished the present Change might not bring Confusion upon it; he wished that the King's Posterity might be looked upon, and owned by the People, and re-established in their Native Rights without Blood-shed; that his Blood might be the last that might be spilt; and concluded, as he was Chancellor of Cambridge, with his Prayers to God for a Blessing upon that University.

The last of the Three that suffered, was the Lord Capel, who having made a very able and substantial Defence for himself, both from the antient Laws and Privileges of the Nation, and from their own Acts and Consults (though all in vain) behaved himself at his Death, like what he had shewed himself all along to be, in his resolute Acting for the King's Service, a Person of a high Spirit, and heroick Fortitude, and delivered what he had to say, with a fearless and undaunted Deportment, wherein after Several others tried and executed.

The Blood of these Noblemen did not satiate those that caused the Effusion of it; for some others were cut off about the same time for the like Offences, though not by the same manner of Tryal, as Lieutenant-Colonel Morrice, and Colonel Blackborne, who was hanged and quartered at York by a Commission of Oyer and Terminer for the surprizing of Pontfract; one Beaumont a Minister was hanged at Pontfract, by Sentence of a Court Martial; and Major Monday was shot to death at Lancaster by the like Sentence; Colonel Langborn, Poyer and Powel, three worthy Endeavourers in the King's Service in Wales, were also by a Court Marshal sentenced to cast Lots for their Lives, and the fatal Chance falling on Poyer, he was shot to death in Covent Garden.

Judge Fenkins and Sir J. Stowel tried at the King's Bench Bar. Sir John Stowel, and Mr. David Jenkins (a Judge formerly in Wales) had better Fortune; for being both arraigned at the King's Bench Bar as Traytors against the Government, for their Loyalty to the King, though they never owned the Jurisdiction of the Court, the Judges would not give Sentence against them, nevertheless their Estates were seized, and the latter of the two was long imprisoned.

The Messengers sent from the King at the Hague are driven back by Storm. The Parliament of Scotland had sent two Gentlemen, to acquaint the King, being then at the Hague in Holland, with their Proceedings on his behalf, who, after being long at Sea, were beaten back by contrary Winds, so that he had no publick Notification of what was done there, though he wanted not private Advertisement of it: They resolved to invite him to that Kingdom, and were in Preparation of Propositions to be sent to him in order thereunto, but they were so much diverted by several Disorders in the Country, that the Progress in them was very slow.

Middleton and Monroe, two Major-Generals, together with the Lord Rea, the Gordons, and those of the Clan of Makenzey, being jealous that the Covenanters (for so they called the Scotch Parliament) would impose so much upon the King, that he could not with Honour and Safety yield to them, drew many Forces together in the North of Scotland, and seized on the Town of Inverness in the King's Name, expecting many others to come into them, intending so to moderate the Counsels of the Estates at Edinburgh, that the King might be admitted to his Government without any previous Conditions. This Rising in the North was not so privately managed, but the Scotch Parliament had Advice of it some time before it was put in Execution, and they thereupon made Levies of about six thousand Horse and Foot upon other pretences, so that upon the first Alarm, they dispatch'd a good Part towards them under the Colonels Ker and Straughan, who marched with so much Expedition, that they prevented any considerable Conjunction of Forces, and dispersed those that they had got together.

This Breach in Scotland, and the Suppression of it, made the Governours at Westminster believe it not unreasonable to make some Overtures to the Estates at Edinburgh, to tempt them to a Breach with the King, with an Offer of their utmost Assistance against him and all his Adherents; but they could not prevail.

The King being now at the Hague, had Intelligence from time to time of the Counsels of Scotland, and resolved to go into France, that from thence he might more easily pass to some Part of his own Dominions to receive their Commissioners: In prosecution of which Intentions he left Holland, and came to St. Germain's near Paris, where the Queen his Mother then was, and all the way as he passed both through the Cities of the United Provinces, and the Spanish Netherlands, he was very splendidly entertained. The Duke of Lorraine met him on the Frontiers of France, and at Compeigne the King of France received him, and accompanied him to Paris, and from thence to St. Germain's, where he staid a few Months together with the Duke of York, who repaired to him out of Holland.

In the midst of this prosperous Fortune of the establish'd new Commonwealth, there was so great a Disturbance made by a Party in the Army, called Levellers, that if it had not been suppressed, all their Buildings had been tumbled down. For the better understanding whereof, we shall shew how this Name came to be applied to them, and then briefly set down the Disorders that happened.

They were formed out of those Agitators mentioned in the Reign of the late King, and were termed Levellers upon a pretended Principle which they espoused, to endeavour to obtain such an equal righteous Distribution of Justice in Government to all degrees of People, that it should not be in the Power of the highest to oppress their Inferiors; nor should the meanest of the People be out of Capacity to arrive at the greatest Office and Dignity in the State. This was very pleasing to the inferior Officers of the Army and Soldiers, but those that influenced them were a more considerable sort of Persons, who to gain Power and Authority to themselves, found out

Means by heightening this Distemper, to arraign and disgrace the Administration of others, and to be pleased with nothing that was done by the Parliament, or the Chiefs of the Army; and now the Infection was spread among some of the superior Rank of Officers, who in a Jealousy of the aspiring Greatness of Cromwell and Ireton (tho' they appeared not openly themselves) spirited the private Soldiers to begin a Defection in the Army upon these Levelling Principles.

These, to countenance their Proceedings, insinuated, that then appeared a general Self-seeking in the Magistrates, and chief Officers of the Army, whereby that Reformation for which they contended, was not thoroughly pursued as it ought, either in Spirituals or Civils. Cromwell endeavoured to suppress this in the beginning, and caused Orders to be issued to forbid their private Meetings; but not succeeding herein, several of the Soldiers were seized on, and tried and condemn'd at a Court Martial, and one Lockier a busy Actor in the Business, was shot to Death, and eleven Regiments were immediately by Lot drawn out to be sent into Ireland. But this did rather incense than allay the Heat; for many of the Soldiers were so practised with, as to be much discontented with their being allotted to the Irish Service; alledging, It was a Contrivance to divide them; that they were not Mercenaries, but Persons that took Arms upon righteous Principles of Reformation of Government, and that till they saw such a Settlement established as might answer the Ends of their first Engagements they would not divide. And hereupon many Regiments revolted from their Officers, and if some great Ones that seemed to approve their Actions, had not betrayed them, the Parliament's Authority then, and the following Greatness of Cromwell had been subverted and prevented.

At Burford five thousand Horse and Foot of these Dissenters were drawn together, and staid there as they pretended, in order to a Treaty under the Faith of Cromwell's Word, that no Part of the Army should draw nearer to them, than the Distance of ten Miles, whereby they were less vigilant; and in this their Security, Colonel Reynolds (one accused by them to have discovered their Counsels) fell in upon them with a greater Body than they had, and quickly routed them, taking nine hundred Horse, and four hundred Foot Prisoners, whereof one Thompson, and two or three principal Leaders were immediately shot to Death, and the rest by Cromwell's Freeness or Mediation, pardoned. And after this, great Preparations were made to be sent into Ireland.

The Marquess of Ormond's diligent acting for the King's Service in Ireland.

But these Commotions gave the Marquess of Ormond, and those that acted for the King under his Lieutenancy in that Kingdom, a fair Opportunity of reducing it to the Obedience of the Crown, wherein he was so prosperous, that the King had some Thoughts of going thither, and a Peace was made with the most considerable of the Confederate Irish; but contrary to their Faith and Promise, the Pope's Nuncio by the Interpositions of some of the Popish Clergy prevailed with the Ulster-Irish, under Owen Roe O'neal, to refuse to come under the King's Authority.

Nevertheless, the Lord Lieutenant with the Conjunction of the several Forces under the Mar-

1649. quess of Clanrickard, President of Connaught, the Earl of Castlehaven, the Lord Inchequin, President of Munster, the Lord Moor, Colonel Mark Trevor, Sir Thomas Armstrong, the Lord Taaf, and General Preston, had made up a very powerful Army, and had reduced to the King's Authority, all the Cities and Towns in the Kingdom, except Dublin and Londonderry; and Londonderry was besieged by Sir Robert Steward, and Colonel Audley Mervin, with a good Brigade; and Owen Roe, likewise was by Colonel Trevor with his Army a little before defeated. The Lord Lieutenant being thus strengthened, determined with the whole or the greatest Part of his Army to march before Dublin, and came before the middle of June, to a Village called Finglafs, about two Miles distant from it on the North-side of the River.

Colonel Michael Jones was Governour of this City of Dublin, a Man of Courage, but bred to the Laws; and as he was a Person of great Capacity, (by the Experience he had gained in the active Wars of Ireland), he acquired a very good Knowledge and Conduct in matters of War. The Lord Lieutenant attempted by all fair Means he could to gain him to a Compliance with the King's Affairs, but could not effect it. After a Day or two, Skirmishes were very frequent between the Dublin Horse, and those of the Army; in which those of the City always prevailed, whereby they were much encouraged, and in one of those Skirmishes Sir Walter Dungar a valiant Commander of the Army was taken Prisoner, whilst they lay at Finglafs: But the Lord Lieutenant perceiving the station of the Army, as it then lay, inconvenient for a close Siege, drew it over the River (which was every where fordable above the Bridge) to a Place called Ramines, and whilst he lay there, it was resolved at a Council of War, to raise some Fortifications at a Place called Baginbath, near the College of Dublin (where there was an old Castle moated) thereby to prevent any Relief to the besieged by Sea. This Design much alarm'd those in the City, and the Governour was resolved to do what he could to hinder the Fortification, and for that Purpose he resolved to give Orders for some Companies to sally out to beat them from the Place. The Garrison had been reinforced a little before with a Regiment of Horse under Colonel Reynolds, and two Regiments of Foot, under the Colonels Venables and Hunks, and many other Parties of Horse and Foot, from the Garrisons that surrendered in several Parts of the Realm, which additional Forces, were to the Number in all of three thousand or thereabouts; besides that, with those from England, good store of Provisions of all sorts were put into the City, so that the Soldiers were in good Heart. The Governour was very private in his Design of the Sally, which was in this manner performed.

The Night before, he appointed all the Horse and Foot, except such as were employed on the necessary Guards, (which were to the Number of five thousand) to be drawn together very early in the Morning, in the College-Green and Grounds adjacent, within the Works, without sound of Trumpet, or beat of Drum, and with their Co-

1649. lours and Arms trailed; and the Ports were not to be opened, till the Forces were all at their Rendezvous, and Centinels were set all along the Line to prevent the going over of any to give Intelligence. After all things were thus set in Order, about Eight in the Morning, the Forlorn-Hope march'd out to Baggetrath, consisting of an hundred Firelocks, and after these, a Party of Horse followed, commanded by Colonel Theophilus Jones (the Governour's Brother) and Major Meredeth, and all the rest of the Troops and Companies went after, as fast as they could march with Order and Convenience. There was a Ditch made cross the Highway, betwixt the Town and the Castle to interrupt the Passage to it, which was guarded by a Party of Soldiers, but these were presently dispersed by the Forlorn-Hope of Firelocks, who march'd immediately up to the Castle, and took it by Storm, putting all that were in it to the Sword. Encouraged by this Success, and some more Force being come up, they advanced towards the main Camp, betwixt which, and the Castle at Baggetrath, they were met with by Sir William Vaughan, with a Party of Horse, who made some considerable Resistance (and indeed all that was made); but he was slain, and all his Party routed; and from thence they followed on to the main Camp, which was by this time in so much Confusion, that they made no Resistance but were discomfited, notwithstanding that the Forces from Dublin marched only in single Troops and Companies, having not time to draw together in Battalia. My Lord Lieutenant endeavoured to make a Stand, but being not able to prevail, he with most of the Horse retreated, and marched off; some of the Foot that were got within the Walls of Ramines, made Conditions for their Lives, and had Quarter.

The Siege raised by Jones, with the utter defeat of the Marquess's Army.

Cromwell Lieutenant of Ireland for the Parliament, sent thither with an Army.

This easy Victory was much admired, but the Occasion thereof was said to proceed from the great Animosities amongst the English and Irish in the Lieutenant's Army, whereby ensued a manifest Carelessness and Indifferency among many of them; and partly by a Consternation among the common Soldiers. Moreover, Inchiquin marched from them, a Fortnight after they came before the Place, with a great Body of the English to secure the Province of Munster, where Cromwell (lately made Lieutenant of Ireland by the Parliament) was designed to land with his Army, consisting of seven Regiments of Foot, and four of Horse, and one of Dragoons.

The Siege of Londonderry, raised by Sir Cha. Coote, falling out of the Town.

About the time that this happened, or shortly after, in the like manner Sir Robert Steward and Colonel Mervin were beaten from the Siege of Londonderry, by a resolute Sally out of the Town, made by Sir Charles Coote the Governour thereof for the Parliament. Upon the News of this good Fortune in Ireland, Cromwell with his Son-in-Law Ireton, (next to him in chief Command of the Irish Army), altered their Purpose of landing in Munster, and with all imaginable Haste transported their Forces to Dublin, near to which City in a short time after the Victory they landed; and after a little Stay to refresh the Soldiers, Cromwell marched the Army to the Town of Drogheda, which a little after the Defeat near Dublin, had been strengthened with an 1649. Addition of five and twenty hundred Foot, and three hundred Horse, with many stout and resolute Officers. Sir Arthur Aston, heretofore Governour of Reading and Oxford, for the late King, was Governour of the Place, a Person in whole Courage and Conduct great Confidence was plac'd. As soon as Cromwell came in sight of the Town, he sent a Summons, which being refused, he immediately began his Approaches, and was very active at the Siege, making many furious Onsets on the Town, with great Loss to his Army; but at last he carried it by Storm, and to strike a Terror in the other Towns, and the rest of the Forces that held for the King, all that were found in Arms were put to the Sword; among which, the Governour himself, and Sir Edmund Varney, and the Colonels Warren, Tempest, and Finglass, with many other Commanders of Note, were slain; and though the Orders of Cromwell were limited to such as were in Arms, yet the Rage of the Soldiers were so great, that many of the Inhabitants were slain in the Heat of the Fight, without Respect to either Age, Sex, or Condition.

Cromwell takes Drogheda by Storm, and puts all in it to the Sword.

After the taking of Drogheda, in less than a Year, most of the Cities and Towns in Ireland were taken, and that whole Kingdom in a manner subdued to the Power of the Commonwealth of England, and the Marquess of Ormond, and all those that opposed their Authority were withdrawn.

The King, with the Duke of York, about the beginning of September, repaired to the Isle of Jersey, where in a few Days they safely landed with about three hundred Persons in their Retinue. Upon his first Arrival, he was very solemnly proclaimed King; and after he had settled the Affairs of that Island, he had an Eye upon the reducing the Island of Guernsey, which was then under the Parliament's Power: But Castle Cornet the chiefest Fort thereof, was under his Authority.

The King removes from France to the Isle of Jersey.

A very gracious Declaration, after several Insinuations, was sent into the Island, but it proved ineffectual; for Russel, the Governour for the English Commonwealth, had got five hundred fresh Men into it; and with as bad Success, Sir John Berkley, Colonel Slingsby, and some others, attempted to raise Forces for the King in the Western Parts, from whence Intelligence came to Jersey, that Dartmouth, and several other Places would be put into their Hands, and a part of the Army joyned with them; but the Watchfulness of their Adversaries prevented all these Designs, and Sir John and the Colonel, as they lay privately in Sir Charles Trevanion's House in Cornwall, were by a Country Fellow discovered to the Committees of that County, and by their Command apprehended, and sent Prisoners to Truro.

Sir John Berkley and Colonel Slingsby apprehended in Cornwall.

During these Transactions, the Committee of Estates of Scotland had been convened at St. John's, and sat some time, where they resolved upon a Message to be sent to Jersey to the King, in Preparation to a Treaty to be had at Breda; for they were unwilling (in Regard of the Distance and hazard of the Way), to treat in that Island: Mr. George Windram of Liberton, was on the

Mr. Windram sent with a Message to the King at Jersey from the Estates of Scotland.

1649. the 25th Day of September dispatched with an Express to him on this Errand. But so long was he on his Journey, and the King not advised of his coming, that he became very doubtful of their Counsels in Scotland, and had given the Marquess of Montross a Commission to make some Levies of Men to land in that Kingdom, with Orders to draw together his Friends, hoping thereby the Committee of Estates would be induced the sooner, and with more Moderation, to a Treaty with him.

Mr. Windram landed not at Jersey in many Weeks after his Departure from Scotland; but when he came thither, the King received him very well. The Substance of his Message was: That the King would be pleased to acknowledge for lawful, their Parliament, and particularly the two last Sessions of that Assembly; which being obtained, they offered to treat of the Means to re-establish Peace and Obedience to his Authority in that Kingdom.

This Overture admitted of great Debate in the King's Council, for as yet the desperate Condition of his Affairs in Ireland, and other Parts, was not known to him; some that had no good Opinion of the Scots, from their Experience of their Dealing with the late King, expected very small Fruits of a Treaty with them, and rather, advised to rely upon the Endeavours of Montross and the other Confederates; but others reasoned, that these in Scotland, now in Power, being the most prevalent Party of that Kingdom, and having with them the Conjunction of the Kirk (by which the People of Scotland are always much influenced) were more likely to assist him in the obtaining the Crown of England (if he agreed with them) than any others, whose Designs were full of Hazard and Uncertainty. At last it was agreed to send them an Answer, directing them to send Commissioners to the King at Breda to treat with him.

Montross in the mean time was very busy, soliciting the King of Denmark, the Queen of Sweden, and other Princes, for Money, Arms, and Men, to be employed in the King's Service; but yet he was so generous, as to write to the King, To make an Agreement with the Estates of Scotland, so that he might be honourably and with Safety restored to his Rights and Dignities; and rather than break off with them, to give consent to have him banished the Kingdom, that so he might receive no Prejudice for his Consideration.

But the King would by no Means yield to his Requests herein, declaring that he had found him so faithful all along, and to have performed such eminent Services, both to his Father and to himself, that he could not in Justice or in Honour leave him: And by a Letter which he sent to him on the 30th of January, he gave him a full Account of the Address to him from Scotland, and the Progress made towards the Treaty, according to the Tenor of his Letters, by Windram, wherein he informed him:

That he licensed the Authority of the Committee of Estates for this Treaty only, and that both for their own proper Satisfaction, and to make known to all the World, that he desired to bring back his Subjects to their Duty, rather by way Sweetness and Amity, than by the Rigour of Arms (if their Obstinacy and the injustice of their Demands should constrain him to recover it by Force) adding nevertheless, that he gave him full Power to proceed very vigorously in his Enterprizes, not doubting but all his loyal Subjects of Scotland would join themselves with him, and by that Means, those that were otherwise disposed, would submit themselves to Reason in the Treaty which he now accepted, or should be forced to it by Arms.

The Parliament of England, not willing to let the King be at quiet in Jersey, sent a considerable Part of the English Fleet at Portsmouth, with store of Provision, in order to the attacking of that Island, which put the King upon a speedy Remove from thence to France; where he resided 'till the time appointed for the Treaty at Breda, drew near, and then he repaired thither.

Sir John Windram made all the Haste he could to Scotland; and as soon as the Committee of Estates, and Assembly of the Kirk, who sat apart, were met, he delivered his Message and Letters to them from the King.

The Committee of Estates upon perusing the Letter, chose out of themselves a Sub-Committee of nine Lords and Burgeesses, to consider what was most expedient to be done therein, and to present their Opinions thereupon to the Committee of Estates, which was done; and thereupon they prepared a State of the Matter, and reported it to the Parliament at their first Meeting, which was in a while after; and the Parliament upon that Report chose a Committee of the Estates to meet with a Committee of the Kirk, to consider of all Matters in order to the Treaty, and to nominate Commissioners for it; where, after some Consultations, a Report was agreed on to be made by one part to the Committee of Estates, and by the other to the Assembly of the Kirk; and immediately the Commissioners were chosen. Those for the Estates were the Earls of Cassels and Lothian, and the Lord Burley, and Sir John Windram of Liberton; and those from the Kirk were Mr. John Leviston, Mr. James Wood, and Mr. Broady, who were with all convenient Haste dispatched to Breda, where they arrived a Day before the King; and the next Day after, they went to meet him at Berghen op Zoom, and they came thence together to Breda on the sixteenth Day of March, where the Commissioners, after two or three Days Rest to compose themselves, and receive their Visits from their Friends, were conducted to their first Audience in the Presence Chamber. The Earl of Cassels address'd himself to the King, in the Name of the Commissioners of Parliament, in a short Speech to this Effect.

"That the Kingdom of Scotland upon his late Message, together with the Consideration of all former Overtures with him, have now again sent to him these Propositions, which they humbly tender to His Majesty; not that they have thought to force him to a Compliance, through his Necessity, to his prejudice, or weary him by Importunities; but by making their humble Submission, in which their Desires, they hope, will appear so reasonable and just, that he will soon condescend unto them, which they humbly beg at his Hands."

And

1649. And as soon as he had ended, the Commissioners of the Kirk having presented themselves to him, Mr. John Leviston made a Speech, wherein, He pressed his Majesty to hearken to the joint Desires of the Estates of the Kirk of Scotland, that so he might enjoy the Blessing of God, and be received by his People in Comfort and Peace to promote the Work of the Lord, and make them happy.

After these Speeches, they produced their Commissions, and delivered their Letters, together with the Propositions from the Estates and Kirk of Scotland.

The Propositions were immediately read, which were as followeth;

Propositions from the Estates and Kirk of Scotland to the King.

1. "That all those who have been, and continue Excommunicate by the Kirk of Scotland, may be removed from having Access to the Court.

2. "That he would be pleased to declare, that he would by solemn Oath under his Hand and Seal, allow the National Covenant of Scotland, and the solemn League and Covenant of Scotland, England, and Ireland, and that he would prosecute the Ends thereof in his Royal Station.

3. "That he would ratify and approve all Acts of Parliaments, enjoining the solemn League and Covenant, and establishing Presbyterian Government, the Directory of Worship, the Confession of Faith and Catechism in the Kingdom of Scotland, as they are already approved by the general Assembly of the Kirk, and by the Parliament of that Kingdom. And that he would give his Royal Assent to the Acts of Parliament, enjoining the same in the rest of his Dominions; and that he would observe the same in his own Practice and Family, and never make Opposition therein, or endeavour any Change thereof.

4. "That he would consent and agree, That all Matters Civil might be determined by the present and subsequent Parliaments of the Kingdom of Scotland, and all Matters Ecclesiastical, by the ensuing general Assemblies of the Kirk, as was formerly condescended and agreed to by his late Father. After the King had heard them, he demanded, Whether these Papers they had delivered to him contained all Particulars which they had to propound or desire? whether they had Power to recede from any Particular proposed, or to be proposed? also if they had any thing to offer for the carrying on of his Service against England?

To which they answered, That they had acquainted him with the utmost of their Power and Instructions.

A few Days after, the Treaty began, wherein the King found many Difficulties in every Article; for though that which related to the prohibiting all whom the Kirk had Excommunicated from Access to the Court, would deprive him of the Service and Attendance of the Earl of Montrose, and many other of the Loyal Nobility and Gentry of that Kingdom, he thought not fit to break with them for that, not doubting when he should have obtained the Kingdom, he might by Degrees, make them sensible of their mistaken zeal in their Actings towards such Persons, and win them to a Relaxation of their Rigour of that Injunction; but that which most pressed him, was the Cause of Religion expressed in the Severity of those Propositions, which required him by solemn Oath under his Hand and Seal, to allow the Covenant, and to establish the Presbyterian Government, wherein they insisted so much as to deny him the Use of the Liturgy to his own Person: The King urged, That there was no Reason why he should relinquish the Religion, for which his Father died a Martyr; and that whilst he was willing to permit to his Subjects Liberty of Conscience, it would be very inconsistent with their so earnestly pretended Desires of Peace and Agreement, to deny him the same Privilege which he was so ready to give them. That the Covenant by them tendered, is the Subjects Covenant to bind them to him, and not for him to take, to swear to himself; so that he thought it sufficient to pass an Act for his People to take it. He likewise offered to confirm the Presbyterian Government in Scotland; provided, that he himself might have always three Chaplains with him of his own Election.

During this Treaty, the Earl of Carnwath, and Mr. Murray arrived at Breda with new Instructions to the Commissioners concerning the Militia, which put a further Demur to the Conclusion of it; and indeed it was said, the King was willing to admit of a little Delay in Expectation of what he might obtain from the Endeavours of the Marquis of Montrose, who was after many Discouragements (of which some mention shall be hereafter made) about this time embarked for Scotland, and about the midst of April landed in the Isles of Orkney, accompanied with the Lord Trenchard, the Master of Pitsfodder, Sir John Urry, Henry Graham (his Natural Brother) Colonel Johnson, George Drummond of Ballach, and other Persons his Friends and Confederates, with two Ships, and a small Frigate of 14 Guns, fifteen hundred Arms, and five hundred German Soldiers; Colonel King had promised to come up to him with some Horse from Sweeden, but did not do it; Colonel Ogleby, and Colonel Cockrain, who were trusted with certain Sums of Money for the raising of Men and Arms, (the one in Amsterdam, and the other in Poland) fail'd in their Duty, and converted the Money to their own Use; and two of four Ships which he had, (wherein were about two hundred German Soldiers, and many Implements of War) were cast away upon the Rocks a little before his Landing; but these Disasters which might have shaken a great Resolution, abated nothing of his Courage and Magnanimity.

The Estates of Scotland had no Forces in any of these Islands, whereby he had a good Opportunity to raise Men to form a little Army for his landing on the Main: The People were raw and undisciplin'd, much fallen from that Courage, for which the antient Inhabitants of these Isles have been fam'd; but nevertheless, he was forc'd to make as good a Shift as he could with them; and whilst he was busied here in his Levies, the Laird of Pluscardy endeavoured to raise two thousand Men for his Assistance, in the Earl of Seaforth's Territories.

And now, having got together as many Soldiers as he desired of this sort, he left Colonel Johnson and Henry Graham to keep Kirkwall in Pomena, the chief Isle of the Orcades, and transplanted all the rest of his Men to Cathness, which is the utmost Point of Land in the North-West Part of Scotland: Here he hoped to meet Pluscardy with the two thousand Men he promised to raise, but they came not; for the Parliament of Scotland was so vigilant, that they sent into most Places where they thought he had any Correspondence to prevent the getting Men together for him; and very suddenly after, the News of his Arrival was known, an Army of seven thousand Foot, and thirty Troops of Horse, was sent to oppose him. The Horse were commanded by David Lesley, and the Foot by Major General Holborn, of these they sent three hundred in the Van, under the Command of Colonel Straughan, consisting of his own Troop, and three Troops more commanded by Colonel Montgomery, Colonel Ker, and Lieutenant Colonel Hacket; and indeed there needed no other Army, for all that Montrose's was able to do at that time, towards the Strengthening of himself, was little or nothing more than the taking of Dunbeth-House, which was soon surrendered to Colonel Urry upon demand, the Lord thereof being fled to Edinburgh: The Earl of Sutherland was a fore Remora in his Way; for though he had not Force enough to encounter the Marquess, yet the Power and Sway he bore in all those adjacent Parts about where Montrose's had to do, both kept back the Country from coming in to him, and hindered several of the Gentry from appearing, who otherwise were inclinable enough to have given their Assistance; so that Straughan surprizing the Montrossians with the Speed and Unexpectedness of his Appearance, and finding them much disordered and tired with seeking to recover a certain Pass, (which they failed of obtaining,) improved his Advantage, and after some Repulse at first, redoubled with such Fury upon them, that the unseason'd Orkney Men immediately yielded themselves, and in a short time (though not without much Resolution shewn in their Resistance) the Germans also. Thus was Montrose's vigorous and loyal Undertaking for his Sovereign's Service, the Labour of much time, and carried on with incredible Pains, Difficulty, and Danger, dissipated in a Moment by a Party far inferior in Number: So great was the Defeat, that of the whole Body of the Montrossians who engaged in this Battle, there escaped not above an Hundred from being either taken or slain: Among the Prisoners were Sir John Urry, Major-General of Montrose's Army, the Lord Fendraught, Sir Francis Hay of Dalgety, Colonel Hay of Noughton, Colonel Grey, Lieutenant Colonel Stuart, with other considerable Officers: Montrose's himself made a Shift to escape for the present, by quitting his Horse, together with his Belt, and his Coat with the Star, and shifting himself into an ordinary Highlander's Apparel. In this Fight, the Royal Standard was taken, upon which was portraicted the Head of the late King lying a Bleeding, and severed from the Body, and this following Motto, Judge and revenge my Cause O Lord.

So welcome was the News of this Victory to the State and Kirk of Scotland, that they bestowed as a Reward upon Straughan a thousand Pounds sterling, and a Chain of Gold; upon Lieutenant Colonel Hacket a thousand Marks sterling. But that which crowned this Victory to them with the highest Joy and Satisfaction, was the getting of Montrose's Person into their Power; as indeed it was impossible for him to make his Escape, so narrowly was he way-laid all the Country round, and so strict a search and Enquiry was ordered to be sent after him, besides a large Reward promised to whomsoever should be his Apprehender; yet for the Space of three or four Days he kept himself undiscovered, by wandering up and down in the open Fields, with one Associate only in his Misery, 'till being very near famished with Hunger, it was his Fortune in the End to fall into the Hands of the Laird of Affin, a Person who had formerly adhered to the Marquess, and had been befriended by him, and of whom, upon that Consideration, he doubtless hoped for the Favour of not being discovered by him, if not of Assistance towards his Concealment. But Affin, for fear of what he must have suffered if he had been known to have concealed him, or for want of Opportunity in Regard of his Followers that attended him, or setting his Thoughts upon the proposed Reward, was not to be persuaded or induced by any Respect of old Friendship or Relation to suffer him to escape; so that being seized and secured by a strong Guard, (and having in vain supplicated for Death by the Hands of those that took him) he was presently sent and delivered up to the Custody of David Lesley, and by him hurried away with all Speed to Edinburgh, much insulted over in the several Places he came thro', only the People of Dundee (though none more endamaged by his Soldiers in the former War) were very civil to him, furnished him with all things necessary, and were so far from insulting, that they did very much commiserate his Condition. The chief Favour he obtained in his Journey, was the Permission to call in, as he came along, at the House of his Father-in-Law, the Earl of Southesk, to see two Children of his that were there. His Enemies having him in their Power, used their Advantage in a most base and ungenerous Manner. At Leith he was met by the Magistrates of Edinburgh, from whence he was brought with an insolent Pomp, with those of his Followers who were taken with him; himself being set on a vile Cart-horse, to expose him the more to the View and Scorn of the People, while the other Prisoners walked on Foot. When he was come to the Gate of Edinburgh, he was placed in a Cart, where was fixed an high Chair, on which he was tied fast by a Cord going round his Shoulders; the Executioner riding by him with his Bonnet on, while the Marquess was bare-headed. With this odious Insolence was this Great Man carried through the Streets of Edinburgh, 'till he was lodged in the Common Jail, with the ordinary Malefactors: But this unworthy Usage of a Nobleman, whose Actions had resounded throughout Europe, served only to shew that his Virtues could triumph over the Malice of his 1650. his Enemies, and the Assaults of Fortune. He told some who came to see him the next Day, that God had manifested himself with so many Comforts to his Mind, during that ignominious Entry, that he esteemed it the most glorious and joyful Cavalcade he ever made; and the same undaunted Spirit attended him through what yet remained for him to undergo.

Two Days after he was brought to Edenburgh, he was sent for to the Parliament there. The Earl of Loudoun, the Lord Chancellor, made a bitter Speech against him; reproaching him his Breach of the Covenant, for his Impenitence, notwithstanding his Excommunication by the Kirk; and telling him, that now God had brought him thither to receive the just Sentence of Condemnation. Montros then asked, whether he might have Liberty to speak for himself? which was granted him; upon which he addressed himself to them in a noble Speech, defending his past Actions, and expressing a generous Contempt of Death. He was then commanded to withdraw, and after some Debate, called in again to receive his Sentence; which was, to be hanged on a Gallows thirty Foot high, his Head and Quarters to be cut off, and fixed in different Places of the Kingdom.

After the Denouncing of the Sentence, at which he altered not his Countenance, or seemed in the least Manner to be moved, he was again guarded back to Prison, where being again haunted and importuned by the Ministers, he expressed how much he was beholden to the Parliament, for the Honour they had put upon him; for that he accounted it a greater Honour to have his Head stand upon the Prison-Gate for this Quarrel, than to have his Picture in the King's Bed-Chamber; and lest his Loyalty should be forgotten, they had highly honoured him, in designing lasting Monuments to four of the chiefest Cities, to bear up his Memorial to all Posterity, wishing he had had Flesh enough to have sent a Piece to every City in Christendom, to witness his Loyalty to his King and Country.

The next Day being the one and twentieth Day of May, the Day appointed for his Tragedy, he was led forth to his Execution, at which time, so winning was his Deportment, as made a very great Impression upon the Spirits of the People; insomuch as some who observed the Passages of his Death, were of Opinion, That he had drawn away more from the Kirk Party by his manner of Dying, than he could have vanquished in the Field by Force of Arms. When he came to the Place of Execution, he made a pious and excellent Speech; which being concluded, he afterwards spent a good while in private, in pouring forth his Soul to God, and recommending his Spirit into his Hands, who was pleased (as he said) to give him a full Assurance of his Mercy in Jesus Christ. He received from the Executioner a certain Cord, by which hung his Declaration and History, to hang about his Neck; affirming, That he thought not himself more honoured by the Garter, which honourable Order his present Majesty had been pleased to confer upon him, than by that Cord and Book, which he would embrace about his Neck with as much Joy and Content as ever he did the Garter, or a Chain of Gold; adding, That if they had any more Dishonour (as they conceived it) to put upon him, he was ready to accept it: And then presently, with a chearful Resignation, submitted himself to the Execution of his Sentence.

Thus was this famous, but unfortunate Man, sacrificed to the Revenge of his Enemies after a most shameful and despicable manner, even at that very time when they were treating with the King, whom they knew full well to have a very great Regard and Affection for him. Together with Montros, tho' not in so disgraceful a way, were executed Sir John Urry, and Colonel Spotswood Laird of Darcy, (who had both the Favour to be beheaded) with some others of Note that came with the Marquess into Scotland.

The Treaty was now near a Conclusion; for whatever the King's just Repentments were, his Council perswaded him to comply and accord with the Kirk in the exigence of his present Condition: And as for the Militia, he offered to confirm it in the Hands of the Estates for five Years. But whilst Matters were in this nearness of composition, News was brought of the Defeat and Execution of Montros, which much surprized the King, considering the time of doing it; and though he omitted not in an Express by Mr. Murray, to manifest his great Dislike of the Action (for he was much afflicted at it;) yet he was prevail'd on with much Regret not to urge it so far as to a Rupture: He told them in his Letter,

That he was very sorrowful and grieved to hear a Report which came to him by credible Persons, that notwithstanding those hopeful Overtures lately made between him and them, tending to their Peace; yet that there hath been some Blood shed of his good Subjects of the Kingdom of Scotland, and that the manner and result thereof, according to the Report he had heard of it, did very much trouble him: But that he might know the Particulars more certainly, he desired to understand the Business fully from themselves of whom he required an Account.

A while after, the Treaty being ended to the Satisfaction of the Estates, they sent a solemn Message to invite him to Scotland, and in Answer to what he writ about Montros; they besought him Not to stumble at it, assuring him, that there was nothing in what they did, but to accomplish his Ends, and to serve his Interests to the best Advantage. They likewise requested him, To make all possible speed in coming to them, protesting they would with their Lives and Fortunes assist to establish him in the Throne of his Kingdoms.

The rigorous Prosecution of Montros in that violent Manner, was chiefly from the Instigation of the Kirk, who at that time had great Authority, and did so much influence the People, that it was almost impossible to appease the Storm they raised against him. He had been excommunicated long before, and in that Church, Excommunication is so terrible, that few will have any manner of Conversation with a Person excommunicated; and the generality of the People, when they see a Man whom their Ministers declare to be excluded from Heaven, are easily induced

The Treaty at Breda concluded. A Message of the Scots to invite the King, with their Answer to the King's Letter.

1650. duced to think him unworthy to live on Earth. Many, if not the greater part of those that pursued his Life, were earnest for the Admission of the King; but so much did their Zeal exceed their Discretion, and so strongly were they intoxicated with the Covenant, and seduced by the Inventors and Assertors of it, that they believed neither their Laws nor Religion in Safety whilst he lived.

The King upon this Message sent to him, prepared for his Journey to Scotland, and about the beginning of June took Shipping at Scheveling in Holland, and after a happy Evasion of double Danger that threatened him in his Voyage, one from a sudden Storm which arose and cast him upon certain Danish Islands, (yet without any Loss or Shipwreck, but on the other side much Respect and civil Usage from the Inhabitants;) the other, from a Fleet of Parliament Vessels, which were sent under Popham to intercept his Passage, he landed safe at a Place called the Spey in the North of Scotland. The Estates and Parliament of Scotland in the mean time employed their Consultations about forming of an Army for the Service of the King, as they pretended, and an Act was published for the Rating of every fourth Man through the Kingdom, who was capable to bear Arms: The Earl of Leven was made General of the Foot, and Holborn Major General, David Lesly Lieutenant General of the Horse, and Montgomery Major General, the supreme Command of the whole Army being reserved for the King himself, whom at his first Arrival they entertained with high Compliments, and much Acclamation, and seemed to congratulate his coming with great Demonstrations of Joy and Affection. And on the 15th of July, they again solemnly proclaim'd him King at Edinburgh Cross, and had design'd (had not certain Obstacles come in the way) to have crowned him in the following Month: But he had not been long among them e'er they began to discover their native Rigour, imperiously to take upon them, according to their usual Manner of Kirk-Authority and Discipline, and to obtrude upon the King such curbing Conditions, as but very ill suited with Regal Dignity.

And not long after, when the City of Aberdeen presented him with five hundred Pounds Sterling, the Committee of Estates seemed displeased thereat; and least other Cities and Towns should in the like manner testify their Duties to him, they declared, That what Money or Plate any had a Purpose to bestow on the King, should be brought into the publick Treasury: And in conformity to this Dealing towards him, they proceeded to reform (as they called it) his Retinue, interdicting all whom they styled Malignants (which were most of his faithfulest Servants) from all Employment both about his Person and in the Army.

The Commonwealth of England had sufficient Intelligence from the Beginning of all these Occurrences, and of the Engagement of the Scots to establish the King in the Thrones of all his Dominions, and that they might not be surprized by them, they drew many Troops and Regiments together, and formed an Army, which they sent to the Borders of Scotland.

Fairfax, who was to command this Army, refused to accept the Charge, notwithstanding that they offered him a Commission with larger Power than that by which he had formerly commanded their Armies, excusing his Refusal by Reason of great Indisposition of Health occasioned by his Wounds and other Incommodities of the late War. Upon this, Cromwell, who was newly returned from Ireland (where he had been very victorious), had the chief Command of the Army conferred upon him, which he (after some little formal Shew of Denial) accepted of, and about the latter end of June he marched towards Berwick in order to his Advance into Scotland. The Scots whilst this Preparation was making, sent many expostulatory Letters to Sir Arthur Haslerig then at Newcastle, urging the Breach of Covenant and the Union between the two Nations, which availed nothing; yet they did not neglect the raising an Army for their Defence; for Matters were at this time grown to a greater Height than to be decided by the Pen.

Cromwell, upon repair to the Borders, published a Declaration in the Name of the Parliament of England, to justify their Proceedings in this manner towards the Scots, and to reproach a perverted part of them for that Breach of the Union betwixt the two Nations, which they imputed to the English, (for they would not lay the Blame of their Imputations on the whole Nation;) but so great was the Affection of the generality of the People of Scotland towards the King, that this Declaration made little Impression on them, tho' some privately kept Intelligence with Cromwell to the Ruin of themselves and their Country.

About the end of July, the English Army, to the Number of sixteen hundred effective Officers and Soldiers, marched into Scotland, and came after little Resistance (in the Defence of some Passages) to Mordington; most of the Scots who inhabited the Borders had left their Habitations, which put the Army in more streights for Subsistence than they expected; but a Fleet of English Ships waited on their Motions on the Coasts of Scotland; yet Cromwell pretending to commiserate the Condition of the Scotch People, set forth a Declaration, promising Protection of their Persons and Goods to all that would return to their Dwellings, with a strict Prohibition on pain of Death to any of the Soldiers to molest or do them any Harm, or take from them any Victuals or other Necessaries, without full Recompence in Money for the same.

From Mordington the English Army marched to Haddington, and the Scotch Army lay encamped betwixt Edinburgh and Leith, consisting of six thousand Horse and Dragoons, and fifteen thousand Foot: Cromwell marched from Haddington, and came in the View of the Scotch Army, where he observed them to be too strongly entrenched to be forced; and after he had fac'd them a Day and a Night without being able to draw them from their Entrenchments, he marched away towards Musleburgh. The Scots upon this Retreat drew out all their Horse, and fell into the Rear of the English Army, which was commanded by Lambert, and made so brisk a Charge, that Lambert himself was wounded, and 1650. like to have been taken Prisoner; but Cromwell came to his Relief, and drove them back to their Camp, not without some Loss. The next Day, betwixt three and four in the Morning, fifteen Cornets of the Scotch Horse, commanded by Major General Montgomery, and Col. Straughan, came out of their Line with a Design to beat up the Quarters of the English about Musleburgh; they surprized the Out-Guards, and routed the first Regiment that appeared to oppose them, and advanced to another Body, which was drawn together to succour the others; but there they met with so great Resistance, that Montgomery was wounded, and the whole Party put to great Disorder and Confusion, and pursued to their Army, and the Camp had been in Danger of Surprizal, had not the King himself (appearing unexpectedly among them) opposed the Hazard of his Person, and the Authority of his Name against their precipitated Flight. Of the Scots, in this Engagement, seventy four were taken Prisoners, and many slain; and Straughan himself was once taken, but got off again.

The Scots routed at Musleburgh

The pretended Parliament at Westminster were no less active there than Cromwell was in Scotland, to carry on the Designs and Interest of the Republick, proceeding with all imaginable Rigour against all Persons that they could discover in any manner acting against their tyrannous Usurpation. And about this time one Levens, a Doctor of the Civil Law, being apprehended with some Commissions of the King's, which he had Intention to disperse for his Service, was therefore arraigned at a Court Martial, and condemned and executed, by hanging by the Neck 'till he died, on the 13th Day of July, over-against the Royal Exchange in London.

Dr. Levens hanged over-against the Royal Exchange for his Loyalty.

But in further Manifestation of their Impiety, they were not contented to have inhumanely murdered the King, and seized on, and disposed of all his Goods and Revenues, but they insulted over those Statues which his Vertues had caused to be set up in the Royal Exchange, and the West End of St. Paul's Church: The first of these they ridiculously (in imitation of their barbarous Cruelty,) decollated, and ordered it to be taken out of the Nich, and under the Basis thereof these Words were written, Exit Tyrannus Regum ultimus, Anno Libertatis Angliæ restituta primo, Annoque Domini 1648. which remained many Years a Testimony of their guilt, and a Memorial to Strangers of their bold-fac'd Treason, which gave not only Truth, but even Time itself the Lye: For never was there such a thing as the first year of the People's Liberty under their Anarchical Usurpation. The other Statue of the King being thrown down from the Place where it stood, fell upon its Feet, which was then taken by many as a Prefage that his glorious Memory, Fame, and Posterity should recover and continue, maugre all the Designs and Contrivements of his and their implacable Enemies.

In Ireland the King's Affairs prospered very ill, inasmuch that in five or six Weeks time the Parliamentarians had taken Waterford, Duncannon, Caterloe and Charlemont, and had great Hopes of a plenary Conquest of that Country.

The Scotch and English Armies lying near one another without Engagement (because of the advantageous Posture in which the Scots were placed, having a great Hill for their Security on one side, and a River and the City of Edenburgh on the other) Cromwell's Army began to be distressed by scarcity of Provisions, which made him retreat to Pentland Hills, and thence with some Difficulty (by reason of bad Weather) to Musleburgh, to be near the Sea to have supply of Victuals from the English Fleet that attended him: And after a few Days stay there, he marched to Dunbar on Sunday the first of September, with Intention to ship his Foot much wearied by Sickness and long marches, and march with his Horse into England; but the Scotch having Intelligence thereof, pressed so hard upon him with their Army that he could not effect his Purpose; and the same Day at Night that he arrived at Dunbar, the Scots being close at his Heels, drew up their whole Army (consisting of between twenty and four and twenty thousand Men) upon a high Hill, within a Mile of the Town; the English not exceeding the Number of twelve thousand, drew out in Battalia in a Cornfield near adjoining, having a Neck of Land to encamp on, whose Breadth was not a Mile and a half from Sea to Sea. The next Morning being the second of September, early in the Morning, David Leslie Lieutenant General of the Scotch Army drew down his Men to the Foot of the Hill, and about four in the Afternoon his Train of Artillery followed to the side of a great Ditch, which divided the two Armies. The English that Evening ranged themselves close to the Ditch, and placed their Field-pieces in the most useful manner they could, to be ready to secure their Regiments, and annoy the Enemy if they should assail them in the Night, and finding the Pass at Copperspeth between Dunbar and Berwick very necessary to them, both for the Security of their march homeward, and their more easy Advance to the Scotch; on Tuesday at four in the Morning, they attempted with three Regiments of Horse and two of Foot, to possess themselves thereof; this gave the Scots an hot Alarm, and a fierce Dispute happened, so that both Armies became engaged. The English Word was, The Lord of Hosts; Theirs, the Covenant.

The Scotch Right Wing of Horse which were most of them Launcers, made a very bold Charge and put the English Horse to a little Confusion, but they immediately rallied, and were so seconded by their Foot, that by six in the Morning the Right Wing of the Scotch Horse was routed, and the Left without striking a Stroke ran away, and the Foot seeing this Rout and flight of their Horse, and not able in any Order by reason thereof to engage (without any Resistance) threw down their Arms and fled, giving the English the full pursuit of them eight Miles beyond Haddington. The Scots were so presumptuous the Day before as to send to Edenburgh to assure their Friends of a certain Victory over the English, and it was reported that some of the Ministers declared it in their Sermons as the mind of God to have them delivered up into their Hands; but in the midst of this Confidence they found themselves miserably frustrated, and their despairing and despised Enemy a Conqueror. The Number of Scotch slain in the Battle were reckoned to be four thousand, and nine thousand were taken

The Battle at Dunbar.

The Scots Army defeated by Cromwell.

1650. taken Prisoners with all their Ammunition, Bag and Baggage, and ten thousand Arms. The Officers and Prisoners of most note were Sir James Lumisdale, next Commander in Quality to David Lesly, the Laird of Liberton, Adjutant General Bicherton, Scout-Master-General Campbel, Sir William Douglas, and Colonel Gourdon, twelve Lieutenant Colonels, six Majors, forty two Captains, seventy five Lieutenants, seventeen Cornets, two Quarter-Masters, an hundred and ten Ensign-bearers, and two hundred Horse and Foot Colours, with seven and twenty great Guns; and all this obtained with the Loss of not above three hundred English Soldiers, and one Officer (Major Rookesby) who survived the Battle, but died afterwards of his Wounds.

The Scots, after this Day's Loss, quitted Leith and Edinburgh, whereof the next Day Cromwell took Possession, and the King retired to St. Johnston's, where the Committee of Estates were assembled. The Defeat of the Scotch Army produced not those Effects as the King expected upon the ruling Part of the Nobility and Clergy of the Kingdom; for instead of enlarging their Interest, by taking into their Conjunction those whose help they had before rejected for their Affection to their King, they ascribed the overthrow of the Army to the admitting of him into Scotland, before he had given full Satisfaction to the Kirk in what they required of him; and in Prosecution of these Counsels, they began very much to impose upon him, and remove from his Person the most faithful and Loyal of his Servants.

The King could not brook this insolent Carriage towards him, and therefore resolved at any Hazard to free himself from the trouble of it, and by Advice of some few of his best and most trusty Friends, he took Horse one Morning, with three of them in his Company, pretending to ride out a little way a Hawking, and rode directly to the Lord Dedup's House near Dundee, where he was received by some of his Loyal Subjects and Servants, with whom he kept Intelligence, and from hence he intended to have gone further North, where he heard the Marquess of Huntley, the Earls of Athol and Seaforth, and the Lord Ogleby and Newburgh, and Major-General Middleton, with the Gordons, and the Men of Athol, were ready to appear for him with no contemptible Force; but he staid 'till by an Express sent to them, he should be informed of the Certainty of their Condition.

This secret and sudden Departure of the King, did much perplex the Committee of Estates, who were very apprehensive of the Consequence of his joyning with the Gordons and the Athol Men; and hearing he was gone to the Lord Dedup's House, they resolved to send Major-General Montgomery with a Party of Horse to perswade his Return to them; many of the Chiefs of the Noblemen and Ministers being by this time sensible that these Breaches and Divisions would but give the English (then in the Bowels of their Country) greater Advantage against them; and that nothing could save the whole from Ruin, but a general Uniting of all Parties under the King, against the common Enemy. Montgomery arriving at the House, sent in to the King, to acquaint him, that he came thither by order of the Committee of Estates, 1650. humbly to entreat him to come back to St. Johnston's, and being admitted to his Presence, he fell at his Feet, beseeching him to forget whatever had been hitherto committed derogatory to his Royal Authority; assuring him, that he should hereafter be observed with all imaginable Duty and Respect. The King having heard this Message, considered with his Friends what to do thereupon, and though he could not easily forget the Impositions and Restraints he had so lately endured, being perswaded by their Advice, that his Return might be a Means to unite all Interests to him; and being assured by Montgomery of the Reality of those at St. Johnston's to his Service, he condescended to return with him thither, to the general Joy of the Moderate of all Parties as well Covenanters as Royalists; yet he wanted not at the same time an Assurance from the Gordons and the rest in the North, to secure him against the Kirk and all their Adherents that should oppose his Authority.

The Committee of Estates were much more compliant with the King at his Return than before, and having summoned a general Meeting to be held at St. Johnston's, consisting of the King, Lords, Barons, and Burgeses, to consult for the good of the Kirk, King, and Kingdom; together with the Commissioners of the Kirk then at Sterlin to adjourn their Sitting thither: They applied themselves to compose all Differences amongst Dissenters, of which the most formidable were, Huntley, Middleton, and those in the North; but after a while, by the Prudence of this Assembly, and the good Advice of the moderate Clergy, all was concluded; and the Duke of Hamilton, the Marquess of Huntley, and the Earls of Lythgow, Lauderdale, Calendar, and Craford, Lyndsey, and the Lords Buchern, Dedup, and Middleton of the Scots, with many others were received into Favour, and Promise of Employment in the Army; and of the English, the Earl of Cleveland, the Lord Wentworth, the Lord Wilmot, and some few other Royalists were continued about the King; for before, none of that Nation but the Duke of Buckingham, Massey, Graves, and Titus, were permitted near his Person.

Whilst these Matters were agitated betwixt the King and the Committee of Estates at St. Johnston's, Cromwell was not idle, he had begun to fortify Leith, and laid a close Siege to Edinburgh Castle, and on the fourteenth of September he marched to Lithgow, and from thence to Falkirk within a Mile of Sterlin, (near which Place the main of the King's Army lay) and sent a Summons to the Town, but was resolutely denied by the Governour, and he returned back to Lithgow, where General Deane came to him from England with Recruits of Men, and Supplies of all sorts of Provisions: But since he could not effect any thing against Sterlin, he resolved to try what might be done in the West of Scotland, and in October he marched to Glasgow, upon Intelligence that Major-General Montgomery was ordered by the King to march into those Parts, to secure that County which was then wavering in their Allegiance. In this Expedition he hoped to prevail very much, either

The dissatisfied Ministers remonstrate against the Proceedings of the Estates at St. Johnston's.

The Estates and Commissioners of the Kirk at St. Johnston's, resented much this Remonstrance and the Defection of the Ministers, but no Means they could then use was of Force to reconcile them; insomuch, that the Division of publick Resolutioners and Remonstrators (for by those Names they were distinguished) continued in that Kingdom with much Animosity 'till the Year 1660, that the King was restored to the full Exercise of his Authority, though the Cause thereof (which was the joining all Interest to oppose the Invasion of a Foreign Army) had long ceased; but by that Occasion Cromwell's Conquest was made very easy, and his fomenting that Rent in their Church, made their Subjection to his Authority more lasting than otherwise it would have been.

The King was desirous to compose their Disorder, or at least to prevent the dividing so great a Force as was under Ker and Straughan from his Service; and to that End, the Earl of Cassels, and the Lord Broody, and Mr. Robert Douglas the Minister, were sent to treat with them; but they were somewhat averse to a Composure, yet they declared against any Conjunction with Cromwell, professing equalling against Malignants and Sectaries: Nevertheless, Ker, upon Information that Straughan held Intelligence with Cromwell, was at length so far induced to comply, that he took him Prisoner, and sent him to Dunbarton Castle, from whence he was afterwards removed to Cathness; but after a while, by the Negligence or Connivance of his Keepers, he escaped to Edinburgh to the English.

Cromwell, whilst he was at Glasgow, had Intelligence that the King's Army intended to relieve Edinburgh Castle, which made him return thither, and leave Major-General Lambert with a good Brigade, to make Impression in the Western Parts. He after some Enquiry, discovered a Ford over Hamilton River, over which, on the last of November, he marched his Soldiers; Ker had Intelligence of this; and, at a Town of that Name, he resolutely fell into Lambert's Quarters, but the English Horse had so soon the Alarm, that they drew together, and so well receiv'd his Charge, that an Hundred of the Scots were killed, and the rest routed and pursued as far as Ayr, and Ker himself (having his Right-hand almost cut off) was taken Prisoner.

Col. Ker defeated and taken Prisoner by Major-General Lambert.

In England some Attempts were made for the King's Service, but without Success, and particularly in Norfolk, many Gentlemen and others were drawn together, but before they could be form'd into Troops, they were surprized and surpressed by two Troops from Lynn, and some Forces of the Militia of the County joined with them, and twenty of them being afterwards found guilty by an illegal High Court of Justice, were sentenced to Death, and executed thereupon.

The Rising in Norfolk for the King suppressed.

Edinburgh Castle had been besieged some Months, with little Loss on either Side, and Derbyshire Miners were brought out of England to undermine it, who carried on the Work sixty Foot, but the Rock was so hard, they could work no further. But at last the Governour, who was one Dundas, a Son-in-Law of old Leven, was so practis'd on by Cromwell, that he surrendered the Castle on the 24th of December.

After the Loss of Edinburgh Castle, all the Forts on this Side of Sterlin were taken by the English, so that those of the Scots that were Loyal to the King, applied themselves with all Diligence to raise what Forces they could to compleat an Army; and that his Authority might have the greater Strength and Reverence of the People, they immediately proceeded to his Coronation; which was on the first of January solemnized at Scoon, a few Miles distant from St. Johnston's (the accustomed Place for Coronation of the Kings of Scotland) the King being the forty Eighth Monarch of that Kingdom there crowned.

After the Coronation, the King intended to march Northwards, to hasten the Levies there made by his Presence; but the Nobility and Gentry of the Highlands promising to compleat their Numbers with all Expedition, he went no farther than Aberdeen; in the mean time, that those Scots that opposed his Authority might be less able to seduce others, Straughan, Swinnton, Colonel Dundas, (the late Governour of Edinburgh) Major Abernetby, Captain Giffan, and Andrews, were on the fourteenth Day of January Excommunicated for complying with the English.

The King having visited Aberdeen, Dundee, and several other good Towns, returned to St. Johnston's, to be present at the Assembling of the Parliament, which met there on the second of March, and the Duke of Hamilton, and many of the Lords that were reconciled to the Kirk, were admitted to their Seats therein. The Parliament applied themselves with all imaginable Care for the raising of Soldiers, and proscribed and sequestred the Persons and Estates of all that held Correspondence with the English; and that the Levies might be better made, they adjourned the Parliament to the seventeenth of April, and sent Middleton into the North to raise Forces there, and others of Authority in other Parts, to imploy their Interests to draw Soldiers together, and 'till they should be again convened, a Council of State, and Committee of War were appointed, of select Persons, out of each of the three Estates.

Great Care was taken for the Fortifying of the Town of Sterlin, the King himself going often to view the Works, and encourage the Expediting thereof. In the mean time, on the fifteenth of April, 1651. April, in a Mist, the Lord Montgomery, Son to the Earl of Eglinton, and the Lord Cranston, with five hundred Horse and Dragoons, marched from Sterlin, and resolutely fell into Lithgow, whence having taken what Prisoners they could in haste meet with, they retreated; yet before they could get to Sterlin, Major Sydenham, the Governour of Lithgow, with a good Party, pursued, overtook, and charged them, but were so well received by the Scots, that Sixty of the English were slain, and Sydenham himself so wounded, that he died shortly after. This good Fortune of the Scotch did not long continue; for a while after, the Earl of Eglinton, the Father of this Lord Montgomery, with one of his Brothers, were taken at Dunbarton by one Captain Crook, of Colonel Berry's Regiment.

Cromwell being at Edinburgh, having Notice how the King's Army lay encamped at Sterlin, and that abundance of Provision was brought in daily, in order to an intended March into England; and that he might be in Readiness to prevent it, he drew all his Forces together, and encamped near Edinburgh.

The Parliament of Scotland were about this time again assembled at St. Johnston's, and very busy in Consultation about their Militia, and providing for the Peace and Security of the Kingdom. Middleton's Northern Levies amounted to near eight Thousand; and it was much controverted, whether those Forces should make a distinct Army, or join with the Southern Army; but at last a Conjunction of all was agreed: But because there was some Emulation betwixt Lesley and Middleton about the chief Command of the Army, the King resolved to take it himself to prevent all Discontents therein.

About the beginning of June the Parliament of Scotland ended, having before their Dissolution, given large Commissions and Instructions for the Pressing of Men in all Parts of the Kingdom beyond Fife, and in the Western Parts for a new Army, which was to consist of fifteen Thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse and Dragoons.

They concluded in a very calm and admirable Temper, having passed An Act of Oblivion for all things done hitherto, inviting thereby all Parties to join in carrying on the Service of the King, and a new Engagement, with the Sacrament, was taken by all the Nobility, and Officers, and Soldiers of the Army to adhere to him; whereby all Faction and Division seemed in a great Measure to be obliterated, and Warreston, and those with him, that were treacherous, or Dissenters, not before summoned, were, on the Penalty of Excommunication, to appear at the Assembly at Sterlin by a limited time.

Oblivion in Scotland.

Cromwell was very vigilant all this while, and waited greedily for any Opportunity to draw the Scotch Army to an Engagement, and for that Purpose he marched to Newbridge, and from thence to Lithgow, where from the Battlements of the Castle, he discerned the Tents of the Scotch Army encamped in Torwood, about four Miles on this Side Sterlin, having cast up a regular and well fortified Line, with Bulwarks and Guns mounted for their Defence; and having a River behind them, over which they might at Pleasure pass.

The King did not think the Force he should raise in Scotland able to fight Cromwell and invade England, without some Preparations there for his Assistance, to divide the English Forces at home; to which end he kept Intelligence with several of his Friends in London, Lancashire, and other Parts. And it was contrived, that the Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Wilmot, and Major-General Massey, should, with a Body of Horse, march into England, to join with a Party in Lancashire, who were by a prefixed time to be in Arms: But in the midst of these Endeavours, all their Hopes were blasted, by the taking of a Ship at Ayr in Scotland, which had been bound to the Earl of Derby in the Isle of Man, and the seizing of Mr. Berkenhead, an Agent in the Business, by whose Letters all was detected; and thereupon were apprehended, Mr. Thomas Cook of Gray's-Inn, Mr. Gibbons a Taylor, and Mr. Potter an Apothecary, together with Mr. Love, Mr. Jenkins, and Mr. Drake, and several other Presbyterian Ministers, who were brought before a High Court of Justice, and tried for their Lives, and about the latter end of July, Gibbons, Potter, and Love were sentenced to death, and a while after, Gibbons and Love were executed: For at this time the English Parliament thought it necessary to shew some Severity to the Presbyterian Party, to deter them from joining with the Scots, upon their coming with the King into England, which was daily expected.

Cromwell finding his Provision begin to be scarce, marched on the third of July close to the Scotch Trenches, and drew up his Army in Battalia, to provoke them to Battle; whereupon they in the Night planted most of their Cannon on the Brow of the Hill, and the next Morning saluted the English with fifty great Shot, which made Cromwell draw back, and give over a Resolution he had to force the Trenches; but since he could not effect any thing here, he made it his next Work to land some of his Forces on Fife Side; and for that Service Colonel Overton was sent with sixteen hundred Foot, and four Troops of Horse, who, at Queen's Ferry, without much Difficulty, forced his Landing, and Cromwell at the same time marched up with his whole Army close to the Scots, with an Intent to have fallen upon their Rear, in case they should have moved that way to disturb the Enterprize: Yet to drive the English out of Fife, four thousand Horse and Foot were appointed to march against them, under the Command of Sir John Brown, which was not done so privately, but Cromwell had notice of it; and he sent Major-General Lambert, and Colonel Okey with two Regiments of Horse, and two of Foot, who were transported over the Water, and being united with the rest, they engaged Sir John Brown, and gave him an Overthrow, and took himself and Colonel Buchanan, and fourteen hundred more Prisoners, and slew about two thousand; by which Victory the English gained so firm a Footing in Fife, that they were not easily to be repelled; and soon after, Burnt-Island, and a strong Castle upon the River, called Inchgarvy, were taken by surrender. And now the King and his Army were necessitated to take that Course which long since had been designed, 1651. to march directly for England. Cromwell, that he might make himself Master of the Pass at Sterlin, resolved first to set upon St. Johnston's, which after one Day's Siege was gained: And the King, as soon as he had Knowledge of this Loss, marched with his Army with all haste Southwards: This Departure of the King altered Cromwell's Designs upon Sterlin, and he drew his Forces back again over the Frith, making what Expedition he could to overtake his Majesty; but the Scots were many Days March before him. Major-General Harrison, with about three thousand Horse and Dragoons that lay nearest England, had Orders to march to attend the King's Motions, and Major-General Lambert, with about as many more, was appointed, by Advice of a Council of War, to speed after them, and endeavour to fall upon their Rear: And Cromwell himself began his March from Leith with a thousand Horse and Foot, the very same Day the Royal Army entered upon English Ground, by the way of Carlisle, which was on the sixth of August. Upon the Expectation of the King's coming into England, a Party in North Wales began to rise, intending to have joyned with the Earl of Derby, who was to come from the Ile of Man; but this Design vanished to nothing.

By that time the King was come with his Army as far as Lancashire, he was somewhat hard beset, both by the Forces that followed him out of Scotland, and those that in a short time were raised in England against him. He had in his Rear, General Cromwell, (who had left General Monk Commander in Chief in his Absence, with a small dis-jointed Force to carry on the Work in Scotland:) In his Van were the two Major-Generals, Lambert and Harrison, who, by long Marches, got before him, unto whom there came up two thousand of the Country Militia out of Staffordshire, and four thousand under the Command of Colonel Birch out of Lancashire, Cheshire, and other Parts: And to flank him, the Lord Fairfax in Yorkshire appeared in the Field with many Troops. Moreover, the City of London poured out a good Part of its Militia, and the adjacent Counties, were, by strict Order of the Parliament, enjoined to set out Men and Horses at their own Charges: Nor (which was the worst Prefage) did the Scotch Army itself keep entire, being curtailed of about five thousand Men, which dropped away by Degrees, there remaining not compleat, as was generally supposed, by that time they came to Worcester, thirteen thousand Men. The King's Hopes also failed him of the general coming in of the Country; for the most considerable Supply that came to him, was only one Troop of Horse, commanded by Captain Cecil Howard, Son of the Lord Howard of Escrick. Nor is it much wondered at, since the Parliament's Forces had so powerfully over-spread the Country, that none could well have the Opportunity to stir in behalf of the King; so that before the deciding Blow was given, they appeared to be in a very lost and hopeless Posture.

The King, at his first Entrance upon English Ground, was proclaimed King of Great Britain, at the Head of the Army, with great Acclamations, and shooting off the Canon, he being then at Perith in Cumberland, and so afterwards at every Market-Town through which he march'd. He met no considerable Resistance 'till he came to Warrington Bridge, where Lambert endeavoured to impede his Passage, but the King made his way through with Loss to his Opposer; and the Parliament at London began to apprehend the Prosperity of his Fortune: But his wearied Forces could not, it seems, hold out a March of that Length, so that he came on the 22d of August to Worcester, where, after one or two Repulses by the Forces that kept the City, he quickly entered, through the ready Assistance of the Inhabitants, who not only not opposed, but also helped to beat the Parliament's Soldiers out of the Town. Advice came to the King of the distracted Condition of those in London, which occasion'd a Debate in Council thereupon for his Repair thither; but, upon the Result, it was resolved on, as a thing most agreeable to their present Condition, to stay where they were, and to make good all the Passes that were thereabouts, for their better Security. On the 27th of August they kept a solemn Fast, and the next Day had a general Rendezvous, at which the Country came in far more considerably than at any time before, since their Arrival in England.

About two or three Days before the King's Arrival at Worcester, the Earl of Derby having landed at Weywater in Lancashire, came to him with two hundred and fifty Foot, and sixty Horse, which he brought with him out of the Ile of Man, and immediately returning back into Lancashire to raise a more considerable Force, he soon gathered about twelve hundred Men, and so much was he beloved in those Parts, that a little more time had made him formidable; with these he was marching upon a Design to fall upon Cromwell's own Regiment then quartered at Lancaster, in their March towards him; but News came to him of Colonel Lilburn's Approach towards him with ten Troops of Horse (which were ordered out of Yorkshire, on Purpose to hinder his Levies) and two Regiments of Cheshire Foot: The Earl nothing dismayed at this Force, resolved to engage Lilburn and his Party, before the other Troops could come to him; and accordingly he charged them so furiously, that he routed the first Troops, and had made an Impression so far into their Body, that they begun to be disorder'd, 'till the Accession of fresh Reserves, both of Horse and Foot so over-powered his Numbers, that they were totally vanquished: Most of the King's Party were Horse, and the Fight was in Lanes, where they were much annoyed by the Enemies Musqueteers. There were taken Prisoners of Quality, the Lord Widdrington, Sir Thomas Tiderley, Colonel Matthew Boynton, Sir Francis Gamul, Major Trollop, Sir William Throgmorton, Colonel Richard Legg, Colonel Ratliff, Gerard, and some others. The Earl of Derby (having lost his George and Garter) fled with about thirty Horse towards Worcester, having sheltered himself one Night in his way in a House called Boscobel, which Heaven by this Means had prepared for the King's Retreat and Preservation.

By this time Cromwell had surrounded Worcester with his spreading Host, in as near a Compass as the Rivers and Passes would suffer him, the

The first Pass endeavoured to be taken was Upton Bridge on Fleetwood's side, which Major-General Lambert attempted with five hundred Horse and Dragoons, and after a brisk Dispute, wrested from Col. Massej, who in defence thereof, received a Wound in his Hand.

The Pass at Upton taken by Lambert.

The Scots having thus abandoned the Place where they were, it was presently possessed by a strong Party of Horse and Foot, in order to the present Advance of the rest of the Army.

The King's Army was drawn up very near to Worcester, and made many Excursions, breaking down two or three Bridges over the River Team, betwixt the Enemy and them, and shewing a well order'd and govern'd Courage; but September the third, that ominous Day being arrived, Cromwell resolved to venture the Event upon its former Auspicia; and to that Purpose, having his Boats in Readiness, he passed over his Men in the Afternoon of that Day, and drew them all into a Fighting Posture; and having given the Signal to the whole Army to fall on, the Fight was begun in this Manner.

Worcester Fight.

Cromwell himself in Person (about four of the Clock) with his Life-Guard, and Colonel Hacker's Regiment of Horse, with part of his own Foot Regiment, with the entire Regiments of Col. Ingoldsby, and Colonel Fairfax, marched directly towards the City, and after him Lieutenant-General Fleetwood advanced with Colonel Goff's, and Major-General Dean's Regiments; the King's Forces encountering them at the Hedges betwixt the City and them, and disputing every Field with them, in such Order, and with such Gallantry, that those already engaged (lest they should be wholly discouraged with the hotness of this Service) were relieved by Reserves, and they by others, no considerable Progress was yet made, the Highlanders proving excellent Fire-men, and coming to the Butt-End of Musquet, 'till wearied with continual Action, and their Ammunition spent, (the King being then upon the Place) commanded them in some haste into the City, and hastened himself to the other Side, where Colonel Hayns's Regiment, with Cobbet's stood about Powick Bridge, and were entertained with no less Manhood and Slaughter, than those on the other Side; and though one Colonel Matthews was the Reserve to these two Regiments, yet did the Scotch Foot fairly drive them from their Ground, 'till at last being harrassed out, and no Seconds or Supplies to be expected, in a careless Regard of the Enemy, as if they feared not to make which way they pleased, they drew likewise into the Town, as did another Brigade which opposed the Regiments of the Lord Gray and Colonel Gibbons joyned with two others on another Part. The King's Army was drawn very close together, and sent out several Bodies, who charged very briskly on the General's Side, where the Fight was hottest, (he having brought on the Militia Forces to relieve his other Troops). In the Head of one of these Bodies the King himself charged with marvellous Gallantry and Conduct, and pressed so hard upon Cromwell's Life-Guard, that the Troop was very much disordered, and the Captain very dangerously wounded; and in another Charge, Duke Hamilton (who behaved himself with undaunted Courage and Resolution) received a Shot on his Thigh, whereof presently after he died.

Duke Hamilton slain at this Fight.

The Militia Regiments of Essex, Surrey, and Cheshire, were much annoyed by the Scots, and many of their Men slain; but Cromwell drew on fresh and entire Brigades and Regiments, which were in Reserve, of the Veteran Bands, by which the Royalists were so over-power'd, that they were forced to retreat into the City, which they could not do with such Order, but many of the Cromwellians got in with them. Lesley with two thousand Horse (upon what Account not known) not stirring out of the Town to relieve his Party, when the Enemy entered. The King retired to his Quarters for a while, and about seven at Night the Enemy gained the Fort-Royal; at which time his Majesty left the City, passing out at St. Martin's Gate, accompanied with about sixty Horse of the chiefest and most confident of his Retinue, (though many more pressed to bear him Company) and it was reported, that Cobbet very narrowly mist of him as he left his Lodging.

The King defeated at Worcester, but made his Escape.

The Enemies Foot was now got into the Town, and, according to their Order, fell a plundering the Inhabitants in a most barbarous manner, giving no Quarter to any they found in the Streets: And through this their Greediness of Spoil, they kept the Gates shut, and the Horse out, lest they should have shared the better Part; and thereby favoured (as God would have it) the King's Escape. Some Scots who had got into one of the Churches, held out 'till next Morning, when they obtained Quarter for Life; by which time there was scarce an Inhabitant in Worcester, Friend or Foe, left worth a Shilling of what they had in the Town; but the Royal Inhabitants lost least by the Ravage, being supplied with fresh Wares, to their Desires, by the honest Citizens of London, without any Scruple of Credit or Payment, and their Debts were forborn 'till such time as God should enable them to pay, which the Gentry and Inhabitants round about them endeavoured to bring to pass, by their more than ordinary Resort to that Market, for all Necessaries, and upon all Occasions. The Mayor (who was Knighted by the King) and all the Aldermen were committed to Prison; and the Wife of one Guyes (whose Husband for betraying the Designs of the King in that Garrison, was hanged) was rewarded by the Parliament with two hundred Pounds per Annum, and two hundred Pounds in Money.

Worcester miserably plundered.

There were slain in the Field, in the Town, and in Pursuit some 2000, and about 8000 were taken Prisoners in several Places; most of the English Common-Men escaping by their Shibboleth: But at Newport, in the Pursuit were taken the Earl of Lauderdale, Earl of Rothes, Earl of Carnwath, Earl of Kelly, Earl of Derby, Earl of Cleveland, Sir John Packington, Lord Spyne, Sir Ralph Clare, Sir Charles Cunningham, Col. Graves, Mr. Richard Fanshawe, Secretary to the King; many also whose Names we have not, viz. 6 Colonels of Horse, 13 of Foot, nine Lieutenant-Colonels of Horse, 8 Lieutenant-Colonels of Foot, 6 Majors of Horse, 13 of Foot, 37 Captains 1651. Captains Horse, 72 Captains of Foot, 55 Quarter Masters, 89 Lieutenants; there were taken also some General Officers, with 76 Cornets of Horse, 99 Ensigns of Foot, 90 Quarter-Masters, 80 of the King's Servants, with the King's Standard which he had set up when he summoned the Country, the King's Coach and Horses, and Collar of SS's, but the King's Person they had no Power to touch, which recompenced all the other Loss.

He (as was said before) departed in the Dusk, leaving Colonel Careless, in the Rear, to keep the Enemy in Dispute, while he was something forward on his way, and the approaching Night might favour his escape. To which end, all Persons about him were commanded to speak French, and a present Consultation was held which Course they should steer, and it was resolved by my Lord of Derby, that they should make what Speed they could, and recover a place called Whiteladies before Morning, which was some twenty five Miles from Worcester; and thereupon one Master Giffard then in the Company, was called for his Guidance thither; and one Walker (that had been formerly a Scout-master in the King's Army) was his Assistant; yet the way was mistaken as they passed a Heath, but by good Providence soon recovered.

The King deliberates whither to fly.

The Lords leave him at Whiteladies.

The King personates a Wood-Cutter.

Betwixt three and four a Clock the King reached this Place, and Master Giffard (after some knocking at the Door), called up one George Pendrill, a Servant in the House, who hearing and knowing his Voice, ran down in his Shirt and opened the Door, and the King and his Retinue entred; where after a little Debate about the Security of his Person, the said Earl having called thither William Pendrill the House-Keeper of Boscobel, and dispatch'd another towards Tong to see if the Coast was yet clear; His Majesty in the mean while had his Hair cut off, and his Buff Doublet and Linnen-Breeches buried, and he was disguised in Country Habit, with Adjuration of the Fidelity of the Pendrill's (who were now with their Brother-in-Law Francis Yates in Number five) committed and entrusted by the Earl of Derby to their Fidelity, which they most solemnly and dutifully promised. Then the Earl and the rest of the Lords, viz. the Duke of Buckingham and that Train, with Tears took their Leave (Derby would have staid, but there was no Probability of Secrecy for two) and my Lord Wilmot with John Pendrill withdrew himself from that Company to another Retreat; the rest (except the Duke who lay concealed in other Friends Houses about that Country) were taken as aforesaid at Newport by Lilburn's Horse, the same who had defeated the Earl of Derby, who now rendered himself a Prisoner to one Captain Edge of Launceston, on Promise for quarter for Life.

As soon as the King was thus left by his Company, with a Wood-bill in his Hand, he was conducted into a Wood or Coppice near adjoining, taking the Name of William Jones a Wood-cutter, newly come thither for Work, and was accordingly instructed in his Tongue and Behaviour: That Day proved very wet, so that Yates's Wife brought him a Blanket to cover him, and a dish of Milk and Apples for his Refreshment; and at Night against his coming home (where the Mother of the Pendrills at her Son Richard's House most joyfully welcom'd him) and provided an ordinary Country Supper; which ended, the King with Richard his Guide resolved for Wales, and went to one Master Wolfe's of Madely, where for fear of search he was fain to take up his Quarters in the Barn, where Master Wolfe and his Wife attended on him. Here his Majesty understood that the Passes over the Water, and the River Why, were so guarded, that it was unreasonable for him to adventure into Wales; so that on Friday Night he retreated in his woollen accoutrements about his Legs (in which he had lain in that hard Lodging in great Pain and Soreness) to Boscobel, where he found Colonel Careless (who had also betaken himself thither for shelter); and by his Direction, that Saturday the King went into the Wood, (from the pleasantness whereof the House took its Name) and ascended into the Top of that most celebrated Oak, which being thick with Branches stretching and shadowing fore-right, was altogether impervious to the Sight: And here the Colonel bore him Company while he laid his Head, and slept upon a Pillow in his Lap. At Night they both descended, and came into the House and refreshed themselves, and the King perceiving the Secrecy of the Place, was not willing to keep longer abroad. He past away the Sunday in a kind of Arbour or Banqueting-house at the end of the Garden, and there John Pendrill, came to him from my Lord Wilmot, to conduct him to Mr. Whitgrave's House at Moseley; whither with much Difficulty and Danger he himself had arrived, but the Safety there answered all. The King approved of my Lord Wilmot's Advice, and on Monday Night (with the Guard of the five Brethren) and the Help of the Miller's Horse, he came to Mr. Whitgrave's, where he was gladly received by my Lord and that Gentleman, and conveyed into a secret Place; and there it was considered what Course to take for a further Progression in the King's Escape; and to this Purpose one Colonel Lane of Bentley was made acquainted with it, and by them it was agreed, that Mistress Jane Lane upon Pretence of assisting at the Child-bed of her Sister, should ride to Bristol, and the King as her Servant ride before her, with one Mr. Lassels and his Wife behind him, and a Pass for their more Security in travel was procured.

On their way thither, my Lord Wilmot (as of Chance) met with them, having a Hawk on his Fist, and so they journeyed together to Bromsgrove, where the King's Horse losing a Shoe, he was forc'd to carry his Horse to a Farrier, who enquiring of News of the King, and being answered by his Majesty, that he believed the King was escaped into Scotland, he replied, that no doubt the King was somewhere secretly in England, and wish'd he knew where; for that he could get a thousand Pounds by taking of him. The King departing from thence, comes to Eversham, where advising how to avoid Troopers then grazing their Horses in the Meadows adjoining, they lighted upon them in a near Village as they rode, but they civilly let them pass on their Way to Cirencester to the Crown, where they lodged that Night, and went the next Day towards Bristol within three Miles of the City, to the House of Mr. Norton

He quarters in a Barn at Madely.

Mrs. Jane Lane undertakes to convey him to Bristol.

1651. Mr. Norton of Leigh, the designed Journey's end. Here the King feigned himself sick, and took his Chamber by the Order and Care of Mrs. Lane; but the next Morning coming into the Cellar, he was taken Notice of by the Butler, one John Pope, a Soldier formerly in the late King's Army, who upon an intent Look discerned him, and in all dutiful manner discovered himself to him, with such Assurance of Fidelity, that he gained his Majesty's Belief so far, as to be employed by him in getting a Ship for his Transportation: Thence the King was conducted by my Lord Wilmot to one Colonel Windham's House at Trent in Dorsetshire, where he continued almost three Weeks in expectation of a Passage from Lime; soon after his Arrival here, Mrs. Jane Lane with Mr. Lasfells parted, being openly entertained as Kinsfolk, and came in Safety back again to Staffordshire.

The King at Colonel Windham's

My Lord Wilmot and he prevailed with a Merchant to procure a Pass, but were disappointed.

The Occurrences that happened here, we cannot certainly relate, only the King was disappointed of a Passage which a Merchant had procured for him at Lime (by my Lord Wilmot and Colonel Windham's Means); and though the Fault was not in the Merchant, but the dejected Spirit of the Master of the Bark; yet this Disappointment had like to have proved the King's Ruin, by the shooing of my Lord Wilmot's Horse, (there was one Mr. Henry Peters that attended him for his Guide). The Hostler and the Smith discovered by the Shoes, that they were come somewhere from the Northern Parts by their manner of nailing, and presently raised a rumour of the King's being thereabouts; and whilst the Smith went to advise with a Minister of the Matter, my Lord was got away by Providence, and the King came to Bridport, where as 'tis since reported, he had like to have been known by an Hostler, as he was setting up the Horses, who welcom'd him as having formerly seen him at Exeter, but did not distinguish who he was, and the King with a proffer of drinking with him when he was more at Leisure, withdrew himself from any further discovery. That Night they touched at Broad-Windsor, where again the King met with some Disturbance by Soldiers then filling those Places, in Order to their shipping for Jersey. But after all these surprizing Adventures, he got again to Colonel Windham's, with the Lord Wilmot, who had overtaken them, and passed by them at Bridport as was agreed, and thence (for it could not be safe to continue longer in that Place) he was sent to Salisbury, to look out for another Sanctuary, and to confer to that Purpose with Master Coventry, who agreed to bring him to Mrs. Hide's House at a Village called Heal. The King in his way to Salisbury came to a Town called Mere to the George, an Acquaintance of the Colonel's, where drinking in the Cellar, the Host seeing the King stand off as a Servant, said, Tbou lookest like an honest Fellow, here's an Health to the King; who unreadily answering it, made the Man expostulate with the Colonel what Fellow he had brought. The King from Mere went to the House of Mrs. Hide, and was joyfully there received, and introduced to a secret Place in the House, and here Colonel Robert Philips came to him, and Colonel Windham took his Leave of his Majesty, and returned; and Dr. Hinckman after made Bishop of London, had the Honour to be made acquainted with his Condition; and Philips was presently dispatch'd to procure some shipping at Southampton, where the Barks being all taken up, and employed by the Parliament, he returned with his Labour lost, but meeting with Colonel Gunter, he (being informed of the Business) undertook to provide a Bark at Brightenstead in Suffex, which he effected, and thither the King (and my Lord Wilmot) having taken Leave of this noble Matron and the Doctor, accompanied with Colonel Philips, (passing by Night near Portsmouth), came in two Days to an Inn at Brightenstead, where Colonel Gunter and one Master Maunsel the Merchant, who at Gunter's Request hired the Ship, and the Ship-matter Tetershal (now a Captain in his Majesty's Navy) met him, and at Supper they sat down together with his Majesty, when the Master presently discovered him, having formerly seen him in the Downs, when he obtained the Release of his Ship laden from Newcastle; whereupon the King conferred with the Master, (who being wrought upon by Promises and Money paid down, and his own Loyalty) agreed to transport him to France, and departed to call up his Mariners then on Shore, (pretending his Ship half laden with Coals was a Drift); but coming home for a Bottle of Aqua-vitæ, his Wife by the Unseasonableness of the Night suspecting the Truth, encouraged him to the Undertaking, not caring (as she said) if she and her little ones begged their Bread, so the King were in Safety. About five of the Clock in the dark of the Morning on the 20th of October the King embarked, with my Lord Wilmot, and keeping the Shore all that Day, in the Evening crossed over, and at dark Night landed near Dieppe in France. In their Passage, the King sitting upon the Deck, and directing the Course, as they call it, conning the Ship, one of the Mariners blowing Tobacco in his Face, the Master bid him go further off the Gentleman, who murmuring, unwittingly replied, That a Cat might look upon a King. At Rouen the King had his Cloaths chang'd by two English Merchants residing there, and was there saluted (though at first hardly known) by Dr. Earls late Bishop of Salisbury, and upon Notice of his Arrival, the Queen-Mother and the Duke of Orleans, and that whole Court went out to meet him, and congratulate his wonderful Deliverance: A Providence indeed not parallel'd in History, and able to have convinced his Rebels, if their Rage had not blinded them; but it cheered the Minds and Hopes of his Subjects, by this Pledge of their Deliverance from Thraldom, in this marvellous Protection of God's Anointed (no less than two and fifty Persons being privy to his Escape).

He is safely transported into France to Tetershal.

He is met by the Queen-Mother and Court of France.

Most of the Scots taken Prisoners.

Very few of the Nobles and Officers that came in with him from Scotland escaped, David Lesley and Lieutenant General Middleton were taken in Lancashire, and carried Prisoners to Chester, from whence with the Earl of Lauderdale, Kelly, Rotbes, and others they were committed to the Tower, from whence my Lord Middleton happily escaped, the rest were not long after sent to Windsor Castle, where they continued 'till the Restitution of the King to his Government.

On the 21st of September, Cromwell came to London, and was met about Aston with the Speaker and the Members of Parliament, and the Lord Mayor of London and Recorder Steel, who 1651. in a set Speech congratulated his great Successes, and like a false Prophet, by a mistaken Prolepsis applied to him these Words of the Psalmist, To bind their Kings in Chains, and their Nobles in Fetters of Iron, in an arrogant Exaltation of his Achievement: Next Day the common Prisoners (being driven like a herd of Swine) were brought through Westminster into Tutuil Fields (a sadder Spectacle was never seen, except the miserable Place of their Defeat) and there sold to several Merchants, and sent to Barbadoes; the Colours taken were likewise hanged up in Westminster-Hall, with those taken before at Preston and Dunbar.

Cromwell comes with his Prisoners to London.

We have hitherto without any Digression related the Fortune of the King from the Time of his quitting Scotland to his safe Arrival in France; but we shall now briefly describe the Transactions that passed in Scotland at that time: Cromwell, when he left the King constituted (as is hinted) General Monk Commander in Chief of the English Army there; which was an Action that carried great Envy with it from those of his own Party, because Monk had but lately engaged with them; and it was objected, that he had been heard to say he would never draw a Sword in England against the King or his Interest, and therefore they could not expect faithful Service from him in Scotland against the same Party; but it is said, he gave such Assurance to Cromwell of his Fidelity in that Station against the People, (who were the first Raisers of those unhappy Storms that overspread our Nation with the Miseries of War and Sedition) that he would not be persuaded to alter his Choice.

The English Army left with the General exceeded not six thousand Men, and many of these were sick and weak by long Marches, but they had by several successful Encounters gained a great Reputation, and the Scots were much dispirited thereby, so that whilst he found Part of his Forces were in good Heart and his Enemies dejected, he immediately march'd to Sterlin, and came thither by that time Cromwell got into England.

Sterlin with the Castle surrendered to General Monk.

Sterlin was at that time governed by Colonel Cunningham, who was so surprized at the sudden Approach of the English Army, (believing them to be of much greater Number than they really were) that after a short Siege he surrendered the Town and Castle upon Articles on the 14th of August; where the King's Royal Robes, the Cloth of State, and all the Scotch Records were found and seized, together with five thousand Arms and forty Pieces of Ordnance, and great Store of Ammunition; but all the Goods of private Persons there deposited, were delivered to such as would own them: Over the Door of the Chappel that belongs to the Castle this Motto in the time of King James was written, J. C. R. Nobis hac invicta miserunt Centum sex Proavi 1617. which shews that that Place had remained unconquered during the Reigns of an hundred and six Kings, and so continued all his time and his Sons.

The next place to which the General marched after the taking of Sterlin was Dundee, to which Town the chief of the Inhabitants of Edinburgh and many other Towns and Places had conveyed the best Part of their Moveables, as a secure Depository, so that there was great Riches in it.

Major Lumsdale was Governour of the Town, 1651. who had therein eight hundred Soldiers, besides some Companies of armed Inhabitants, whereby he thought himself in so good a Condition, that when the General drew near the Place, and sent a Summons to him, he returned a very slighting Answer, hereupon he environed the Town with his Army; but as his first coming thither, hearing that old General Lesly and several of the Lords of Scotland were met at Elliot (about fourteen Miles from Dundee) to raise Soldiers, he sent Colonel Allured and Colonel Morgan with a thousand Horse and Dragoons to disturb the Levies, leaving privately the chief Conduct and Care of the Design to his Confident Col. Morgan, the other (though the elder Colonel) being not very competent for such a Service. These, as soon as they had their Orders, marched in the Night and took Scotch Guides to shew them the way to the Town, and by the help of some few Scotch Soldiers, who had revolted to the English, they so dissembled their March, that the Country took them for part of their own Forces going to Elliot, so that they were got undiscovered beyond the Town about three of the Clock in the Morning, and then they marched into it with little or no Resistance, and took 300 Noblemen, Gentlemen, and Ministers, with about 70 of their Servants, the one of which was General Lesly (who was found hid in a close Cupboard-bed) the Earls Marshall, Crawford, Lindsay, and Keith, and the Lords Ogilby, Burgenny, Home and Lee, with many other Knights and Gentlemen of Note; these were all shipp'd for London, but old Lesly putting in at Newcastle, was by the Favour of Sir Arthur Haslerig (then Governour thereof) permitted to stay in Northumberland with one De la Val his Son-in-Law, upon promise to be a true Prisoner.

Old General Lesly and divers other Scotch Nobles surprized at Elliot.

The General by this Means had prevented all possibility of Disturbance in his Siege, and seeing he could not by fair Means prevail with the Governour to yield up the Town, though he knew by the Surprize of Elliot all hope of Relief failed, on the first of September he took it by Storm, putting all to the Sword that were found in Arms. The Governour with some few for a while saved themselves in a Steeple, but were smothered out by the burning of wet Straw, and then they yielded on Mercy to one Captain Kelly of Colonel Morgan's Regiment, who was carrying him to the General with Purpose to intercede for his Life, because of the Gallantry of his Behaviour in defence of the Town, but as he was going with him, one Major Butler barbarously shot him dead. The Soldiers had a very rich Booty in this Garrison, for it was at this time the richest Town in Scotland, and there were sixty Sail of Ships in the Harbour. After this taken of Dundee, St. Andrews, Aberdeen, with other Towns, Castles and strong Places, either voluntarily submitted or surrendered upon Summons.

Dundee taken by Storm.

These Successes did not mitigate the Severity of the Rulers at Westminster, who about the End of September appointed a Court-Martial to sit at Chester, for the Tryal of the Earl of Derby, and several other Prisoners taken after the Battle at Worcester, or some little before.

The Earl upon his Tryal pleaded the Quarter given him by Captain Edge that took him Prisoner, which was over-ruled by the Court, and he

Several Royalists taken and imprisoned in the Tower.

This sad Occasion obliges us to a further Account of those English Royalists who were taken in, and after the same Battle of Worcester, among whom were (besides others mentioned) the Lord Grandison, Sir John Packington, Colonel Blague, Colonel Edward Broughton, and Major General Massey; these were all except Massey, presently imprisoned in the Tower; but he being much wounded and tired with Riding, as he endeavoured to escape, delivered himself up to the Countess of Stamford, who secured him in her House 'till he was cured of his Wounds, upon his Engagement to be a true Prisoner; and when he was recovered, he was also sent to the Tower, from whence by a Disguise not long after he made his Escape. Colonel Wogan was much sought after by the Pursuers, but he got safe to the Highlands in Scotland, being resolved to prosecute the King's Quarrel where Nature had fix'd her Non Ultra.

The Isles of Man and Jersey, &c. surrendered to the Parliament.

There remained nothing in England of the ancient Dominions and Territories thereof unsubdued to the Power of the Parliament, except the Isle of Man, and the Island of Jersey, and Castle Cornet in the Isle of Guernsey, which were all about this time surrendered to the Authority of the English Commonwealth, and not only these adjacent Islands, but what was in America appertaining to the Crown of England came quickly into their Jurisdiction, as did the Island of Barbadoes (whereof the Lord Willoughby of Parham was Governour for the King) which was yielded up upon Articles to Sir George Ayscough about the beginning of January. The Articles were very favourable both to the Governour and Inhabitants, the first having Liberty of returning to England, with Freedom to his Person and Estate, and the latter being indemnified for whatever they had done in Hostility against the Parliament. It is said, the gaining of this Island was much facilitated by one Colonel Muddeford then in Difference with the Governour, whom Sir George had drawn to his Party, and by whose Power and Influence in the Island it was easily obtained. Hereupon the Islands of Nevis and St. Christopher thought it in vain to stand out, but both submitted to Sir George Ayscough.

Parham and Ireton yielded to Fate.

Towards the End of this Year two eminent Commanders of the English Commonwealth were taken away by Death, viz. General Edward Popham, one of the Generals at Sea; and Ireton, Son-in-Law to Cromwell, and Deputy of Ireland, who died of a contagious Fever contracted at the Siege of the City of Limerick in Ireland, which (after an obstinate Resistance) he had newly gained. His Corps was transported to England, and brought to London, and interred in Henry the Seventh's Chappel in Westminster with a magnificent funeral Pomp and State. He was no doubt a Man of much Dispatch, of dexterous and able Parts, had they been employed in honest Designs; and was thought to have been a greater Contriver and Prompter in the chiefest of his Father-in-Law's Stratagems. For a time after his Decease, Lieutenant General Edmund Ludlow executed his Office, 'till Colonel Charles Fleetwood who had succeeded him in his Wife, was thereby preferred to succeed him in the Deputiship of Ireland.

Col. Fleetwood succeeds Ireton in the Deputiship of Ireland.

The English Commonwealth having in some measure quieted things at home, and thinking themselves in a fair way to a calm of Peace and Tranquility, took upon them now to give Laws to their subjected Dominions, as also to make Acts of Grace to encourage their Subjects quietly to submit to them: The first related to Scotland, which being in a short time totally brought under, (for besides the gaining of Dunbarton Castle, which was delivered up by Sir Charles Ereskine, and Dunnoter Castle which was taken by Colonel Morgan, and the Isles of Orkney, the Hebrides, and even Schetland, which is thought by some to be the same that the Antients called Ultima Thule, could not escape their Conquest, which was the Work of Colonel Overton) they took into Consideration a Project, which however it being attempted in former times, could be brought to no Effect, they resolved to go through with; namely, an Union of England and Scotland, and incorporating of both Nations into one Commonwealth. This was mainly opposed and remonstrated against by the Scotch Kirk, tho' in vain; for the Parliament of England, (as they called themselves) had resolved upon an Act for the Union of Scotland, and the abolishing of Kingly Government in that Nation; intending that the Sheriffs or Burghs, should chuse their Deputies to represent them in Parliament as they should think fit. And Commissioners were sent from hence in Behalf of the Commonwealth of England, to treat concerning this Union with the Natives, whom they found but very cold Entertainers of their Proffer, besides the tough Opposition of the Clergy. These Commissioners were Oliver St. John, Sir Henry Vane, Major General Dean, Major Salway, Colonel Fenwick, and Alderman Tichburn: And not long after were sent down as Itinerant Judges to hear, determine, and make Inspection into all things belonging to the Government of that Nation, Mr. George Smith, Mr. John March, Mr. Edward Mosely, and Mr. William Lockart a Scotchman: But these Judges were several times altered at Pleasure: But to the Commissioners there came in and submitted divers of the Scotch Nobility; as the Marquess of Huntly, the Earls of Weems, Angus, and Calender, and the Lord Belcarris, and others; but of all that came in of the Nobility, the Marquess of Argyle was he that most complied and adhered to the Commonwealth Interest, notwithstanding all the professions and Shew he made when the King was in Scotland, and of the Lairds that acted amongst the English, the chief were Swinton and Warrington.

The Parliament's Provision for the Government of Scotland.

The next Act of Grace was to England, and was an Act of Oblivion, wherein they published it to be their Intention to forget all Injuries, and pardon all Hostilities hitherto committed against them, upon Condition of taking an Engagement, which they imposed upon all People, wherein they were to promise, to be true and faithful to the Commonwealth of England as then established, without King or House of Lords; out of which nevertheless were excepted the Lord Goring and his Sons, Sir John Webster of Amsterdam, the Executors

sion of the War with Holland.

Scarce were these and some other little Transactions finish'd at home, when there began to be in Preparation new Matter for the Exercise of their Arms abroad, in respect of a secret Grudge which had lain a pretty while smothering between them and their Brother-States of Holland, which was probably in a great Part occasion'd through the flight and indifferent reckoning of Doriffaus, (whose Assassination they thought, perhaps, not sufficiently enquired into;) and afterwards of their Embassadors Oliver St. John, and Walter Strickland, who being affronted by the Common People in Holland, thought themselves not sufficiently vindicated by the States, nor respected according to the Dignity of their Masters, and therefore came away in Discontent; and tho' the States sent hither afterwards as their Agent,
Myn Heer Joachim, with several Compliments and Excuses, with Commission to treat about a fair Correspondence and Commerce with England; yet our States at Westminster were now resolved they should not have their Friendship on such easy Terms as before they offered by their Embassadors, since they then made no more Account of it: So that they dismissed Joachim after a prefixed time, beyond which he was not to stay, and then proceeded to make an Act, For the Encouragement of Navigation; wherein they prohibited the importing of any Foreign Commodities, except upon English Bottoms, or such as were of the Country whence the Commodities came; beginning withal to stand high upon Claims of Dues and Reparations for the Prejudice done us in our Trading: Upon which, Occasion was taken oftentimes to search the Dutch Ships, and sometimes to make Prize of them. To complain of these Damages, but more especially, if it were possible, to obtain a Suppression of the said Act so prejudicial to their Trade, they sent over into England their Embassadors, Myn Heer en Catz, Van de Peere, Sharp and Newport; these Men however coming as most zealous Advocates for a speedy Pacification, and relying much upon the favourable Reception they should meet with here, were nevertheless at their very first Audience accosted with such high Demands about the Herring fishing, the Business of Amboyna, and a free Trade in the Schelde, from Middleburgh to Antwerp, that they were able to give but a cold Account to their Masters in the Affair they came about: And though some Messages for a while passed to and fro for the Vindication of each other's Actions, the Dutch all the while making great Protestations of their sincere and real Intentions towards this Commonwealth, yet still Preparations for War were privately made on both Sides.

Lilburn ban-
nished.

This Year ended with an Act for the Banishment of John Lilburn, who being a Person of a turbulent Nature, had with wrestless Impatience opugned all Government, insomuch that it was said merrily of him, If all the World were dispeopled to him alone, John will be against Lilburn, and Lilburn against John. It was provided in this Act, that if ever he returned without Leave from the State, he should suffer as a Felon. That which caused this Severity against him at this time, was his violent Opposition of Sir Arthur

Hasterig, a leading Member of the Parliament, about a Coal Pit in his Possession, claimed by one Primate; wherein he did not only lay many Oppressions and Scandals to the Charge of Hasterig, but in the Publication thereof, arraigned the Justice of the whole Commonwealth.

The States of Holland set out a very great Fleet 1652.
for the Security of their Trade for this Year, and in their Instructions to Martin Harpez Van Trump their Admiral, they directed him not to strike his Flag to the English Admiral; and the same Orders were given to every of the Ships of War, if occasionally they met any single Ships of England, or others, that were not too numerous for their Opposition.

The English on the other side they knew would not easily lose the Dominion of the Sea, which, in all Ages they exercised without Controul; so that Van Trump coming into Dover Road on the 17th of May, with two and forty Sail, lay there at Anchor, as to dare them to Opposition; and Notice thereof being given to Blake the English Admiral, he made hast to play up towards him with about 15 Ships and Frigates; but when Trump descried the English Fleet, he weighed his Anchor, and stood away by a Wind Eastward, intending (as Blake supposed) to leave them to avoid the Dispute of the Flag; but about two Hours after, they alter'd their Course, and bore directly with the English Fleet, and Van Trump was head-most, whereupon the English lay by, and put themselves into a fighting Posture, judging the Dutch had a Resolution to engage. Being come within Musquet-shot, Blake gave Order to fire at his Flag, which was done thrice; and after the third Shot, Trump let fly a Broad-side, and it was well returned by the English Admiral; and after the Exchange of Broad-sides, Major Bourn came in to Blake's Assistance with eight good Ships, and then both the Fleets engaged from four in the Afternoon, till it was dark; and though there were not less than 2000 Shot of Cannon exchanged on one side and the other, the Loss of Men was not great; and the greatest was of the Hollanders, of whom one Ship was sunk, and another taken, and about an hundred and fifty Men slain;
the English had not any Ship disabled, and very few Men killed. Van Trump drew his Fleet in the Night to the Back of Goodwin Sands, and the next Morning sailed away for Zealand.

The Holland Embassadors at London, by their Memorials, endeavour'd all they could to per-swade the Parliament, that this Action of Trump's was without the Privy or Consent of their Masters, and thereupon demanded a Restitution of the Ship taken by Blake in the Fight; but the People at London were so inflamed with the News of the Fight, and Trump's Carriage in it, that they insisted not on that Demand; and the Parliament was necessitated to appoint a Troop of Horse to guard the Embassadors from the Rage and Fury of the Multitude.

The States apprehended this Business might cause a Rupture betwixt them and the English, and therefore they dispatched the Heer Paw to England in the Quality of an Embassador Extraordinary, who was so very well received at his Arrival at London, that he believed he should not only extinguish the Flame already kindled, but perfect that Negotiation formerly treated on

Trump out again at Sea with an hundred and twenty Sail.

In the mean time, about the 6th of June, Sir George Ascough arrived in the Downs with the Barbadoes Fleet, consisting of 15 Men of War, having taken in his way 10 Dutch Merchant-Ships, and four Men of War, one whereof was a Ship of Advice, to give Notice to their Merchant-Ships of their present Differences.

The Parliament, upon his Arrival, sent Orders to him to stay there, 'till a Fleet then providing in the Thames should be made ready to join with him.

Trump having Intelligence thereof, about the beginning of July clapped in with a Part of his Fleet between Sir George and the River, and sent the other Part Westward to prevent his going that way, resolving either to surprize those coming out of the Thames, or to sink and disperse those with Sir George Ascough; but the Governour of Dover gave so speedy Advice of the Posture of the Enemy, that the Navy in the River moved not, and then Trump, on the eighth of July made towards Sir George to assail the Fleet, but the Wind failing, they came to an Anchor a League off, and before the next Ebb, the Militia of that Country was ready upon the Coast, and Sir George's Ships well re-inforced with Men, and a Platform was cast up betwixt the Castles of Deal and Sandown, whereon good Store of Cannon were planted to receive them; but at the next Ebb, whilst they were under Sail, the Wind came about South-West, and blew so directly in their Teeth, that they could not possibly make in to them.

Trump, upon this Disappointment, returned to Holland, to convoy several Merchant-Men for the Northern and Eastern Trade, that lay ready for him; with which he failed toward the Sound, and in his way he receiv'd Advice, that Blake had spoil'd and dispersed their Herring-Fishing, and taken 12 Men of War that guarded them, and was with his Fleet in Harbour about the Isles of Orkney, wherefore he sent part of his Ships to guard the Merchant-Men on their Voyage, and with the rest he failed to find out Blake, having met in his way the five East India Ships, but when he came near those Northern Islands, such a Storm arose, that he was forc'd to put to Sea, and his Fleet was so scattered, that he came home but with 42 Sail, and three of the East India Ships, but shortly after, the other two East India Ships and all the Fleet, except six, came home in safety; and Blake came safe to Yarmouth with all his Fleet, and six of Trump's Frigates which he had met with, and nine hundred Prisoners.

In this time Sir George Ascough had got a Fleet together of about 40 Sail, with which he failed to Plymouth, to secure our Merchant-Ships homeward bound, where there safely arrived 5 Ships from the East Indies, and two from the Streights: Whilst Sir George lay there, De Ruyter was passing that way with a Fleet of 50 Men of War, to convoy about the like Number of Merchant-Ships, that way: About two in the Afternoon, on the 16th of August, the English Fleet got sight of the Enemy, and De Ruyter sent away his Merchant-Ships, and made ready for the Fight; and about Four, Sir George, with 9 of his head-moost Ships, charged thro' the Dutch Fleet, and got the Weather Gage of them, and charged them again, but the rest of his Fleet being Merchantmen, and not coming up, and the Night being already entred, both Fleets drew off from each other; the Dutch into one of the French Ports, and Sir George to Plymouth, to mend and repair the Damages of the Fleet; Capt. Peck his Rear-Admiral, lost his Leg, and soon after died, and several other Captains were wounded, but not one Ship lost; what Loss of Men the Dutch sustained, was not known, but none of their Ships were disabled.

Van Trump was at this time very much discontented, upon some Rumours spread of his Failure of Conduct in the last Expedition, so that he desired the States that he might leave his Charge and retire; the States seem'd very unwilling to comply with his Request, but at last they consented to it, and Wit Wittens was appointed in his Place, to whom De Ruyter was joined in Commission. These two Commanders made what Speed they could to get the Fleet to Sea, and in October they made their Stations on the side of the North-Foreland: Blake as soon as he had notice thereof, hastened with his Fleet towards them, having been on the Western Coast to convoy some Merchant-Ships homewards, and taken in his way five Dutch West India Ships of great Value, and six Streights-Men, valued at 200000*l*.

He divided his Fleet into three Squadrons, one commanded by himself, the other by Penne the Vice-Admiral, and the third by Rear-Admiral Bourn, and the 28th of October the Fight was begun by Bourn, and seconded immediately by the whole Fleet, wherein great Courage was shown on both sides, the Rear-Admiral of the Dutch was boarded and taken, and two more of their Ships were sunk, and one blown up, so that Wit Wittens was glad to give over the Conflict, and to ply his Sails to get off, being pursued by the English Fleet within twelve Leagues E. S. E. of the Maze, and he with the remainder of his torn and much shattered Ships, came into Goree. The English preserved all their Ships, though many of them were much battered, and Blake came in Triumph into the Downs.

The Dutch were much troubled at the Loss of this Combat, which was by Wittens imputed to the Cowardice of some of his Commanders, and the Advantage of the English Ships over them in Number and Strength.

Sir George Ascough and De Ruyter's Engagement at Plymouth, being the second Combat with the Dutch.

De Wit worsted by Blake, being the third Engagement with the Dutch.

1652. But nevertheless the States thought it not convenient to hazard another Combat, 'till they had a more sufficient Fleet than before, both in the Goodness and Strength of their Ships, and the Number also.

Both they and the English in the first beginning of the War, had sent to the Sweeds and Danes to invite them to their Party, because the Materials for Shipping came from the Seas where these Princes had the chief Dominion; the Sweeds were very favourable to us, and at last would be Neuters, if not Partakers with us, and the Queen sent hither Monsieur Spiering her Embassador, who died shortly after his Arrival at London, and after his Death Monsieur Appleboom succeeded: But the Danes declared for the States of the United Provinces against us. And about this time their King sent a Message to them, that he was ready to succour them with twenty good Ships of War, provided they would re-establish Trump in his late Employment as Admiral. The States were very willing to comply with this Proposition, and Trump was again prevailed to re-assume his former Charge.

The Dane sides with the Dutch.

In the Levant Captain Badily with four or five English Frigates was set upon by Van Galen, who commanded a Fleet of sixteen Sail of Dutch Men of War in those Seas, in which Encounter the Phoenix was taken by the Dutch, and the rest of our Ships were forc'd to retire under the Protection of the Port of Longone; but Van Galen bought his Victory with the loss of his Life, and the Phoenix was on the 20th of November regain'd by the Valour of Captain Cox a former Lieutenant to the same Ship.

The English come off with loss in the Levant.

Van Trump being restored to the Office of Admiral, was very industrious to give a Proof of his Courage in some valiant Enterprize; and to that Purpose, having got together 80 Men of War, and 10 Fire-ships, he sailed directly to the backside of the Goodwin, near the Place where the former Battle was fought. Blake was in the Downs with few more than 40 Sail, but was nevertheless resolved not to refuse an Engagement, and for that Purpose he hoisted his Sails to find out Trump, and sent out 7 Ships to discover his Fleet, which were met by 9 of the Dutch Ships, sent out on the same Errand. These began the Fight with their Cannon, and immediately the two Admirals advanced at the Head of their Squadrons, and the Fight was very furious, and lasted from two in the Morning on the 29th of November, Old Style, 'till six in the Evening. The Triumph, wherein Blake himself was, with the Victory and Vanguard, bore most of the Stress, being engaged at one time with twenty of the best Dutch Ships, and tho' it was long doubted on which side the Fortune of the Day would turn, yet at last the Numbers of the Dutch drew it to that side, with the loss of the Garland and Bonaventure, which were taken, and of one that was burnt, and three sunk; and indeed had not the Night been favourable to our Retreat, the whole Fleet might have been in much Danger. But the Dutch could not much boast of this Victory; for they lost many Men, and one of their Flag-ships was blown up, and all the Mariners and Soldiers therein lost, except two; and the Ships of Van Trump and De Ruyter were much damaged.

The fourth Combat with the Dutch.

Blake defeated in the Downs.

Blake, after this Defeat, drew his shattered Fleet into the River of Thames to be repaired, and it is said, Trump triumphantly sailed through the Channel with a Broom on his Main-Topmast, pretending to sweep the Channel of all English Shipping; and having sent home all his disabled Ships, after some little stay about Guernsey and the Western Parts, he arrived at the Isle of Rhe, to stay there for a Fleet of Merchant Ships, which were to be convoy'd homewards. In the mean time, all possible Care was used by the English States to equip a Fleet to meet him as he returned, and General Monk was added to the Number of the Generals at Sea; and General Dean being newly arrived from Scotland, was ordered to go to Sea with Blake and Monk; so that under the joint Command and Conduct of these three Generals, the War at Sea was to be managed.

The Expence of this War made this Parliament contrive all ways they could to husband their Treasure, and because they thought the Entertainment of the Duke of Gloucester (whom since the Murder of the late King they had kept at the Isle of Wight) too great an Expence, they resolved to send him abroad, and about the beginning of February they sent him with two Servants to Dunkirk, promising to allow him a small Exhibition for his Maintenance, if he would not come near his Brother, nor any of his Relations.

The Duke of Gloucester sent away to Dunkirk.

But as soon as he came on that side of the Water, he was receiv'd according to his Birth and Quality, and from Brussels he was attended to the Princess of Orange at Breda, where he safely arrived, to the great Joy of her and all the Royal Family, who had been in continual Fear, that his Life would be taken away by those that spared not the Life of his Royal Father.

He is conveyed to Breda.

After he had been a while at Breda, he was conducted from thence by the Earl of Lauderdale to Paris, to the King his Brother, to whom as also to his Mother the Queen, and his other Relations, he was welcomed as one risen from the Dead, and was very civilly treated by the King and Queen-Mother of France, and that whole Court.

From whence he is conducted to the King his Brother.

The King of Denmark's Confederacy with the States of Holland, made the Parliament very solicitous to draw the Queen of Sweeden to their Interest, but she continued in a Resolution of Neutrality, and offered her Mediation for a Peace betwixt the two States, which yet took no Effect; but the Dutch, to strengthen their Party, were very earnest with the French, by their Embassador Boreel at Paris, to conclude a League Offensive and Defensive with that Crown; and herein they doubted not to succeed, because the English were in a kind of Hostility at this time with the French: For, about the latter end of August in this Year, some of the Parliament's Frigates had taken seven of the King of France's Ships, which were going to the Relief of Dunkirk, then besieged by the Arms of Spain, by which means that Town came into the Hands of the Spaniards: But the Reputation of the English Commonwealth was at this time so great, that Cardinal Mazarine, who then managed the Affairs of France, endeavoured rather an Accommodation with them than otherwise; so that the Dutch missed of their Purposes in that Negotiation, Monsieur Bourdeaux sent Agent from the French King to the English States.

The English Fleet out at Sea again.

The States of Holland having Advice that the Parliament was equipping a Fleet to be put to Sea under their three Generals, sent an Express to Trump (then at Rhe) to hasten away with what Merchant-Men were ready, and to block up the River of Thames to prevent their going out: Trump, upon receiving this Order, made what haste he could; but contrary to the Expectation of the States, and even to their Amazement, on the 8th of February, the English Generals set sail from Queenborough with 60 Sail of Men of War, to which, on the 11th of the same Month, 20 Sail more joined from Portsmouth, and with this Fleet they failed over against Portland, where they lay cross the Channel, half Seas over, to discover the Dutch Fleet; on Friday the 18th of February, by Break of Day, the Southermost Ships of the English descried the Dutch, consisting (as their own Prints reported) of 76 Men of War, who had the Charge of 300 Merchant-Ships to convoy homewards.

The English Fleet made what Sail they could towards the Enemy, and Van Trump having recollected his Ships of War, prepared to receive them; and about 8 in the Morning, the Triumph, wherein Blake and Dean were, with 12 Ships more (for the rest of the Fleet could not get up) engaged Board and Board with the Grosse of the Dutch Fleet; and the Triumph was hardly put to it, having received 700 Cannon-shot in her Hull, but was gallantly relieved by Lawson, Commander of the Fairfax. By this time the whole English Navy came up, and a furious Fight ensued betwixt the two Fleets, which continued 'till the Night parted them.

The two Fleets engage near Portland. The fifth time.

The Ship wherein General Monk commanded, being a flow Sailor, could not perform so much as he desired, but she lost many Men, and had as great a Share in the Fight as any of her Condition. The Triumph and Fairfax being enclosed by the greatest of the Holland Ships, had in each an hundred killed and wounded, and Blake received a hurt in his Thigh with a Piece of Iron which a Shot had driven out, and Ball the Captain thereof was slain, together with Sparrow the Secretary. The Prosperous, a Ship of 44 Guns, was boarded by the Dutch, but recovered by the Merlin Frigate; Capt. Mildmay of the Vanguard was killed; the English lost not a Ship in this Fight, but had many disabled: But 6 Men of War of the Dutch were taken and sunk, whereof one was a Flag-ship; and it is said, that most of the Officers in Trump's Ship were killed or wounded, and many of the Mariners. Such of the English Fleet as were disabled got into Portsmouth, and the wounded Men were set on Shoar; and on Saturday Morning the Dutch Fleet were again discerned 7 Leagues off Weymouth, and over against Dungeness, whither the English plied; and in the Afternoon both Fleets engaged with so much Fury, that they were quickly environed with Flame and Smoke. Trump had put his Merchant-Men before him, and after the first Shock, he drew off, and fought retreating towards Bulloign, and in his way thither the English Frigates at large took many of his Merchant-Ships, and Lawson boarded a Dutch Man of War, and brought her off. The next Day, early in the Morning, the Fight was renewed, which continued very fierce 'till 4 in the Afternoon, but the Wind being cross to the English at N.N.E. Trump got to Calice Sands, and there anchored, and thence tided it home.

The Dutch lost in these three Days Fight, 11 Men of War, and 30 Merchant-Ships, and by the Calculation of their own Prisoners, they had no less than 1500 Men killed; but of the English, tho' many Ships were shattered, there was but one sunk, named the Sampson, but Capt. Button the Commander thereof (tho' much wounded) and most of the Men were saved. The Number of the English slain is not reported, but by the best Conjecture that could be made, they were not much less than those of their Enemies.

This busy Year ended with the safe Arrival of Prince Rupert with the Swallow, and a Prize laden with Tobacco, and a little Frigate at Nants in Britany, from the Caribbe Islands. He had been sometime in those Seas with 7 or 8 Ships, and his Brother Prince Maurice with him, endeavouring to give what Annoyance he could to the Enemies of the Crown of England in those Parts, 'till some serviceable Occasion might render him more favourable elsewhere; but the said Strokes of adverse Fortune, which yet eclipsed the Royal Throne of England, did even in those distant Parts pursue this illustrious Pair of Princes, and by the Violence of a Hurrican, the Life of one of them (the valiant Prince Maurice) was taken away; a Person who in our unhappy Civil Wars gave eminent Proof of as much Courage and Generosity as any one Man could be Master of, than whom Death has left few worthier behind, to dignify the World with Actions of Glory and Renown. Prince Rupert at his first Arrival fell sick, but upon his Recovery he was invited to Paris, and complimented by the King of France, and cordially welcomed by the King our Sovereign, where now almost the whole Royal Family were met together.

Prince Maurice drowned in the West Indies.

It is commonly observed, that it is easier much to obtain a Conquest than secure it; and in nothing was this more visible than in the present Posture of Affairs in England, where the New Commonwealth now advanced to as great Prosperity and Security as their ambitious Hopes could aim at, having, together with the Death of the late King, as much as in them lay, even buried and eradicated Monarchy itself, began to sink under its own Weight, and by intestine Divisions at home, to meet that Ruin, which all the Strength and Power of their Enemies abroad, and their Confederates could not reach to.

The Officers of the Army who effected this Change, had met in Council some Months before in meditation of altering the Government; and these being of two Parties, and of different Interests, it was scarce believed they could agree in the Design. Harrison, who was one of the Heads of that Party, at this time known by the Name of the Sect of the Fifth Monarchy, had gained a great Part of the inferior Officers, and these were so much intoxicated with that Notion, that they never could approve of any Government, but where (as they said) Christ was to rule, which, as they explained, was a Dominion

1653. to be exercised by Saints under him. Men of such holy and sanctified Lives, that nothing but Plenty and Happiness could be expected from their Government, and to such all Offices of Trust and Power, Military and Civil were to be committed, and of this sort they resolved to chuse by Nomination a new Representative. Cromwell mingled with these Zealots in this Projection, knowing the Inconsistency of their Intentions, and that the Reins of Power would be by them managed to set all in a Flame, and introduce such Confusion as would necessitate his taking to himself the Government to rescue his Party from Destruction.

The Parliament were very sensible of these actings, but knew not how to prevent their Progress, yet that they might not be wanting to their own Security, they had many Conferences with these Officers, wherein they represented to them the Inconveniences of their Proceedings, telling them, as the Temper of the Nation now stood, no safety could be administered to the Government, but by filling up the House with Elections by the Country, of Persons qualified, and when they were by that Method arrived to a full Representative of the Nation, their Acts would be received with greater Authority, and by the concurrent Advice of so great a Body of interested Persons, their Cause would be strengthened, and the Good they would do in reforming the Law and all Abuses, and administering Justice impartially, and settling a due Liberty to the People in civil and spiritual things, would make the Government in a few Years so acceptable, that there would be no need of an Army to support it.

To this, answer was made by the Officers, That they could not expect any good Fruits to the People of God from this Parliament, wherein there was so great a Party of carnal Men of corrupt Principles, that the Persons by their Authority to be chosen would be of the like Temper and Spirit as they are, and joyn with them in perpetuating themselves in the supreme Government: Concluding, That the People of the Land, who were distinguishable from the People of God, were not yet to be trusted with the Choice of their own Representatives: But they (they said) would take Care to devolve the supreme Authority upon known Persons fearing God, and of approved Integrity. This reasoning on both sides tended to make the Breach wider, but the Parliament in the mean time went on according to their own Purpose, and prepared an Act for the settling of Qualifications of Members to fill up their House, wherein such Speed was made, that on the 20th of April the Question was ready to be put to pass it into a Law, when Cromwell, Lambert, Harrison, and some eight Officers more of the Army, by Intelligence with some of their Members, entered the House, and after a short Speech spoken by Cromwell, shewing some Reasons for the Necessity of their Dissolution, he declared them dissolved, and required them to depart, but the Speaker would not leave the Chair, 'till by Harrison taken out by the Arm; and Cromwell commanded the Mace to be taken away, and not any more to be carried before him, and then they caused the Doors of the Parliament House to be locked, and placed a good Guard thereon to prevent the assembling of the Members.

The manner of Cromwell's dissolving the Parliament.

This Revolution could not but be very pleasing to the King, for now the Stone was rowling, in all Probability it would not fix (as in the Sequel it appeared) 'till that just Government should be attained under which this Kingdom had enjoyed as much Happiness for many Centuries of Years, as any Nation in the World.

The first thing done by these Officers after this Change, was to constitute a Council of State consisting of the chief Officers of the Army, and such of the late Parliament as were their Confederates, in whom the supreme Authority was placed, and 'till a Representative should be chosen, all Obedience was required thereunto as fully as when the Parliament was setting, and all Judges, Sheriffs, Justices of Peace, Mayors, Bayliffs, and other Civil Officers and publick Ministers whatsoever were to proceed in their respective Offices and Places, and Writs were to run in the Style of the Keepers of the Liberty of England as before.

The Dutch thought to profit themselves by this Alteration, and made all possible Haste to get out their Fleet, but our new Governours omitted nothing that might advance their Maritime Preparations. And the first thing they did after their Establishment, was to make an Ordinance for the raising of six Months Assessment from the 24th of June ensuing, which was readily obeyed, because it exacted not so great a Sum as the last Acts of Parliament for Assessments.

Whilst these things were in Action, all Officers and Soldiers in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and all the Officers in the Fleet were practised on to approve of the Army's Proceedings, and did comply therewith, so that no Commotion followed in any Part upon this mutation of Government.

The next considerable Matter that occur'd, was a Naval Combat betwixt the Dutch Fleet under Trump assisted with De Ruyter, Wit Wittens, and the two Eversons, consisting of 104 Men of War, 12 Galliots, and 9 Fireships; and the English Fleet under the Command of General Monk and General Dean (who were both in one Ship) assisted by Penne the Vice-Admiral, and Lawson Rear-Admiral, consisting of 100 Ships of all sorts. It was about 11 of the Clock at Noon on the 2d of June that both Fleets engaged, and so fatal was the Beginning of the Fight, that at the first Broadside of the Enemy, Dean was shot almost off in the middle by a Cannon Bullet, as he stood by General Monk; but he without any Disturbance was so present to himself, that he caused him to be removed, and prosecuted the Battle with great Resolution, without any further Notice of the Accident. The Noise and Thunder of the Cannon was very great, and had been very deplorable to both Parties, if a sudden Calm had not abated the Fury of the Fight for some time after it began; but after two Hours such a fresh Gale of Wind arose, that the Fight was renewed in so violent a manner, that it continued with very little Intermision whilst there was any Light; Lawson pressed so hard upon De Ruyter with his Squadron that he had carried him, if Trump had not come into his Relief, but he could not prevent Lawson's sinking a Ship of Holme of 42 Guns, that had in her 140 Men; the General with his Squadron was in the thickest of them, and greater Execution had been done, but that the Wind blew

The next Morning early Gen. Monk found himself near them, but the Wind was so slack, he could not come up 'till Noon to engage their Fleet, but then the Combat was begun with greater Vigour than at any time before, and continued 'till ten at Night; Ninety of Trump's Fleet in the heat of the Engagement were in so great Confusion, and so unwilling to stand to the Fight, that he fired upon them, and sent his Boat to command them to come up to him, but nothing he could do or say, could persuade more than 20 of them to return, the rest steered away East and by South, but the Wind being fresh Westwardly, the General pressed so hard upon them, that he sunk six of their best Ships, and two were blown up amongst their own Fleet, and 11 Ships and 7 Hoys were taken, and 1350 Prisoners, whereof 6 were Captains of very good Note, and of the Ships one was a Vice-Admiral, and two were Rear-Admirals.

tected.

At the end of this Day's Fight General Blake came in with eighteen fresh Ships, and if the Dutch had not been upon the Flats of Dunkirk and Calice, whereby our great Ships could not get up to them, most of their Fleet had been ruin'd or taken. The English had not one Ship lost or disabled, and, except General Dean, but one Captain slain.

Van Trump imputed this Overthrow to the Ignorance and Unskilfulness of his Captains, but his Masters were so humbled by it, that a Resolution for Peace was immediately taken up, and a Vessel with a white Flag, and a Messenger to prepare a way for two Embassadors was sent into England.

The Council of Officers had now agreed upon the several Persons all over England (who were the most sanctified Creatures they could nominate, to form a Representative, and a Summons was sent to every one of them in the Name of Oliver Cromwell Captain General of all the Forces, &c. to take upon them the Trust to which they were summoned, and to meet at Whitehall to that Purpose on the 5th of July then next coming.

The New-
summoned

These according to the respective Summons assembled at the time appointed, and went to Westminster to the Parliament House; and chose one Rouse a Cornish Man (made by the late Parliament Provost of Eaton) to be their Speaker, and appointed several Committees in the Manner as other Parliaments used to do, to make their Business easy to them.

The Dutch in this Conjunction had underhand made Overtures of a Peace to Cromwell, which was not ill received, but that they might make it on better Terms, they were resolved once more to try their Fortunes at Sea, to regain their lost Reputation; and in order thereunto, they prepared a Fleet to the Number of an hundred and twenty five Sail, with so much Confidence of Success, that they posted Van Trump out with 95 Ships before the rest were ready, which were to be brought to him by Witt Wittens from the Texel.

It was upon the 29th of July in the Morning, when the English Fleet of about 106 Ships descried the Dutch, they had time to draw together, and divided their Fleet into four Squadrons, viz.

the first under Trump, the second under Vice-Admiral Everson, the third under Rear-Admiral Floris, and the fourth under Witt Wittens for a Reserve.

The English Fleet was commanded by General Monk in Chief, having Penne for his Vice-Admiral, and Lawson Rear-Admiral; Blake was discomposed in his Health, and not with the Fleet, the English were all a-stern, and could not get up 'till six of the Clock to come to any Engagement, and then it was begun with a few of the nimblest Frigots, which were afterwards re-inforced to the Number of thirty, who continued the Battle 'till the Night parted them, though the rest of the Fleet could not get up to joyn with them.

The Dutch by the Darknels of the Night sent away many of their maim'd disabled Ships, and got by the English Fleet to joyn with the twenty five Ships that Wittens brought to them, which much encouraged the rest to renew the Fight, in Hopes to be reveng'd of their late Affront; and now both Fleets met in the most fierce and cruel Fight that ever was fought. General Monk observing this War to be very burthensome to the Nation, thought the best way of ending it to be in the sharpness of it, and therefore gave Orders to all his Captains, neither to give nor take Quarter; for he had found by Experience, that the taking of Ships obliged him always to send other Ships off with them, and so the Fleet became weakened. The Air was quickly fill'd with scattered Limbs of Men blown up; the Sea was dyed with the Blood that flowed from the Veins of the slain and wounded. Witt Wittens and Everson did bestir themselves, and often attempted to board the Ship in which the General himself was: Cornelius Everson's Ship was sunk, and he taken, and the famous Van Trump himself standing upon the Poop of his Ship with his drawn Sword encouraging his Men, was slain with a Musquet-Bullet; whereby the rest of the Fleet was so discouraged, that they hoisted out all the Sail they could to haste away towards the Texel: The English pursued little, (having bought the Victory at a dear Rate) but tack'd about to Sole-Bay, there to repair their shattered Ships, and dispose of their Prisoners, whereof five were Captains, viz. Everson, Zanger, Fomeen, Scotten, and D'Hayes, and about 1200 common Men, by the Mercy and Compassion of the English taken out of Boats, and swimming in the Sea; 33 Sail of Ships, out of which they were sav'd, was sunk to the bottom of the Ocean, and in Regard that these Prisoners were belonging to so many lost Ships, by this means the Number of them was known; but it is supposed that some were sunk, out of which no Men were saved. The English lost 400 common Men, and 8 Captains, Graves, Peacock, Taylor, Crisp, Newman, Cox, Owen and Chapman, Men of great Resolution; and had about 7000 wounded, whereof five were Commanders, but they lost but one Ship, which was called the Oak.

Van Trump was a Man of so great Courage and Experience in Maritime Affairs, that he justly merited the Fame of being the most renowned Sea-Captain of this Age, and perhaps there were few better at any time before. He was a Person of much Vertue, Honour, and Fidelity, and a great lover of his Country, which made him bear a grateful 1653. Respect to the House of Orange, by whom the Foundation was laid of that Greatness they now assume and enjoy; and by whose Prudence and Courage their Liberties were rescued and preserved against one of the most potent Princes of Europe. Out of his great Sense of Honour, he had much Commiseration for the Sufferings of our Royal Family, and did endeavour to persuade his Masters to espouse the King's Interest, as that to which they were in Justice and Conscience obliged to adhere, and though he was without Success in that Undertaking, he omitted not all Occasions to testify his Affections to his Majesty.

The War was not only prosecuted in those great Fights, but in all Parts of the World where the Trade of the two Nations was used, the Ships of each engaged one the other, and many sore Conflicts were made in several Places; but because the particular Description of these Encounters would swell this Treatise to too large a Bulk, we do omit the doing thereof.

This new Parliament (for so for Distinction we must call it) began to be so troublesome in their Consultation, that the whole Nation, and the most of those Army Officers that named them, grew wearier of them than those that were before removed; for they were so seraphical and notional in their Debates, that the whole Magistracy and Ministry was to be so modelled, as would make the Government ridiculous, but the Ministry and the Maintenance thereof by Tythes was that they most arraigned as an Antichristian Constitution; so that now all things succeeded to Cromwell's Expectation, and their Dissolution was earnestly pressed to save a threatened Confusion in Government, if they continued in Authority, and of this some among themselves were so sensible, that Rouse the Speaker on the 12th of December acquainted the House, that their sitting was no longer necessary, and being seconded by some others, privy to the Intention, he rose from the Chair, and went out of the House with the Mace before him, and with as many as would follow him (being the major Part of the Members) he came to Whitehall, and there resigned to Cromwell the Instrument by him formerly delivered to them at their first sitting, Harrison and some few staid in the House after the rest went, but were quickly dispersed by a Party of Soldiers sent to dissolve them.

The new Parliament dissolved.

About four Days after, the Officers of the Army had prepared an Instrument or System of Government, on which the Foundation of a new Dominion was to be erected, and they entreated Oliver Cromwell to accept of the Government under the Title of Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland: He at first seemingly refused the Dignity; but when the Exigence of Time and Necessity of Affairs were laid open to him, he did accept of it, and was that Day at One in the Afternoon install'd at Westminster in manner following.

The Protector install'd.

He came from Whitehall to the Chancery Court in Westminster-hall, attended by the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, the Barons of the Exchequer and Judges in their Robes, and after them the Council learned of the Commonwealth, and the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Recorder of London in their Scarlet Gowns; then came the Protector attended with many of the chief Officers of the Army; there was a Chair of State set in the Court, and the Protector stood by it, 'till the Instrument of Government was read; then the Oath was administered to him, which he took in the following Words:

I promise in the Presence of God, not to violate or infringe the Matters and Things contained in the Instrument, but to observe and cause the same to be observed; and in all things to the best of my Understanding, govern the Nation, according to the Laws, Statutes, and Customs thereof; and to seek their Peace, and cause Justice and Law to be equally administered.

Having subscribed this Oath and the Instrument, he sat in the Chair of State, and put on his Hat, and the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal delivered up the Seal to him, and the Lord Mayor his Sword and Cap of Maintenance, all which he respectively returned to them again; and then the Protector in the same manner as he came, returned to Whitehall.

The Heads of the Instrument of the Protector's Government, were

1. A Parliament to be called every three years.
2. The first to assemble on the 3d of September, 1654.
3. No Parliament to be dissolved 'till it have sat five Months.
4. Such Bills as are offered to the Protector by the Parliament, if he assent not in twenty Days, to be Laws without him.
5. That his Council shall not exceed the Number of one and twenty, nor be less than thirteen.
6. That immediately after the Death of the present, and succeeding Protectors, the Council shall chuse another before they rise.
7. No Protector after the Present, shall be General of the Army.
8. The Protector shall have Power to make War and Peace.
9. That in the Intervals of Parliament, the Protector and his Council may make some Laws that shall be binding to the Subject.

The States of the United Provinces were brought to so low Condition by the two last Fights, and their People so much dispirited, that a general Revolt was feared in the Provinces; nevertheless they put as good a Countenance as they could on their Condition, and chose the Heer Opdam to be Admiral of their Fleet in the Place of Trump, but thought it more adviseable to prosecute Overtures of Peace than venture another Battle; and certainly if the War had been continued, their Mariners were so baffled, they would very hardly have procured Men to furnish a Fleet, and one Battle more might have brought us a blank Paper for our own Conditions; but Cromwell was not so well settled in his Throne to hazard any thing, and therefore the Dutch Embassadors, Newport, Youngfall, Beverning, and Vander Perre, were well received by him; and in the Beginning of this Year they were so diligent in their Negotiation, that on the 5th of April the Articles of Peace were signed in London, and on the 26th of the same Month they were proclaimed in London and Amsterdam, and in this Peace the King of Denmark was included.

1654. The Protector concludes a Peace with the Dutch.

For the King of Denmark espousing the Interest of the States of Holland, had Arrested two and twenty English Ships which were in his Ports, and, at their Instance, confiscated the Merchant-dizes 1654 dizes therein; so that they were obliged to compose that Difference, and this was that which had more Difficulty than any other Matter in the Treaty.

The Spanish Embassadour was as early to congratulate the Protector's Authority, and Peace was made with the Queen of Sweden, and the Conde del Sa Lord Chamberlain of the Kingdom of Portugal came in a splendid Embassy to sue for a Peace of him: Nor were the French backward to own his Power, having given to Monsieur Bourdeaux, there Resident here, the Quality of Embassadour, to qualify him the better for his Negotiation. Cromwell being now owned by many of the Neighbour Princes and States abroad, and by most of those of his own Party at home, thought himself insecure from none but the Royalists, and to give them some Terror, by his Agents, formed a Plot to draw in some honest credulous Persons of that Party to their Destruction; and in Prosecution hereof in the Month of May, Colonel John Gerard, and his Brother Mr. Charles Gerard, Mr. Phillip Porter, Mr. Peter Vowel, and Mr. Sumerfet Fox, were apprehended for a pretended Intention to assassinate the Protector, and brought before a High Court of Justice erected for that Purpose, proclaimed on the 13th of June following, and sitting on the 31st; before whom they were tried for their Lives, and three of them, viz. Colonel John Gerard, Mr. Vowel, and Sumerfet Fox were condemned. The last of these was reprieved and pardoned upon his Confession of the Fact, and craving Mercy, but the other two were executed. Mr. Vowel was hanged at Charing-Cross, where, with an undaunted Spirit, tempered with a Christian Constancy and Patience, he gave up his Life. Colonel Gerard was beheaded on Tower-hill, and died with great Courage and Magnanimity. With him upon the same Scaffold suffered the Portugal Embassadour's Brother Don Pantalion Sa, who had a while before made a Riot in the New-Exchange, upon Conceit of some Affront offered there to him, and killed one Greenway, a Gentleman standing quietly at a Shop, no Opposition being made but by this Colonel Gerard, who was fatally joyned with him in Death. The Murder was committed by a Knight of Malta, who escaped; but this Gentleman and four more of the Embassadour's Servants being taken (one whereof was an Irish youth), they were arraigned in Westminster-hall before Judge Rolles and others, by a special Commission of Oyer and Terminer thereunto appointed; and the Portuguese were tried by a Jury of half English and half Strangers, and the Irish Boy by a Jury of English; they were all found guilty, but none suffered but the above mentioned Don Pantalion and the Irish youth, who was hanged at Tyburn.

Our King had remained in the Court of France, between two and three Years, with an Expectation sometimes flowing, and sometimes ebbing, of gaining at length some Opportunity to recover his Kingdoms; some Hopes he had of Assistance from several other Princes of the Empire, as the Dukes of Brandenburg, Lunenburgh, Brunswick, &c. as also the Emperor himself, to whom was sent in a decent and honourable Equipage the Lord Wilmot created Earl of Rochester, and his Address received with much Civility and Respect. Moreover, the Dutch seemed very inclinable to the owning and adopting his Interest in their War with England, and Prince Rupert was designed to have had the Command in his Majesty's Name, of a Squadron of their Ships; yet so little Speed was made in putting this Overture into Act, and so suddenly was the Peace made up between this Nation and them, that whatever they hoped for and expected from them, quickly vanished and came to nothing. His next and more probable Expectation was from the Success of those earnest Endeavours that were made by the Pope and other Princes, for a Reconciliation between the two Crowns of France and Spain, in which Affair he also interposed himself a most zealous Solicitor, as not doubting but that from the united Forces of two such powerful Monarchs, he should receive considerable Assistance: And Matters were once in a fair way to a peaceful Conclusion, had not the politick Reasons of State, as it was thought of Cardinal Mazarine, put a stop to this Grand Work; so that taking his Leave of the King of France (and the other great ones) from whom he received many Compliments and Apologies; he went, accompanied with his Brother the Duke of York, his Cousins, Prince Rupert and Prince Edward Palatine, to Chantillon, a House belonging to the Prince of Conde, where they stayed a while to determine how most commodiously each of them should dispose of themselves; the King, with Prince Rupert, resolved for Germany (the Earl of Rochester being at that time with the Emperour at Regensburgh, to solicit in his behalf); and the rather, because about that time a General Diet of the Estates of the Empire was to be held in that City: Prince Edward took his Journey to Bourbon, and the Duke of York remained in France 'till a good while after the Conclusion of the Peace with England, being Lieutenant General of the French King's Army, commanded in chief by Marshal Turenne: Prince Rupert parted from the King to go to Hildburgh, the chief Seat of his Brother Charles Prince Palatine, and thence to the Imperial Court at Vienna, and the King took his Journey by the way of Cambray and Liege to the Spaw, which he made his first place of Residence in Germany. Here his Sister the Princess Royal of Orange met him, and after a few Months stay in this Place, accompanied him to Colen, where they were received with great Honour and Magnificence: As they made their Entrance into the Town, the great and small Guns were discharged, and the Deputies of the City came in a solemn manner to compliment them. The Duke of Newburgh also entertained them very splendidly at his House at Dusseldorp, from whence the Princess of Orange returning into Holland, the King her Brother brought her onward of her way as far as Bedingen.

From the time we left Ireland in so declining a Condition, and so almost lost to his Majesty's Hopes, and the Lord Lieutenant's Endeavours, the most considerable Force that was left, was in Ulster, under the Leading of Emir Mac Mohon Bishop of Cloghar, who (Owen Roe O'neal being dead) succeeded him as General in those Parts, besides the united Forces of Clanrickard, Muskerry, and Castlehaven, and some few Parties that now and then sailed from their Fastnesses; these for 1654. a while gave a Check to the Republicans and Cromwell's Substitutes; till in the end the said Prelate being overthrown (even to the taking of his Person mortally wounded in the Fight) by Sir Charles Coot, and Colonel Fenwick; the Lord Muskerry by my Lord Broghil; the Marquess of Clanrickard, soon after a Defeat he received at Finagh, forced to lay down his Arms in the Isle of Carrick; the Remnant of the Ulster Forces commanded by the Lord Fenkillen, Col. O'Rely, and the Mac-Mahons, Relations of the aforesaid Bishop, yielding upon Articles; as likewise did Morroh O'Brian, having all of them stood it out to the last Extremity: The remaining Towns, Castles and Forts which held out, as Athlone, Galloway, Ballisbannon, Ballimore, the Isles of Arran and Enibuffen, and other Places were all constrained to surrender themselves to the Conqueror's Power; the Marquess of Ormond and the Lord Inchiquin, having in time provided for their Safeties, (when they saw things in a desperate Condition, and still growing worse and worse) by Embarquing for France, nothing was left but to dispossess and extirpate the vanquish'd, and take Possession in their room. Some they removed out of the World by an Itinerant High Court of Justice, which went in Circuit from one Place to another, the President whereof was one Justice Donellan an Irishman, and Cook (notorious for his officiating in another High Court) his Assistant. Others were sent out of the Land by the Articles of Transportation, which the Marquess of Clanrickard and others upon their laying down Arms had concluded with them; namely, to have free Liberty to go beyond Sea to serve the King of Spain, or some other foreign Prince in his Wars: Those Inheritors that remained and escaped the High Court, were transplanted to the Province of Connaught, so that there was a large extent of Territory left for the Adventurers and Purchasers of Irish Lands. The main Pretence of this foresaid Court which sat at Kilkenny, and thence removed to Waterford, Dublin, Ulster, and other Places, was for the Tryal of those that were judged guilty of the Irish Rebellion in 1641. The chief of Quality that suffered, (for there was a Number of less Note) where Col. Mac Hugh, Col. Tool, and Col. Walter Bagin, and who was of all the most eminent as in Quality, so in Crime (had he been judged by a lawful Authority) as having been one of the principal leading Men in that Insurrection, and likewise one of the chief Obstructors of the Union, endeavoured by the Lord Lieutenant to the Advantage of his Majesty's Service: Sir Philem Oneal, who being taken near Charlemount, tryed and condemned, was hanged and quartered near my Lord Carew's House, at the place where he had caused his Father to be murdered. Thus was Ireland become subjugated to the English Usurpation. And so likewise was Scotland thought to have been at this time, when on a sudden, a new Hostility springs up in the Highlands, headed by divers of the Scotch Nobility, who had the most powerful Influence in those Parts; the Earls of Glencarne, Athol, Seaforth, Kinoules, the Lord Kenmure, the Lairds Mac Renalds, and Mac Cloud, Colonel Montgomery, Sir Mungo Marry and Sir Arthur Forbs; these having each of them got together their several Parties, were endeavouring to unite into a Body, and so trusted to have been able with a Force not altogether contemptible to have taken the Field against the main Power of the English that were then in Scotland; and 'tis like enough they had speedily effected what they intended, had not the chief Body of them, amounting in all to about 4000 under Glencarne and Kenmure, been encountered on the sudden, ill arm'd, ill provided, and in Disorder, by Colonel Morgan at Cromar: Glencarne's Army in this Conflict being very much put to the Rout and dispersed, and himself missing but little of being taken, and the rest in little straggling Parties were many times met with to their Loos: Yet they were not for all this so out of Heart, but that they again made a shift in some sort to re-imbody, and that so much the more confidently, upon Expectation of Middleton's coming over with Supplies out of Holland; though upon his Arrival not long after with Commission to be General, Sir G. Monro, (who together with the Lord Napier, and Major General Dalziel, landed with Middleton at Uney-Ferry) having also Commission to be Lieutenant General: The Highland Levies instead of being reinforced by these additional Forces and Supplies, were rather weakened and overthrown by the Animosities of some of the Scotch Nobility, especially Glencarne stomaching the Preference of Middleton and Monro to the Command of the Army above him, thereupon departed in Discontent, and laid down his Arms. Upon the neck of which Breaches and Defections among them, General Monk is sent Commander in Chief into Scotland, and coming upon Middleton at Loughberry on the 20th of July, gave him an utter Defeat, and thereby put a Period to these Highland Agitations, and all further Attempts in Scotland, to the Disturbance of the then regnant Authority in England.

The Kirk of Scotland also her self at this time had the Wings of her religious Empire very much clipp'd, if not quite taken away by the Dissolution of her General Assembly, which was done by Col. Morgan, the foregoing Year at Aberdeen, where they were assembled, Mr. Andrew Cant and the rest of them in vain protesting against the Action: The like Disturbance they had afterwards at Edinburgh from Lieutenant Colonel Cottrel.

The Marquess of Argyle to keep up his Reputation with the Church of Scotland, seemed much troubled in his Mind at this Proceeding against the Assemblies, and interceded with the Protector for the Liberty of the Church, wherein he had very good Success: For Oliver considering that his declining the King's Interest, facilitated the total Subjection of Scotland to his Authority, was willing enough to oblige him; by seeming to do that at his Request, he determined to do before for the quieting of the Minds of the People; the Church of Scotland was therefore indulged with the Exercise of Religion, and a great Part of their Jurisdiction and Discipline: They were restrained in little more than the Power of keeping General Assemblies (their Presbyteries being permitted to convene) and the Rigour of Excommunication: For, whereas before Persons excommunicated were not excluded from the Communion of the Kirk, but had all their Estates confiscated till their Reconciliation. This latter Part was not now to be executed; but to please the Ministers for the 1654 the Restraint of their Power, the Maintainance of Scholars in the Universities of Scotland was increased, and many Privileges granted to them.

The Government and Security of the Kingdom of Ireland, was the next Care of the Protector. Major-General Lambert was formerly appointed for that Government, and had provided all his Equipage to go thither; but Cromwell was jealous, lest his Ambition should excite him to gain a Party there to establish himself against him; and therefore he artificially contrived to hinder him from going, upon Pretence of greater Advancement here, and he made him next to himself, Commander in Chief of all the Armies, with an Entertainment of ten Pounds a Day; this done, he constituted his own Son-in-Law Fleetwood to be Deputy of Ireland, assisted with six Counsellors, that is to say, Steel, who was after made Chancellor, Pepys one of the Barons of the Exchequer in England, appointed to be Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, Mr. Robert Goodwin of Suffex, Miles Corbet, and the Colonels Robert Hammond, and Matthew Thomlinson.

A Parliament called.

The Parliament dissolved.

Sir Henry Littleton, and others committed to the Tower.

The King was at Colen when he received the disconsolate News of the Disasters in Scotland and Ireland, supported chiefly by that brave and undaunted Fortitude, which never failed him in the greatest of his Adversity. The Princes of Germany were very kind to him, which made his Stay in those Parts the more agreeable; and to encrease his Comfort, he sent the Marquis of Ormond to Paris, to wait on his Brother the Duke of Gloucester to him, whom he more earnestly desired to have near him, lest his Youth might be prevailed upon by the Subtlety of Arguments, and Temptation of Riches and Promotion, to change his Religion; for the King was ever most zealous in the Profession of the Protestant Religion in himself and Family, and on all Occasions to promote it to his Power in others.

According to the late Instrument of Government, wherein it was articulated, That a Parliament should be called every three Years, and that the First should begin on the third of September, 1654. A Parliament was summoned by Oliver's Writs, chosen after the wonted manner of Election by the Peoples Voice, and assembled at Westminster at the prefixed time above mentioned, making Choice for their Speaker of William Lenthall, Speaker in the Long Parliament. Their beginning was somewhat bold, considering the Totteringness of their Estate; for at their first Sitting, they began to question the Lawfulness of the Power by which they were called, whereupon they were enjoined to sign a Recognition of the Government, as it was settled in a single Person and a Parliament, before they could be readmitted to their Seats in the House: This all of them that sign'd (for some refused) had Liberty again to take their Places; but so little did their Proceedings please his Protectorship, that they had scarcely sat full five Months (and so long they were to sit by one of the Articles of the Instrument) when he came and dissolved them.

A Day or two after which, were apprehended Major Wildman, with a Declaration proving the Lawfulness and Necessity of taking up Arms against Cromwell: And of the Royalists, Sir John Packington, Sir Henry Littleton, and some others, about a new Conspiracy, which Oliver told the Members of his Parliament at the time of his dismissing them, he knew to have been countenanced and abetted, if not in Part promoted, by some of them present, whom he could name. And the truth is, there was a Foundation laid (by a Combination of the most courageously affected toward their Prince's Service throughout the Kingdom, authorized by Commission from his Majesty) of a general Rising for him in every County; which had not so quickly and so easily been suppressed, had not Cromwell, sparing for no Cost to maintain his Instruments of Deceits; for he had his Spies ready hired, not only here, but in all Corners, such as counterfeiting themselves zealous Royalists, insinuated into their Councils, and betrayed them, (of which Number Sir Richard Willis at last became shrewdly suspected to be one) but even about the King's Person, as appeared by the Defection of one Manning, preferred in Consideration of his Father's Merits (his Father was Col. Manning, slain in his late Majesty's Service) to be one of the King's Secretary's Clerks, whom Colonel Samuel Tuke, forcing open his Chamber-Door, took in the very Acts of holding Correspondence with Thurloe, Oliver's Secretary, from whom having newly received a Pacquet, and setting himself busily in the returning of Answers, to prevent Discovery, he was hastily chewing Papers in his Mouth, just as the Colonel entered. Thus, for a long time, had he made it his weekly Practice to send Intelligence to the Usurper, of all that was transacted in the King's Court, and had a large Pension punctually assigned him for his Pains; till at length thus fortunately found out, he had the Reward of his Treachery paid him in a more deserved manner; being, by the King's Command, the whole Court beseeching his Majesty to make a publick Example of him, shot to Death in one of the Duke of Newburgh's Castles. This Combination, tho' it were probably to the very bottom discovered, before the apprehending of the above-named Persons; yet so far the Design, being generally laid, had taken Effect, that in several Counties some small armed Parties began to gather into a Body: In Shropshire and Wales some endeavoured to have taken Shrewsbury and Kirk-Castle by Surprise, but were both prevented; and of those that attempted Shrewsbury, Sir Thomas Harris, who was the Chief, was taken Prisoner, and sent to London.

Manning's Treachery, for which he is put to Death.

The Surprize of Shrewsbury endeavoured.

An Insurrection at Salisbury.

Upon Sunday the 11th of March, a Party for the King of about 200 entered Salisbury about Midnight, and having seized upon Hories, and taken away the Commissions of the Judges that were upon their Circuit, bended their Course towards Cornwall; of which Captain Unton Crook having timely Intelligence, pursued them with his own Troop, and at a Place called Southmolton in Devonshire, overtook them, and after four Hours sharp Conflict, tired as they were, and drowsy, and faint for want of Sustenance, drove them to a Necessity of yielding; yet Penruddock bravely stood it out, till Articles were granted for the Indemnity of him and his Company, which Crook is said to have afterwards perfidiously denied, and left them wholly over to the Courtesy of their Judges: Besides 50 common Prisoners, there were taken of the chief Leaders, three Captains, Penruddock, Jones, and Grove, only Sir Joseph Wagstaff 1654. Staff made a Shift to escape away. Other Rifings there were in Northumberland, and at the Forest of Sherwood in Yorkshire, where 500 Horse being met, and not finding the Country to come in as they expected, dispersed themselves, and returned to their Habitations. Also at Hexam- Moor in Yorkshire, there was a great Rendezvous of the Gentry of the Country, of whom Sir Hen- ry Slingsby was taken, and Sir Richard Maleverer with much ado escaped.

At Salisbury, Exeter, and Chard in Somerset- shire, many of the Western Rifers were tried by a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, and executed, and particularly at Exeter, Penruddock and Grove were beheaded; Captain Jones was reprieved.
Besides those who were put to death of the chief Leaders, many Prisons in the West were filled with a Number of the common sort of Prisoners, 'till within a little while after that they emptied themselves into Foreign Plantations.

And there happened about this time an Adventure which served very opportunely for the ridding of Prisons of their furcharging Numbers, and the employing of a Multitude of loose and vagrant People, there having been ever since the Peace with the Dutch, Preparations made for the equipping forth of a great and powerful Fleet, upon an Expedition which was kept very secret, and not made known even to those that went upon it, unless to the supreme Commanders, 'till the very last; only it was given out, that the Voyage would be very profitable, and to a Place where there was much Gold and store of Riches: In this Service we may well think there would not be wanting enough that would greedily engage themselves; hither all sorts of People flocked, especially those of low and bankrupt Fortunes, and upon hopes of enriching themselves, run headlong most of them to their Ruin; a Fate that commonly attends precipitate Ambition and Covetousness. This Navy setting sail from Portsmouth on the 27th of December, put in at Barbadoes on the 28th of January, Venables commanding the Land Forces, and Pen being General at Sea.

1655. This Year had been sufficiently memorable, if for nothing else, yet for the Death of that famous and learned Antiquary Mr. John Selden, whose Works are a Monument far more worthy his Memory, than that in the Inner-Temple Church.

The King of Spain was not ignorant that this great Preparation was designed to make some Impression on his Dominions in the West-Indies, and after having dispatched Expresses into those Parts to give them Warning thereof, he sent the Marquess of Leda (a Person of great Reputation in Arms) in a splendid Embassy to the Protector, to divert, or prevent the Prosecution of the Business:
He arrived at London the 22d of May, but had so cold Reception, and was so much discouraged in his Negotiation, that he quickly returned.

In the mean time the English Fleet set sail from Barbadoes the 30th of March, and steered its Course towards Hispaniola, one of the fairest and richest Islands belonging to the American Dominions of the King of Spain; so that it was by this time apparent enough which way this Expedition tended. And whereas it was admired by many, that at that time when no Hostility was declared between this Nation and the Kingdom of Spain, or any Defiance bid on either side, we should carry War into his Territories, 1655. without any Provocation by him first offered. It was alledged, That the Conditions of Peace extended not beyond the Line. This, tho' it served to stop the Mouths of some, yet it could not satisfy the Spaniard, who looked upon it as an absolute Breach: However it were, whether this Expedition were just or not, whether it were undertaken to a pious end, as was pretended, to curb the excessive Pride, and ambitious Usurpation of the Spaniard, and to bring Freedom and Purity of Religion to those Indians under his Yoke; or, as many are apt to believe, to partake with the Spaniard of some of his Indian Gold, (thinking it too much for one Potentate to in-gross so much Treasure to himself,) I shall not undertake to determine. This is most certain, That at the beginning of this Enterprize, it met with a very remarkable Check, (however the War with the Spaniard proved afterwards successful enough) for General Venables, when as he might have landed his Men within a very little of Santo Domingo, the principal Town and Fortrefs of the Island, and which was in a manner deserted by the Garrison Soldiers, upon Sight of the English Fleet; nevertheless, led by I know not what Policy and Interest of his own, and (it is more than suspected) over-rul'd by the Counsels of his Wife, let them a-shore ten Leagues West- ward of Domingo; whereupon the Spaniards gathered fresh Courage, and betook themselves again to the Defence of Santo Domingo, which they had abandoned. The English landing without Opposition, and seeing no Enemy near them, thought themselves safe enough, and were in their Minds absolute Lords of the Indies, sharing the golden Mines among them; when, contrary to their Expectation, the General causing it to be proclaimed at the Head of the Army, That none, upon Pain of Death, should plunder any Gold, Plate, or Jewels, or kill any Cattle: This sudden Frustration of their Hopes, and the Cli-mate's excessive Heat, proved the one such a damping to their Spirits, the other such a weakening to their Bodies, that by that time they had marched a most tedious and disconsolate March thro' thick Woods, in deep scalding Sands, ready to perish with miserable Drought and Thirst for want of Water, (of which they met not with a Drop in many Miles,) they were brought to such a Condition, that they needed not an Enemy to kill them, being already almost dead with Faintness, and Weakness; so that the Spa- niards, Negroes, and Molattoes falling upon them, kill'd, with little or no Resistance, 'till they were weary of killing; and those that could make a shift to fly away, found it a sufficient Atchieve-ment for that time, to bring themselves back again safe unto their Ships.

In this Conflict, Major-General Haines acted the Part of a very valiant Soldier, who being shamefully deserted by his own Men, and over-power'd by his Enemies, was slain stoutly fighting: There fell above six hundred in the Fight, besides what were cut off in straggling Parties, near as many more; and all this Execution was done by not above sixty of the Enemy. The Voyage, and of such Expectation altogether in

They possess themselves of Jamaica.

The first Adviser to this Undertaking, was one Gage a Minister (formerly a Romish Priest) who also undertook to be the chief Guide in this Expedition, as one who by his long time of Travel in those Parts (of which there is a handsome Relation of his Extant) was well acquainted with them; and there he ended his Days not long after his Arrival, reaping little Fruit of his Project.

General Blake's notable Attempt and Success before Tunis.

Whilst the Proceedings in the West-Indies were unprosperous, General Blake had better Fortune in the Streights, who coming with his Fleet before Tunis, and sending to the Governour thereof to demand Satisfaction for the Depredations committed by his People on the English, and to require the English Captives to be delivered to him, had a contemptuous Answer return'd, viz. Here are our Castles of Goletto and Porta Ferina well Mann'd, and furnished with Ordnance, do what you can, we fear you not. And at the same time they mann'd a Line all along the Shore, and planted Guns thereon: Whereupon (after a short Consultation with his Officers) Blake with his great Ships and their Seconds, came into the Bay of Porta Ferina, within Musquet-shot of the Castle and their Line, and fired with such Fury upon them (notwithstanding the frequent Discharges of sixty great Guns upon his Ships,) that in two Hours the Castle was made defenceless, and all their Guns dismounted, and the Stones clattered about their Ears; and finding Nine of their Ships in the Road, he caused them all to be fired with his Long-Boats, and in five Hours they were consumed. After this brisk Action, he sail'd to Algiers and Tripoly, with both which Places he made very advantageous Treaties, and then came again to Tunis, which he found, by this time, willing to submit to what he propos'd.

The Lord Willoughby of Parham, the Lord Newport and others committed to the Tower.

Notwithstanding the ill Success of the several late Endeavours for the King, for which so many suffered, it was not much above a Month, e'er the Earl of Lindsey, the Lord Willoughby of Parham, Newport, Maynard, Faulkland, Lucas Petre, Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Sir Geoffery Palmer, Sir Richard Wingfield, with divers others, were committed to the Tower, upon Suspicion of pretended High Treason against Cromwell; which yet, went no further than bare Suspicion; for they were never brought to a publick Trial.

Major Sedgewick, and Col. Humphrys sent with a Supply to Jamaica.

About the beginning of July, Major Sedgewick went with a Squadron of twelve Ships, among which was Colonel Humphrys with a Regiment for the Supply of those in Jamaica; from whence, in the following Month of August, General Penne returned for England, with a Part of the Fleet, the greatest Part yet staying behind: And not long after him came over General Venables, leaving in their stead Colonel Fortescue to command the Land Forces, Vice-Admiral Goodson, the Navy. Venables not long after his Arrival, was for his ill Management of Affairs in 1655. Hispaniola sent to the Tower; from whence, being judg'd to have fail'd rather through rash Imprudence, than any sinister Intention, he was at length released.

The Duke of Gloucester willingly obeying the Order of the King his Brother, was come away with the Marquis of Ormond from Paris, and having stay'd for some time with his Sister the Princess Royal at the Hague, was at last accompanied by her to the King her Brother at Colen, where she herself also staid with them 'till after the Fair at Frankfort; to which Place, they all of them together made a Progress of State and Pleasure, attended by the Marquis of Ormond, the Earl of Norwich, the Lord Newburgh, the Lady Stanhope, and Monsieur Hemfleet her Husband: They went by Coach a little beyond Bonne the Archbishop's Electoral Seat; the rest of the Journey they went by Water. Through every Prince's Country which they pass'd, they had the chief Officers of State sent to Compliment them, and were saluted by the great Guns from all their Towns and Castles, more especially the Prince Elector of Mentz sent his Grand Marshal to invite them to his Court: Whereupon the Lord Newburgh was sent back with the Grand Marshal, to desire the Elector to excuse them at present, promising to wait upon him at their Return. Being arrived at Frankfort, and hearing that Queen Christina of Sweden was coming that way in her Journey into Italy, the King sent one of his Lords to her, expressing his Desire to wait upon her, at whatever Place her Majesty should be pleas'd to nominate; the Place then appointed for this Interview was Coningstein, a Village near Frankfort, in the Electorate of Mentz, where he had first particular Discourse with her himself for half an Hour, which past with many Compliments and Ceremonies of Civility; next the Duke of Gloucester was admitted, and then the Lords that attended the King. As these Princes came back from Frankfort, the Elector of Mentz, renewing his Civilities, provided all manner of Accommodation for them, as they pass'd thro' his Territories; and meeting them himself a great Part of the way, he brought them to one of his Palaces, where he entertained them in a very sumptuous and splendid manner, for the Space of two or three Days, after which they returned to Colen; four Burgomasters being appointed by the Magistrates of the City to wait upon them, and welcome them home.

An Army having been sent under the Marquis of Pianella, and the Earl of Quince Commander of the French Forces in Italy, by Charles Emanuel Duke of Savoy, against his Protestant Subjects in the Vallies of Piedmont, upon Occasion of some high Displeasure taken against them, and the Soldiers, left to their own unbridled Licence, having committed many cruel Outrages and Massacres upon the poor miserable People; Cromwell taking this Opportunity to ingratiate himself with the Protestants abroad, (affecting to be thought the chief Patron and Protector of those of the Reformation in all Parts) concern'd and bestir'd himself very vigorously for their Relief: He appointed a solemn Day of Humiliation to be kept, and caused a large Contribution to be gathered for them throughout the Nation, and 1655. and sent his Agents abroad to mediate for them; Mr. Pell to the Protestant Cantons of the Switzers, Mr. Samuel Moreland, and Mr. George Downing to Turin to the Duke of Savoy; but his Message being slighted by him, he took another Course to deal with him, namely, by the Mediation of the King of France, his now great Ally; by whose Power and Authority with that Duke, a Pacification was shortly concluded: Though of the large Collection that was made, so scanty a Share came to them, (for some they had) that it may be very well suspected, whether Self-Charity for the getting of Money, were not as well aim'd at, as Charity ad extra, for the bestowing it.

However it fared with the Protestants abroad, these at home, viz. the Royalists, because they would not become Oliver's obedient Subjects, are not only not saved from Persecution, but persecuted themselves; while, besides other Displeasures both toward the Clergy who were prohibited from teaching School, and from having any Benefices, or officiating as Chaplains; and toward the Laity, who were by Proclamation confin'd (such as had ever been in Arms) not to come within twenty Miles of London, and disabled from electing or being elected in Parliament, there comes out a two-handed Invention of Cromwell, which serv'd him at the same time to acquire Money to his own Coffers, and to bring them low in their Estates and Power: This was an Order for the Decimation, or tenth Part of the Estates of all such as ever had been in Arms either for his late or present Majesty. For the better executing this Project of Decimation, (under Colour of securing the Peace of the Commonwealth) for which Orders were set forth toward the latter end of October by Oliver and his Council, is set up the Office of Major-Generals Civil, in the Nature of Præfects or Governours of Provinces, to curb, watch, and keep in awe the Royalists, and if it were possible, to pull down their high Stomachs; they were 11 in Number, namely, Kelsey, Goff, Desborough, Fleetwood, Skip-ton, Whaley, Butler, Berry, Worsley, Lambert, and Barkstead; which last was also Lieutenant of the Tower, each of them having his several Counties allotted to his Government in the Nature of Provinces: In which their Principalities they reigned like so many petty Kings, domineering over the Gentry and Nobility, till Cromwell either thinking to do a special Act of Grace by taking off his Mastiffs, or jealous of what their Power in time might come to, easily gives way to his next Parliament, to unhorse those whom he himself had so lately mounted.

A Debate held at Whitehall about the Admission of the Jews.

Upon the tendering of certain Proposals to the Protector by Manasseh Ben Israel, a Jewish Merchant, in the Behalf of his Hebrew Nation, for their free Admission to Trade and Exercise of their Religion in England, a Conference was held about it several Days at Whitehall, by the Members of the Council, and certain Divines of the most Eminent then in Esteem: And many Arguments being urged, some for, others against their Admission, those against it so far prevail'd, that the Proposals took no Effect.

The Spanish King thinking it in vain to hope for a Conservation of the League on this side the Line, from those whom he judged to have so apparently broke it on the other side, by invading his Island of Hispaniola, began not obscurely to make Preparations for War; and to shew that he had entertained Thoughts of Hostility, a general Embargo was made in Spain of all English Merchants Goods, and many of their Persons secured. Hereupon the like was done in England, and there suddenly followed on both sides a Denunciation of open War, which by the Spaniard was not long after solemnly proclaimed at Dunkirk.

1655. An Embargo upon the Goods of English Merchants in Spain. Open War with England proclaimed by the Spaniard at Dunkirk.

The Dissolution of the Peace with Spain, was the Product of a Peace with France; for there having been long since an Address made to that End from France to the State of England: No sooner did the Breach begin between England and Spain, but the French King sends to Monsieur Bourdeaux his Ambassador here, to press his Embassy; which he did with so good Success, that in a short while after the Articles of Peace between Us and France were concluded, ratified by both Parties, and on the 28th of November the Peace was proclaimed at London, and at Paris much about the same time.

Articles of Peace between England and France ratified and proclaimed.

Whereupon soon after Cromwell not to be behind-hand in State, and to provide for the diligent Management of all Matters concluded in this Treaty, sends over in the Quality of his Ambassador Extraordinary to the French King, Colonel Lockhart, sometime one of the Itinerant Judges in Scotland, and now advanced to this Dignity by the Marriage of a Niece of his pretended Highness. And at the same time there was a strict League of Amity between him and Carolus Gustavus the then King of Sweden, and Embassies of Friendly Correspondence were on each side interchanged; from hence went Mr. Rolt, one of Oliver's Bed-Chamber as Envoy, and from thence arrived here the Lord Christian Bond, who was entertained with more than ordinary Respect; for of all Amities that were between Cromwell and Foreign Princes and States, his most particular and intimate seems to have been with the Swedish King, whom a while after he under-hand aided with Men in his War against the Dane, while at the same he made shew of endeavouring an Accommodation between those two Kings.

One principal Condition of the Treaty with France, was the Exclusion of the King and all his Relations and Adherents out of the King of France's Dominions; but he upon Foresight of what this Treaty would come to, had long since betaken himself to Germany, and there remained (for the most Part at Colen, as hath been already mentioned) until such time as the Spaniard invited him into Flanders. His Brother the Duke of York, notwithstanding the great Command he had in the King of France's Army (the nearest Ties and Relations little avail, when Self-Interest comes in Place) was by the same Reason of State advertised to depart that Kingdom with all his Retinue by a prefixed time, not without some Compliments and Apologies for his Dismissal: Also his Departure was respited for some Space, in which he was visited, and honourably treated by

The Death and Burial of the Archbishop of Armagh.

The Close of this Year puts on Mourning in like manner as the last: The last Year ended with the learned Selden; this, with that most Pious and Reverend Prelate, James Usher, Archbishop of Armagh, and once Primate of Ireland, whose judicious Writings are sufficiently famous in the Commonwealth of Learning throughout Christendom: His Burial, though he died on the one and twentieth of March, was deferred 1656. till the seventeenth of April, and then performed with all decent Pomp, and by most of the Nobility in London, attended to Westminster-Abbey, where his Funeral Oration was delivered by the Almoner to Cromwell (for so Dr. Bernard, once Preacher to the Society of Gray's Inn, was then entitled). Moreover, Cromwell himself defrayed all things befitting his Interment, bestowing 200 l. toward the solemnizing thereof. Yet were his Coffers not so well furnished as he desired: And therefore notwithstanding his no Success in his last Parliament, he finds a Necessity of calling one again, whereupon he sends forth Writs in July for the summoning of another Parliament on the seventeenth of September.

A Parliament summoned again.

Gen. Blake and Gen. Montague's Victory over the Spanish Fleet near Cadiz.

In the mean while, a Part of the English Navy, namely, the Rear-Admiral and six other Ships under Captain Richard Stayer, set upon a Fleet of eight Spaniards, within four Leagues of the Bay of Cadiz; the Admiral's Ship in which was General Don Marco Del Porto, with six hundred thousand Pieces of Eight, run a-shore in the Bay; the Vice-Admiral, a Galloon, commanded by Don Francisco de Esquevel, and having in her 120000 Pieces of Eight, and another Ship commanded by Don Rodriques Calderon were taken, and afterwards fired, (one wilfully by the Spaniards in it, the other by Accident); two others were taken and kept in Possession, the Rear-Admiral a Galloon, commanded by Don Francisco del Hago, and having in her two Millions of Plate, another Ship commanded by John de la Torre, very richly laden; another Man of War of some Value, with a Portugal Prize, and a small Vessel of Advice from the Vice-Roy of Mexico, escaped to Gibraltar. In the Vice-Admiral, which was set on fire by the Spaniards themselves, to prevent being taken Prisoners, was the Marquis of Bayden with his whole Family: There perished in this Combustion (besides a Number of less Note) the Marquis himself, with his Wife and his eldest Daughter, who was going into Spain to be married to the Duke of Medina Celi: There were saved from this Fire, the Marquis's eldest Son Don Francisco de Lopez, a younger Son Don Joseph de Suenega, and two Daughters, Donna Josepha, and Catalina, with about Ninety others. In the Rear-Admiral was also taken Prisoner Don Diego de Villa Alba, Governour of the Havana. It was related by the young Marquis Francisco de Lopez, who with his Brother and Sisters was brought up to London, and there for a while detained Prisoners, that the Cities of Lima and Callao in Peru, were about five Months before destroyed by an Earthquake and Fire raining from Heaven, in which Ruin there perished above eleven thousand Spaniards, but of Indians not above an hundred: Also, that the Mountains of Potosi being laid level, the Gold and Silver Mines where thereby utterly destroyed. This Enterprize near Cadiz purchased no less Profit than Honour to the Performers thereof, and to the Chief in Power. As for the Spanish young Nobles that were taken, the Protector, to give him his Due, dealt very nobly by them, and after no very long time of Detention, dismissed them home without any Ransom.

A sad and wonderful Accident at Peru.

On the seventeenth of September (the time appointed) a Parliament assembled at Westminster, and chose for their Speaker Sir Thomas Widdrington; none were to be admitted in this Convention, by the Instrument of Government, but such as after their Elections should be approved of, and allowed by the Council, and there were many discontented Persons chosen, of those that were dismissed at the last Dissolution of what remained of the Long-Parliament, and others of the Fifth Monarchy Principle, that the Protector thought it not safe to admit into the House, till some Laws should be passed for the better strengthening of his Authority, so that till the 26th of June the Proceeding went on smoothly enough, and on that Day the Parliament adjourned itself to the 20th of January following, and passed some Acts, the Principal whereof were;

The Parliament assembled.

An Act for renouncing and disannulling the Title of Charles Stuart unto the Nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

An Act for the securing of his Highness the Lord Protector's Person, and the Continuance of the Nation in Security and Peace.

A Vote to assist his Highness in his War against the Spaniard, which they declare to have been undertaken upon just Ground.

An Act for preventing the Multiplicity of Buildings within ten Miles of London; the Substance of which was, That for every House built from such a Time within that Compass, upon a new Foundation, there should be paid a Year's Rent to the Protector.

The humble Petition and Advice, was a Model of Government, with which they several times waited upon the Protector at Whitehall, to desire him to take the chief Government of the Nations upon him, with the Title of KING; of which, the Power he already had, the Name only he wanted. This Offer was brought to an open Conference, but it was first for a long time together gently and tenderly touch'd upon, as spring-

1656. ing from a Motion suddenly started by some of the Protector's Friends; when as sure enough they did but work after the Copy secretly prescribed them, and as they had private Encouragement and Instructions from the Person they seemed to Court. As often as the Members made their Addresses to him with this humble Petition and Advice, he still desired further time of Deliberation, before he could positively determine in a Matter of so great Weight and Concernment; till at length being requested to give his final Answer, he returned (after he had several times sifted his Officers, to see how they stood affected, and found them so averse, that he thought it not safe to venture) That he could not take upon him the Government with that Title. Thus openly refusing (in regard Matters were not brought to sufficient Maturity) what it was generally more than believed, he had mainly pursued.

Sindercomb and others Plot against the Protector's life

It needs must be thought high time for Cromwell's Convention to make Acts for the Security of his Body, since there was now more Noise than ever of a most desperate Plot against it. The Criminals said to be of this Plot, were Miles Sindercomb, a cashier'd and dissatisfied Army-man, Toop, one of Cromwell's Life-Guard, Cecil and Bois, (the last of whom was a Priest belonging to Don Alonso de Cardenas) (once Lieger Embassadour here from Spain) and by him instructed, as it was given out, to hire and set those other his Agents at work, comes off himself with a Non est inventus: Cecil and Toop pleaded they were drawn in by Sindercomb; he, on the other side, that he was trapann'd by them. Of the several Ambushes in this Plot, thus runs the Story: At Hammer-smith, a House is hired on Purpose, for placing of an Engine called a Blunderbuss, to shoot him as he goes to Hampton-Court; at Hide Park Corner also he is waited for, as he goes to take the Air; as likewise at another House in Westminster, by which he was to go to the Parliament House. Lastly, when these took no Effect, the next Design was to set Whitehall on Fire, by placing a Basket of combustible Matter in the Chappel, with a Train laid to have taken Fire at a prefix'd time; which also some way or other happens to be discovered and prevented. In Conclusion, he of the Life-Guard discovers all, and both he and Cecil have their Pardons, he for his Discovery, and Cecil for his free Confession, and the Sorrow he expressed. Sindercomb boldly and sturdily standing it out, and denying all at the Court commonly called the Upper-Bench, before Cromwell's Attorney General, was nevertheless cast by the Witnesses of his two fellow Conspirators who left him in the Lurch, and was sentenced to be hanged, drawn and quartered at Tyburn; in the mean time being kept close Prisoner in the Tower. That very Morning he was to have been executed, he was found dead in the Chamber, being reported to have snuff'd up into his Head a certain poysonous Powder to avert the Shame and Misery of the Execution that was preparing for him, though it was whisper'd as if his poysoning had been the Design of some others: However, as a Felo de se, he was dragged at a Horfes Tail with his Heels forward, to Tower-hill, and turned naked into an Hole under the Scaffold, with a Stake spiked with Iron, driven through his Body into the Earth. 1656.

Memorable also was the Tryal (happening a little before this Discovery) of one James Naylour, the great Champion and Ringleader of the Sect called Quakers, who having spread his Doctrine, and gained many Profelytes to it in divers Parts of the Nation, was more especially taken Notice of at Bristol, and from thence was brought up to London, attended by several Men and Women of his Opinion, who, all the way they came (the Women especially) are said to have sung Hosanna's, and to have used the same kind of Expressions toward him, as antiently the People of the Jews did to our Saviour, when he rode triumphant into Jerusalem. The Parliament took it upon them to judge him themselves, before whom being convened, he was charged of Blasphemy, for assuming to himself Divine Honours, and such Attributes as were due unto Christ only. After he had used many cunning Sophisms and Evasions to clear himself, such as argued him not altogether ignorant of human Letters, he was nevertheless sentenced by the House to be (first at London) publickly whip'd, pilloried, and stigmatized, as a Blasphemer, then to be conveyed to Bristol, there to be also whip'd; lastly, to be brought back to London, to remain in Bridewell during Pleasure: Which Sentence was punctually inflicted upon him. His Sentence.

The King now in Flanders having his Residence for the most Part at Bruges, had, upon Hopes of the good Success of those his Subjects of England, who now began again busily to stir for him in all Parts of the Nation, embodied together several Regiments, consisting of such English, Scotch, and Irish, as he recalled out of the Service of the French King, and those that came in to him from other Parts, whose Colonels were the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Rocheester, the Lords Wentworth and Gerard, and Lieutenant General Middleton: These Forces he kept quartered upon the Sea Coast, to have been in Readiness, if Occasion were, to have seconded those in England; Monsieur Marfin, an expert Soldier, formerly Lieutenant General to the Prince of Conde, being designed to have conducted this Army; but the Counsels of his Friends that acted for him in England, being from time to time betrayed, and His Majesty not being in a Capacity to keep his Men in continual Pay, he took the Opportunity, since he could not make Use of them himself, to gratify a Power that had oblig'd him, and which stood in Need of resolute Men, and thereupon consigned them to the Service of the King of Spain. The King keeps an Army in Flanders.

In vain did Cromwell think to be acknowledged the Protector of the three Nations, since all the several Interests therein, how contrary soever among themselves, attempted at one time or other, to shake off the Yoke of his Protection: Yet as much in vain did both, all that already, and those that at present attempted to strive, Oliver being still too cunning and too quick for them all; for on the 19th of April 1657. at a certain House in Shoreditch, were apprehended a discontented Party, formerly in the Army, that went under the Name of of Fifth-Monarchy Men, such as taking upon them to be the Champions of Christ's Monarchy on Earth, renounced all Monarchy beside; the chief of whom were Tho. Venner, a Wine Cooper predicant (whom we shall have Occasion to take more Notice of hereafter) Ashton, Hopkins, Gowler, and Gray their Scribe. They had appointed to rendezvouze that Night at Mile-end-Green, and thence to have marched into some other Counties to joyn with others of their Party, that were ready to shew themselves upon the first Opportunity: There was taken with them, besides a great Quantity of Arms, and certain printed Papers (that were to be dispersed) a Standard with a Lion couchant, Gules in a Field Argent, and having this Motto, Who shall rouse him? There were also taken into Custody Major General Harrison, Captain Lawson late Vice Admiral, Colonel Rich, and Major Danvers; whereof the first was committed to the Serjeant at Arms, and the rest to other Prisons.

The Spaniards were very much distressed in all Parts by the War with the Protector, and on the 20th of April so gallant an Action was performed by General Blake in Part of their Dominion, that the like hath scarce been mentioned in Story.

The General lying with some Ships near Cadiz to watch for the Return of the Spanish Plate-Fleet, had Intelligence that they had put into the Bay of Santa Cruz in the Island of Teneriff, here-upon he weighed Anchor on the 13th of April, and on the 20th rode with his Ships off the Offing at Santa Cruz, where he discerned the Spanish Fleet to the Number of 16, barricadoed in the Bay, in a semicircular Manner. Near to the Mouth of the Haven a Castle is placed, which was then well fortified with great Ordnance, and besides that, there were 7 Forts round about the Bay, with 6, 4, and 3 great Guns on each, all united by a Line of Communication from Fort to Fort, and well lined with Musqueteers; and Don Diego Diaques, the Spanish General of the Fleet, upon sight of Blake's Fleet, caused all the smaller Ships to be moored close to the Shore, and set six great Gallies well manned further out at Anchor, with their Broad-sides at Sea.

Blake having well consider'd this Posture of the Enemy, sent Captain Stayner Commander of the Speaker Frigate with a Squadron into the Bay, who by Eight the next Morning fell pell-mell on the Spanish Ships, but Blake, who would have his Share of the Toil and Glory of so brave an Enterprize, immediately seconded Stayner, and placed some Ships to pour their Broad-sides into the Castles and Forts, whilst he with Stayner, fought the Spanish Fleet (which was not inferior in Number to the English, and much better manned) and by two in the Afternoon they gained an entire Victory; but the General perceiving he could not bring off the Ships, set them all on Fire, but one that was sunk; and when this Service was performed, the Wind even to Wonder, which before blew strong into the Bay, suddenly veered about to South West, which brought our Ships safe out to Sea.

The News of this Success of Blake was so grateful to the Protector and the Parliament, that they ordered him a Jewel of five hundred Pounds, and an hundred Pounds was given to the Messengers that brought the Letters, and proportionable Gratuities and Thanks to most of the Officers and Mariners.

According to the Conditions of Agreement between England and France, the French King demanded Auxiliary Forces from England to help him in his War against the Spaniard in Flanders, which was readily granted by the Protector, and 6000 Foot forthwith ordered to be sent over, commanded in Chief by Sir John Reynolds, one of Cromwell's Knights, a Man of good Courage and Resolution, once Commissary General in Ireland. No sooner were these Forces arrived in France, but the French, by their help, took two very advantageous Places, Montmedi and St. Venant; nor was it long after e'er they took the strong Fort of Mardyke, being of notable Consequence toward the speedy gaining of Dunkirk. This Fort was immediately after it was taken, consigned by the French into the sole Possession of Major General Morgan and the English, who presently fell to fortifying of it, and in a short while made it so impregnable, that when the Spaniard was sensible how much it imported to the keeping of Dunkirk, to regain this Fort, sent a strong Power of Men (among whom were 2000 Scotch and Irish Reformadoes, assigned by our King to that Service, and commanded by his Brother the Duke of York) to set upon its Recovery by a desperate Storm; they were, after a very gallant and resolute Effort upon the Place, which continued for the Space of six hours, repelled in the End, with the loss of many Men.

After Cromwell had given his final Answer to his Parliament, that he could not take upon him the Government with the Title of King, it was resolved on, that the Title of Lord Protector should be continued and inserted in the Humble Petition and Advice, by which Title he was solemnly invested (with much more Ceremony than before) on the 26th of June, before a great Assembly of People in Westminster-hall, where a Fabrick was erected for that Purpose, and a Chair of State placed for the Lord Protector, whose Installment wanted but little of a Regal Manner; and tho' he attained not the Crown, yet he had the Scepter; for there were four Emblems of Government presented unto him by Sir Thomas Widdrington the Speaker (who at the Delivery of them made an Oration to him, in which he amply descanted upon each of them) a Purple Velvet Robe lined with Ermines, wherewith he was vested by the Earl of Warwick; Commissioner Whitlock presented a large Bible with Bosses and Clasps richly gilt, and a Scepter of Gold, and a Sword, which the Speaker girt about him. Thus attired, while he sat in his Chair under a Canopy of State, holding the Scepter in his Hand, the Herald standing aloft, made a signal Trumpet to sound thrice; after which he was proclaimed Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, and Scotland, and Ireland, and then returned to Whitehall in State, having 1658. having the Sword carried before him by the Earl of Warwick. He was likewise proclaimed not only in London, and other Parts of England, but also in the chief Cities of Scotland and Ireland. And now he began to take the King upon him in his manner of Living, and to govern after a more Monarchical Manner, and to model his Family according to the Fashion of a King's Court; to which end he had his Yeomen of his Guard in their Livery of Gray Cloth, with Welts of black Velvet, of whom Walter Strickland was Captain; his Lord Chamberlain was Sir Gilbert Pickering; the Lord Keeper of the Seal Nathaniel Fiennes; Lambert was Warden of the Cinque-Ports, Glyn Lord Chief Justice of England, and Steel (formerly Recorder of England) Lord Chief Baron. Moreover, being thus confirmed Protector by Authority of his Parliament, and having fortified himself by Alliances abroad (for besides the Leagues with France, Sweden, the United States, and fair Correspondence with Denmark, he had also upon the coming of Don Francisco de Mello Embassadour, concluded a firm Peace with Portugal) he began to make it his next Care, for the better establishing of himself, and strengthening of his Interest at home, to advance his nearest Friends and Relations, and to match his Children into the noblest Families: His eldest Son Richard he called out of the Country, to inure him to a Court Life, and an Insight into publick Affairs, designing him for Succession in the Protectorate, which the University of Oxford prudently foreseeing (as the Learned were never found backward in complying with the Times, and courting the Rising Sun) sent their Agents and Proctors to him to elect him their Chancellour, in which Honour he was solemnly installed at Whitehall: His second Son Henry, he made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of his Son-in-Law Fleetwood, whom he recalled from thence, wanting, as he said, his Prefence and Council. His two youngest Daughters he matched, Frances the younger to Mr. Robert Rich, Grandchild to the then Earl of Warwick, and Mary the elder to the Lord Falconbridge: The Nuptials for them both being kept with much festivity and splendor, both at Whitehall and Hampton-Court, and the Ladies are so vertuous they deserved a better Father.

Sir John Reynolds and his Company cast away upon Goodwin Sands.

Scarce was the Mirth of these Solemnities over, when, to allay the Triumphs for the several successes of the English in Flanders, there arrived the News of the Loss of Sir John Reynolds, General of the Forces in those Parts, who with Colonel White, and some others, imbarquing for England, by the way of Goodwin-Sands, in a small Vessel, at a tempestuous Season, contrary to the Persuasions of many, was cast away with his whole Company. But here was something more than ordinary in this hasty coming over of Reynolds and White, both seeming to prevent the Arrival of each other; for whether Reynolds was sent for by Cromwell, or suspected the Intention of White to be some Impeachment against him; his Business probably was to defend himself, in Reference to an Imputation of holding Correspondence with the Royalists, because he was prevailed with by the Duke of York, who always loved stout Men, to give him a Meeting between Dunkirk and Mardyke, at which Parley, Reynolds was indeed not backward to render his Highness those Honours and Civilities which were due to a Person of his illustrious Quality. Not many Months before, there died at Sea, as he was entering into the Sound of Plymouth, that valiant and expert Seaman General Robert Blake, not long surviving his notable Exploit at Santa Cruz; the best Elogium that can be given of him, is the true Rehearsal of his Actions; than which, saying that it was his Misfortune to serve an illegal Power, never were any performed at Sea more conducing to the Glory of our English Nation. Also Vice Admiral Badily ended his Life on Land, whither he was come for the Recovery of his Health: And at Jamaica there died Lieutenant General Brain, Commander in Chief of the Forces there.

The Death of General Blake, Vice Admiral Badily, and Lieutenant Gen. Brain.

Colonel Sexby, one that was a Prisoner in the Tower, upon some Design against Cromwell, on a Commonwealth account, died about this Time, and his Death was not without suspicion of Poyson: He was a virulent Enemy to the late King, and all the Royal Line, and suspected to have acted the horrid Murder on him, by cutting off his Head, or assisting therein with a Vizer; for upon that Action he was promoted from a private Trooper to the Command of a Regiment.

Col. Sexby dies in the Tower.

The last Convention having adjourned on the 26th of June, met again on the 20th of January following; and in this Session, which differed from the other, as much as one distinct Parliament could possibly have done from another, two very observable things are to be taken Notice of, which gave more Disturbance to Cromwell's Ambition and Safety, than he with all his Policy and Foresight was aware of. The first was the Admission of those Members which in the last Session were kept out with a high Hand, whom since the Injustice of the Act did not restrain from excluding the time before, the Consideration of his Interest urged him now no less, but rather the more to have excluded them this time also; but he was obliged to the contrary by his Friends (if at least they were his Friends) of the last Convention, who made it one of their Articles in their Humble Petition and Advice, That those Persons who are legally chosen by a free Election of the People to serve in Parliament, may not be excluded from doing their Duties, but by consent of that House whereof they are Members. The other was the erecting of a new Convocation, intended (in Imitation of the old Constitution) for a House of Lords, but they would not venture at first to call it by any other Name than that of the Other House: It consisted partly of such as he took for his especial Favourites, Officers of the Army and others; many of which were pick'd out of the House of Commons to be constellated in the Other House, partly of several of the late excluded Commonwealth Men, and such likewise of the Army whom he thought hereby to draw off to his own Party, and about half a score of the old Nobility were nominated, but refused to come. Now in this Contrivance of his, whatever his Expectation of it was, he found himself very much deceived, since by this strong Inundation of the late excluded, cluded, and the Translation of several of his Friends of the Commons into his other House, his Interest there was so weakened, that his translating also of a few of his Opponents (if he thought to make a Counterpoise that way) availed him little; for Sir Arthur Haslerig, and the rest of the Sticklers, both disdaining to accept of Cromwell's offered Baronage; and that by the Addition of their own Presence they might strengthen their own Party the more, took their Places in the House of Commons, by which means the Commonwealth-Faction grew so potent, and flew so high, that the other House was not so much as taken notice of, except in way of Derision and Contempt: So far were they from being concurr'd with, or owned in any of their Messages. Moreover, they began to call in question what was done in the last Session, as being invalid without their assent: So that the Humble Petition and Advice, which but lately made such a Noise, was like in a Moment to come to nothing. This so incensed the Protector, that in a great Heat and Passion he goes from his Council; and notwithstanding the earnest Dissuasion of some of the chief of them, takes a Hackney Coach for haste, and being come into his other (or Lords) House, sends for the House of Commons up to him; and after a long and warm Speech, declared the Parliament dissolv'd.

Thus was he driven from one Inconvenience to an other, from the Inconvenience of a Parliament that crost him, to the Inconvenience of no Parliament at all, whereby he was much streightened for want of those Supplies of Money which he expected.

Toward the latter End of this Year died the Protector's Son-in-Law Mr. Robert Rich, and was but little above two Months survived by his Grandfather the Earl of Warwick himself.

The Spaniards dispersed by the English in Jamaica.

The following Year 1658. begins with the News of a Victory at Jamaica, (which came by an Express from the Governour on the 8th of April) obtain'd by a Party of the English there, commanded by Major Richard Stephens, against five hundred Spaniards, who, under Don Christopher Arnaldo Saffer, having lately landed in that Island, and begun to fortify themselves at a Place called St. Anne, were fiercely set upon by the English, and forced to fly into the Woods and Mountains; and another Body of Spaniards, consisting of three hundred, who had fortified themselves at Chareras, in the North of the Island, were by the Governour himself, Colonel Doiley, driven quite out of their hold, Don Francisco de Prencia, the Maestro del Campo, with others taken, many kill'd, and the rest utterly dispersed.

The Attempts of the Royal Party in behalf of His Majesty betrayed and discovered to the Protector.

Cromwell had no sooner freed himself of the Danger threatened him from his Parliament, but he is presently alarmed again by his old Enemy the Royalist, whom yet he had still the Fortune to prevent by his Intelligence; however he took all Advantages to provide still more and more for his Security, by making the most of all Plots and Designs whatsoever; and to this purpose he sends in all haste for the Lord Mayor (Ireton was then the Man) and Aldermen of the City, acquaints them with what he had discovered of the busy Actings against the Peace of the Commonwealth, aggravates the Danger, recommends to them the settling of the Militia in trusty Hands, causeth the Guards to be doubled, and strict Watch to be kept in all parts of the City, when as most of the principal suspected Persons were already secured, as Sir William Compton, Brother to the Earl of Northampton, Sir William Clayton, Mr. John Russel, Brother to the Earl of Bedford, and many more: The whole Design being beforehand betrayed, by a Person formerly mentioned upon the same Account, and one Corcar, a Minister of Bourn in Essex, and such others as had been long employed by Cromwell for the same purpose: The Marquess of Ormond, who indeed was the chief Manager of this intended general Rising for his Majesty's Service throughout the whole Nation, and had to that End remain'd for a good while concealed in England, being narrowly watch'd and search'd for; but he happily obtained an Opportunity (by the Help of one Dr. Quaterman) of shipping himself away at a Port Town in Sussex. Among those that had been formerly imprisoned, were Doctor Hewet, Minister of St. Gregory's, and Sir Henry Slingsbey; which last had been a Prisoner ever since the Rising in the West; yet being a Person who was known to bear no Good-will to the present Power, he is charged with an Intention of delivering up Hull, merely upon the expressing of his Consent thereunto, to some that were sent to make the Motion to him, and sift out his Mind with purpose to betray him; and these were Major Waterhouse, Captain Overton, and Lieutenant Thomson; and the Doctor seems to have been no less hardly dealt with, considering what things were laid to his Charge; which had they been true, would certainly have never been so utterly denied at the very Moment of his Death, by a Man of his known Honesty and Integrity. The rest that were taken afterwards, were Mr. John Mordant, Brother to the Earl of Peterborough, Mr. Manley, a Merchant, Mr. Hartgil Baron, Mr. Stapeley, Mr. Maunsel, Mr. Woodcock, Mr. Carrent, Mr. Jackson and Captain Mallory, of whom Mr. Mordant, Woodcock, Carrent, and divers others, were tried at a High Court of Justice, which on the 25th of May was set up under the Presidentship of Commissioner Lisle. All hitherto mentioned, except Sir Henry Slingsbey and Dr. Hewet, having the good Hap to come off with Life: Sir Henry and the Doctor were the first brought to Tryal, and both of them sentenc'd to die as Traytors: The first upon the bare Testimony of those three Men which had so treacherously circumvented him, which in vain he pleaded; as also the Impossibility, a Prisoner, as he was, of performing what he was charged with. The other as a Mute, disowning the Courts Authority, and thereupon denying to plead. The next was Mr. Mordant, who also at first disavowed the Courts Authority, but was at length prevail'd with to plead, and in the End acquitted only by one Voice. In that fortunate Interim, while Colonel Pride by reason of a Fit of the Stone wherewith he was troubled, had withdraw'd himself from the Court, and staid somewhat longer than he intended; the other two being so far favour'd, as to have their Sentence mitigated, were on the 8th of June beheaded on Tower-Hill. The next that were tried were Mr. Thomas Woodcock, Captain Henry Mallory, and Sir Humphrey Bennet: The first made so handsome Captain Henry Mallory (tho' scandaliz'd by some malicious Persons) behav'd himself with Resolution and Loyalty, and was condemn'd, but not put to Death. Of the rest that had to do with this high Court, Colonel William Carrent was acquitted: Colonel Edward Ashton and John Batteley, the first in Tower-street, the other in Cheapside, were hang'd and quarter'd on the 7th of July: The same Day Henry Fryer, ready to have been executed in Smith-field, and two Days after, John Summer in Bishopsgate-street, and Oliver Allen in Gracechurch-street, had their Reprieves brought them. The same Day the two last were repriev'd; Edmund Stacy, his Sentence remitted, was hang'd near the Royal Exchange. In the mean time, Manley, Baron, and Maunsel aforementioned, with two others; namely, Edmund Seymour, and Guy Carlton, having made their Escape, were at the Upper Bench (as it was then called) indicted of High Treason, though absent and outlaw'd.

In Flanders Successes came on with a swift Career: Presently after the taking of Mardike-Fort, Dunkirk was straightly begirt by the joint Forces of the French and English, the French commanded by the Marshal of Turenne, the English by the Lord Rockart, Ambassador from the Protector to the French King, who was constituted General in the room of Sir John Reynolds deceased. The Relief of this so important a Place, (it being the chief Sea Port, and, as it were, the Key of all Flanders) the Spaniards resolv'd to assaye, though with the hazard of a pitch'd Field; and to that Purpose they assembled together all the Force they could make, amounting to about seven thousand Foot, and nine thousand Horse, commanded by Don John himself in Person; together with the Duke of York, the Prince of Conde, and the Marquess of Caracene; and drawn down from Fuernes Fort, was engaged by the Marshal of Turenne, and the Count of Schomberg, joining with Lockart and his English Forces, who making their way (a good Part of them) up a Sand-hill against the whole Power of the Spaniards, were the main Instruments in gaining a clear and eminent Victory over the Spanish Army, most of the Infantry being either slain or taken; and among the taken were divers Officers of the Spanish Nobility, and Persons of high Quality, seventeen Colours, six great Guns, with the whole Baggage of the Field; the Prince of Conde was unhorsed in the Fight, and mounted again by his Cousin Bouteville, who was thereby taken Prisoner in the Prince's stead. There were slain of the English, Captain Sherwin, and another Captain, five Lieutenants and two Ensigns, with eighty common Soldiers, besides three hundred wounded, and some Mortally; among whom, Lieutenant Colonel Roger Fenwick, who was reported a stout Man, and his Loss much bewailed. A Day or two before this Battle, the Marshal of Hocquincourt (who had caused the important Town of Hesdin to revolt from the French to the Spaniard) was slain as he went out Picquering upon a Party. No sooner was this Battle ended, but the French and English returned again afresh to the Siege of Dunkirk, which the Marquess of Leda, Governour thereof (who had been formerly sent Embassador to the Protector) seeing now more straightly than ever environ'd both by Land and Sea, whereby it was reduced to great Extremities; he resolute to defend the Town, made a bold Sally forth, in which he receiv'd his mortal Wound. The Governour's Death, and the Terror of the Granadoes shot into the Town, wrought so upon the Besieged, that they were speedily brought to Articles of Surrender, and on the 25th of June, march'd out with Colours flying, so that the King of France in Person, accompanied with the Cardinal Mazarine, took Possession of the Place, and immediately resigned it up into the Hands of General Lockart in behalf of the Lord Protector, and the English.

The sixth of August, Elizabeth, the Protector's second Daughter, died at Hampton-Court of an Imposthume in some of the inward Parts, which afflicted him very much, because he loved her above all his Children; and that Sorrow was increased by the length of her Sickness, and the grievous Torments she endured. A little before she expired (which was in much Pain) the Delirium of her Sickness prompted her to utter many things, (which tho' formerly she thought, she yet durst not express) against the Injustice of many of her Father's Actions. She was married to one Cleypole, the Son of a private Gentleman of Lincolnshire, of a moderate Fortune; but she could not be confined to it, being of a Spirit as high as if she had been born to that Greatness to which her Father's Ambition had advanced her. She was of a very generous and obliging Disposition, and very much troubled at her Father's Austerity, and Oppression of the Royal Party, to several of whom she did many good Offices. The Grief which the Protector had contracted for her Death, was very much augmented by his Trouble, to discern that the Discontents sprung up amongst many of the inferior Officers of the Army, were fomented by Fleetwood and Desborow; the first of whom married his Daughter, and the other his Sister, who with Berry and Cooper, Colonels, and Sydenham and Pickering, two of the Privy-Counsellors, were in a Confederacy against the present Government, in favour of a Commonwealth. And a while after he fell sick himself of a Tertian Fever, which at first seem'd not to signify much Danger, but by degrees it grew upon him: Yet his Imagination was so far transported with enthusiastick Ravings, that insensible of his own Danger, he affirmed That GOD had reserved him to greater Attempts than ever yet had been performed by him; and that he was assured he should not die of this Sickness. In which Extasy he was much heightned by Goodwin, one of his Chaplains, who openly declared, GOD had heard the Prayers of his Servants for him, and given him his Life; and therefore he perswaded some of his Friends to keep a kind of private Thanksgiving beforehand for his undoubted Recovery. This Confidence amused his Physicians so much, that they were less regardful of his Condition. But nevertheless it was advised he should be brought to Whitehall, where with more Conveniency than at Hampton-Court, a respect might be had to his Health, and the Publick Affairs of the Nation; where

He had sometime before his Sickneſs appointed a Juncto or Committee of Nine, with whom he privately conſulted in the moſt urgent Affairs of the Government. Theſe were Fleetwood, Fiennes, Desborow, Whaley, Thurloe, Laurence, Berry, Cooper and Goffe, which were mixed of both Faſtions, that is, of that of a ſingle Perſon, and that of a Commonwealth, that he might diſpleaſe neither; and that he might by that Confidence divert the latter from Deſigns upon his Power.

Upon Tueſday the 31ſt of Auguſt, finding himſelf in Danger, he commanded his Servants, and all other Perſons except Mr. Thurloe, and Dr. Thomas Goodwin, out of the Room, and declared to them, That in regard he found his Sickneſs and Weakneſs encreaſing, he was reſolved to declare his Succeſſor, according to the Power given him by the * late Petition and Advice; And therefore he deſired them to take Notice, That he named and declared his Son to ſucceed him accordingly.

They asked him which Son: He replied, My Son Richard, My eldeſt Son. Immediately thereupon there came ſome Perſons into the Room, whereby it happened that nothing further was ſaid at that preſent. But † Mr. Thurloe and Dr. Goodwin immediately conferring together, did conceive that the Buſineſs was too great and weighty for them alone to bear the Burthen of the Atteſtation of it; and therefore reſolv'd to take the firſt Opportunity they could to move him again therein, and to deſire him for that Reaſon to call ſome others, to whom he might communicate his Mind in that matter: But in Regard that Relations and others (who perhaps would take it ill to be put out of the Room) were conſtantly there, they could not all that Day, nor the next, gain any Opportunity.

But on Thuſday, perceiving his Diſtemper very much to encreaſe, and hourly gain upon him, they reſolved not to defer it longer, and thereupon they asked him, Whether he remembered what he had ſaid unto them the Tueſday before? Which he ſaid he did. They asked him whether he continued in the ſame Mind or not, touching the Succeſſion of his Son Richard? He answered, That he did. They then told him, it would be requiſite he ſhould communicate his Pleaſure to ſome others, and that the Declaration of the Buſineſs was of too great Concernment and Conſequence for them alone to undertake, if there ſhould be Oppoſition; and therefore deſired him to ſend forthwith for ſome others. He asked them for whom he ſhould ſend? They replied, whom he pleaſed. Then ſend, ſaid he, for the Committee of Nine: Whereupon they ſent a Meſſenger forthwith to haſten them thither, of whom three came immediately, Fiennes, Whaley, and Goffe: And theſe five that were then preſent perceiving him ſtill to decline, went to the Bed-side, and one of them asked him, touching what he had declar'd to Dr. Goodwin and Mr. Thurloe; he thereupon ſaid again, That he would have his Son, his Son Richard, to ſucceed him: And ſo without any more Diſcourſe they withdrew from the Bed, and left him to his Reſt: But within few Minutes came in Fleetwood and Desborow, upon the Summons that had been ſent them; to whom the aforeſaid five declar'd what had paſſed, and offered ſomewhat faintly to move Oliver to the Declaration of his Mind again, which they as faintly reſuſed; but were not much urged to it, they having at their firſt coming declar'd themſelves ſatisfied with the Atteſtation of five Perſons, ſo well known and eſteemed of them.

Upon Friday (the 3d of September, the ſame memorable Day of the Year, that in 1650 he overcame the Scots at Dunbar, and the Year following at Worceſter) at three of the Clock in the Afternoon he departed this Life.

Thus after ſo many hazards in the Field, ſo many Ambuſhes ſaid to have been laid againſt him at home, notwithſtanding the Multitude of Enemies, that from all Parties and Interests, whom his violent Purſuit of Greatneſs had exaſperated, conſpired againſt his Safety; contrary to the real Belief of many Men, the Ill-bodings of ſome, and the earneſt Wiſhes of others, he died, not of a violent, but in his Bed, a natural Death. The Day of his Death was uſher'd in by a Night as tempeſtuous as had been ſeen in this Age, as if the Elements had been in Combution at the flight of a Spirit, which had made ſo great a Concuffion in the Affairs of the World.

He was born in the Town of Huntington, and was the Son of a ſecond Brother of Sir Oliver Cromwell of Huntingtonſhire, a Perſon of eminent Note in the late King's time; his Mother was the Daughter of Sir Richard Steward of the Iſle of Ely, and his Wife Elizabeth the Daughter of Sir James Bourchier, by whom he had three Sons (whereof one died young) and four Daughters.

His Family is ſaid to have originally derived the Name of Cromwell from that great Cromwell, who was Henry VIIIth's Vicar-General over the Spiritualities; their lineal Deſcent was from one Williams of Glamorganſhire, who living contemporary with this Lord Cromwell, and marrying his Daughter, in Gratitude for the Favours he had done him, took his Name upon him, and transferred it to his own Poſterity. As for his Qualities, there is no doubt, though his Diſſimulation, his Ambition, and his many other Vices obſcured what was Praise-worthy in him; yet there was ſomething of Generoſity in his Nature, as may be exemplified in the particular Care and Regard he had for the Relations of ſome that had ſerv'd him faithfully, and died in his Service; which one that writ his Life, parallels with the Gratitude of the forementioned Lord Thomas Cromwell, toward Seignior Friſcobald an Italian Merchant, from whom he had received Civilities.

By his Reputation in Arms, he was courted or feared by moſt of the Princes in Europe, and the King of France and Sweden were entered into ſo ſtrict a League with him, as might have troubled the whole World; but Cardinal Mazarine, the Chief Miniſter of France, held moſt ſecret Intelligence and Friendſhip with him. He was a Man of ſingular Courage and Reſolution, and that attended with a moſt proſperous Stream of Fortune, which is not always the Concomitant of Valour. He kept the Armies under him in ſo exact Diſcipline, that they rather ſeemed a Body of well govern'd Citizens than Soldiers: Swearing, Prophaneneſs, Drunkenneſs, Murder, Rapine, Uncleanneſs, the common Vices of their Soldiers, were

His Ambition and Desire of Glory, excited him to make Attempts also in other Countries, in Pursuance thereof, whereby a great Renown accrued to our Nation in all Parts of the World. And had he not employed that Policy and Sagacity of Parts, which must be confessed to have been in him, to evil Ends, and by unheard of Impieties traiterously aspired unto that highest Pitch of Honour which belonged not to him, usurping his Majesty's Government, he might have been worthy of eminent Place and Dignity in it.

An Hour after his Death, there met together those of the Privy Council then in Town, that had been the most zealous Promoters of the Petition and Advice, and best affected to that Government. These were made acquainted by Thurloe, with what passed on Tuesday and Thursday; and also, that Oliver had subscribed a Paper long before his Death, touching the Succession, wherein Fleetwood was declared Successor; and that this Paper having been laid in a Cabinet, known only to Oliver and his Wife, and no Person more (as we thought) was search'd for, but could not be found.

Oliver's
Will concerning his Successor imparted
to the Council and Chief Officers.

They then agreed to send two of their Number to Fleetwood and Desborow, and to know of them unfeignedly, whether they acquiesced in the Declaration that Oliver had made, touching the Succession of his Son; acquainting them, that they knew there had been a Paper subscribed by Oliver in his Life-time, to the Effect aforesaid; and therefore requested to know of them, whether if hereafter any such Paper should be found or produced, they would, notwithstanding, submit to the last Will and Parol Declaration of Oliver? Whereunto Fleetwood replied, and promised, as in the Presence of God, That if any such Paper then were, or should thenceforth be found or produced, yet he would not insist thereupon; forasmuch as he cordially acquiesced, as he said, in the Succession of Richard. And thereupon a Council was forthwith summoned, where Fiennes and Thurloe gave an Account of Oliver's Appointment of his Successor: And Goodwin, Whaley, and Goffe were called in, and attested the same upon their Oaths: And being withdrawn, the Council unanimously declared their Satisfaction: Desborow having first stood up, and adjured them all in the Name of the living God, That if any Dissatisfaction remained upon their Spirits, they would freely declare it, as he professed he would have done, had any Doubt remained with him. This passed, the President and whole Council went at once to congratulate Richard, and condole his Father's Death.

Cromwell
proclaim'd
Protector
by the City and Chief Officers of the Army.

After the Congratulation, Strickland, Skippon, and some others of the Council were sent to the City, who appeared very well satisfied with what was done; and the next Morning a Proclamation was divulged, subscribed by Chiverton, Lord Mayor of London, and as many of the Chief Officers of the Army, and Counsellors of State as could be got together; wherein Richard Cromwell was at Whitehall, Charing-Cross, and several other publick Places in London, proclaimed Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

Thus far matters succeeded well: His Brother Henry Cromwell was Chief Governour of Ireland, and a Gentleman was sent to acquaint him with the present Posture of Affairs. Of Scotland they had some Doubt; but to endeavour to rectify all things there, Richard sent that Evening to Mr. Thomas Clarges (Brother-in-Law to General Monk) to prevail with him, to go immediately into Scotland, with his Letters to Monk, to know how he stood affected to his Advancement. This Clarges was pitch'd upon as one who had great Interest in the General, and had been lately chosen by his Procurement, upon the Death of one Rowe, to be Agent for the Armies and Council of Scotland and Ireland, an Employment of good Value, whereby he became interested in the Knowledge and Affections of the Officers of all the Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland; for the Regiments of that of Scotland, especially of the Horse, were often changed, whereas the Irish Army continued still unchanged. And although at first his having been in the late King's Service at Oxford, made them at Whitehall unwilling to employ him; yet he was esteemed of a moderate Behaviour, and had so demeaned himself in the pretended Parliament in the Year 1656. by his Actions against the Kingship of Cromwell, that they would not then disoblige him, lest it should seem to be for that Reason. Besides, all of the contrary Faction (of which were the chief of the Army) professed a great Esteem of him, not so much in Respect of himself, but because it was believed Monk engaged him in those Councils; and the Opinion of that contributed more than any thing to divert Oliver from accepting the Crown. Clarges willingly accepted of this Occasion to go to General Monk, to be able to inform himself particularly of his Inclinations: For, although he had a Relation to him by Marriage, the General's so far distant Residence, gave him little Opportunity of other Converse with him than by Letters. The City of London, and the generality of the People in England (having been wearied and tir'd with the Miseries of War, and their Spirits subdued by the Oppressions and Tyranny of Oliver Cromwell) seemed outwardly to comply with the Necessity of the Time, and submit to an Approbation of that they could not remedy. But subtle Contrivances, congratulatory Addresses, in all, or most Cities and Counties, were fram'd, subscrib'd, and presented to him. In Scotland, by private Advice to some of the Officers of the Army, things were so prepared, that when Mr. Clarges came thither, he found them all prepossessed, and doubting one the other; they liked, or seemed not to dislike all that was done at London. But the General himself and he had many secret Conferences, and the General then declared himself weary of the uncertain Condition wherein he found both himself and the Nation enthrall'd by the over-ruling Tyranny of the Soldiers, (who made themselves a divided Interest from the rest of the People) so that they consulted of a Paper to be drawn up, and to be presented to the new Protector; the Heads whereof were to advise him to suppress the Division in the Church, by countenancing a sober and Orthodox Ministry; to permit no Councils of Officers, and to model and put the Army into the Hands of the * qualified Nobility and Gentry of the Nations, as such whom the People might best trust. With this Paper, and a Letter of Approbation of the Choice of the Protector, Clarges returned to London to him. The Letter he delivered publicly, but the Paper was privately communicated, and well liked of by him: And the Prosecution of the Advice thereof in his Attempts to model the Armies, was the main Cause of all the Divisions which happened in them, and the happy Consequences thereof.

By the same Arts, as those from the Cities and Counties in England, Addresses were promoted and subscribed by all the Regiments in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging. Lockhart Governour of Dunkirk, who had married his Cousin German, was as forward as any to promote Addresses, both from that Garrison and the rest of the English under Major-General Morgan, who were yet in the French Army, commanded by Marshal Turenne, and had gained a great Fame and Reputation to their Country, by many signal Services in that Campaign; for by their Valour chiefly, a great Victory had been obtain'd, as beforementioned, over the Spanish Army near Dunkirk, which was followed by the taking of that Town, and the Fort of Mardike, and the Towns and Forts of Bergen, Dixmude, Ferne, Oudenard, Marvin, Gravelin and Ypre; which last Place, taken about the beginning of October, Old Stile, was the first Military Success that the English had abroad under Richard's Government.

Marshal Turenne had not Hopes so late in the Year to gain a Place so considerable; but having beaten a Party of five thousand Men under the Prince of Ligne, that was sent to join with some other Forces, and to visit that Garrison in their March, he supposed that the Town, missing the Succour they expected, might quickly be surrendered: There were in it about two thousand five hundred old Soldiers, besides whom, all the Townsmen assisted that were able to bear Arms, being in all about four thousand; and it was taken in a Fortnights Siege. After the Army had been two or three Days before it, Turenne sent for Major General Morgan, who commanded the English, to order him to keep double Guards, for that he had certain Intelligence that the Prince of Conde intended, with all the Force he could get together, to put Relief into the Place. Morgan informed him his Men were so exposed, that he commonly lost five or six every time they mounted the Guards; and therefore he proposed, that rather than weary them out with so much continual Duty, the Town might be assaulted. Turenne, who was a wary Captain, was unwilling to hazard the Reputation of that Army which had been victorious by many prosperous Successes that Summer, and therefore at first rejected the Advice; but Morgan pressing more upon him, and offering himself with six hundred English to go on upon the strongest Part of the Town, he at last consented. He was seconded by two Sergeant Majors, who each of them commanded six hundred French, and were to attack two other Places at the same time that Morgan made his Assault; but he with his English entered and gained most of the Out-works, and turned the Cannon of the Besieged upon the Town, before his French Succours came in; and immediately after, the Town was surrender'd upon easy Terms: The Prince of Ligne, Baybancon, and Arembeg, marched out with the Garrison. Turenne embraced Morgan after this Service; and, tho' he had long before esteemed him a very expert and valiant Captain, he ever after valued him as one of the bravest Commanders of his time; and in the Report of this Action to the most Christian King, he attributed the Merit of it wholly to him.

Some were willing to believe the new Protector had a good Affection towards his Majesty, and would use his Power to his Advantage, as soon as he should be confirmed in it, and had the Army in his absolute Obedience, to which they were induced by the Observation of his former Deportment; for in his private Conditions he demeaned himself with Civility and Respect to the Gentlemen of the Country where he lived, and was always ready to do Offices of Kindness to Persons in Distress, apparently disliking of the Severity of his Father, and not averse to Overtures for his Majesty's Restitution: But it was afterwards evident, that he did but formalize in the doubtful time of his Authority, for when he saw himself owned and acknowledged by the Army and People, he was very much reserved to all that wished well to his Majesty, and either really declined his Service, or had not Virtue enough to resist the Temptation of Greatness, or Courage enough toward the Declension of his Power, to use that little which remained, to attempt to free his Country from Thralldom and Oppression.

In the first Place, after his Advancement to the supreme Dignity, principal Care was taken by him and his Council for the Interment of his Father, with all the State and Solemnity accustomed at Kings and Princes Funerals; and therefore Search is said to have been made into the Records, to see what had been expended upon the Burial of King James, and the same Cost, if not greater, was to be bestowed on this: The Corps of his late Highness being embalmed and wrapt in Lead, was removed from Whitehall to Somerset-House, there to lie in regal Pomp and State.

As soon as the ceremonious Rites of this great Burial were past, the Preparations for which had for a time very much put a stop to Proceedings, both Domestick and Foreign, immediately other matters of publick Concernment began seriously to be taken into Consideration, by the new Protector and his Council. The first thing was the sending of a naval Supply to the King of Sweden, between whom and the old Protector there had been contracted a very firm and inviolable Amity, and Forces had been sent to this King's Aid out of this Nation, both for Land and Sea Service; for the latter whereof, he now more than ever, had Occasion to make up a good stout Fleet; for after that, by his Success against the King of Denmark, he had won him to a Concession of a great Part of his Territories, and of half the Dominion of the Sound, and had at length withdrawn his Army: The King of Denmark judging the Conditions too hard on his Side, and alleging them not to have been punctually observ'd by the Swedes, began presently, after the Departure to prevent the Jealousy of the Action. Mr. Clarges returns from Scotland to the Protector. Addresses to the young Protector from all the Regiments of the Army both in England and other Parts.

A Squadron of Ships sent towards the Sound.

Another greater Fleet set out under Gen. Montague.

The Sea-Fight between the Sweeds and the Dutch.

Copenhagen relieved.

In the mean time the Hollanders Fleet, led by General Opdam and Witte Witteson, arriving at the Sound with Relief for Copenhagen, were assailed by the Sweedish Rix Admiral Charles Gustave Wrangle, in which Battle the Dutch are said to have received a notable Overthrow, seven of their Ships being lost, and Witte Witteson, one of their Admirals, with many other Persons of Quality slain; nevertheless, during the Fight, several Dutch Fluyts and Merchant-men passed by with Provision to Copenhagen, which so strengthened the Besieged, that they thereby became inabled for the sustaining of a long Siege, as hath since appear'd; and not long after, the Sweeds in a resolute Effort against the City, were repelled with the Loss of a great many Men, and some of Eminency.

And now in England, want of Monies, and other pressing Occasions of the State, required the sudden Calling of a Parliament: The young Protector issues out his Writs, summoning the Members to meet at Westminster the 27th of January. Elections are made by the Counties, not without some canvassing of Parties.

Moreover, according to the Constitution of the Government, Members were elected to the Commons House for Ireland and Scotland, as well as England. The Elections were so disposed in England, that many honest Gentlemen in all Parts were chosen, but the Upper (for it did not yet aspire to the Name of Lords) House, was fill'd with the Chief Officers of the Army, whereof most were of such contemptible Extraction and Education, that the Commons were unwillingly brought in any Capacity whatsoever to own them. From the time of Summons of this Parliament, to their convening, Richard was frequently entertained with the forementioned Addresses, which much heighten'd the Confidence he had entertain'd of his future Prosperity, and made him think of modelling the Council conformable to Designs he had of subjecting the Army to his intire Command; for the Council, as the Government then stood, had a great Co-ordination with him in the Administration of it; and the major Part consisted of such as countenanced in all their Extravagancies the Officers of the Army, who were many of them Anabaptists, and of other Sects.

He endeavours to new model his Council.

He pretended not to remove any of the Counsellors, but to add so many of his Friends to them as might make the greater Number firm to him; he propos'd the Lords Broghil, and Faulconbridge, who had married his Sister, but they were not approved of; and instead of these, it was offered by those that oppos'd them, that four Colonels of the Army might be admitted, viz. Whaley, Goffe, Berry and Cooper: The first two had been of the late King's Judges, but were affected to the Protector and his Family; the other two were Factious and Seditious. These Transactions were not agitated in open Council, but privately treated of by particular Persons, but so rumoured, that the Army began to be jealous of the Protector, and murmur at his Actions; sometimes they would complain of the Company and Conversation he us'd; and at other times censure his Religion, exclaiming that Godliness was discouraged by him; and that he rather favour'd those of loose Principles, than the zealous Professors of the Gospel. But in this he was injured, for if his private Condition represented him a kind of Libertine, he assumed, together with the publick Person, a more grave and circumspect Behaviour, conform'd himself to the constant Observation of all Religious Duties, and was in Appearance at least, if not really so, of a blameless Life and Conversation.

The Army grows jealous and censorious of him.

The Grandees of the Army, doubtful of the Temper of the approaching Parliament, moved the Protector to call together some of the Officers of the Army to London, (as his Father was accustomed to do on the like Occasions) to advise with him, to obviate any Peril that might happen in the beginning of his Power, if the Parliament should attempt Innovations: He was a little surprized at this Advice, but thought it not time to refuse it, and thereupon Letters were sent to as many of them as could be spared from their Charges

The Names of the Protector's Privy-Council.

Seditious Meetings of the factious Part of the Army and Council at Desborow's House. Desborow sent to the Protector to persuade him to resign the Command of the Army to Fleetwood.

Which he refuseth.

Charges to repair to London, to be there at the opening of the Parliament. The Names of his Father's Privy-Counsellors which acted and were continued under him, were Richard Lawrence President, Nathaniel Fiennes, one of the Keepers of the Great Seal; John Thurloe, Secretary of State; General Montague, Sir Charles Woolsey, Colonel Philip Jones, Philip Lord Lisle, Son to the Earl of Leicester; Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Colonel Desborow, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Colonel Sydenham, Walter Strickland, Colonel Philip Skippon; of which the six last named, were Favourers and Abettors of the Army: Lawrence the President, was an Anabaptist, but somewhat moderate in his Opinion; the Lord Lisle was often absent and uncertain, endeavouring as much as he could to appear to a Neuter. There was another whom I should have named, which was Mr. Major, the Protector's Wives Father, but his Indisposition of Health render'd him incapable of Action. Fleetwood and Desborow had frequent Meetings at Desborow's House, who with the factious Part of this Council, and some of the Colonels of the Army that favoured them, which were Berry, Hewson, Cooper and Lilburn, consulted to wrest the Power of the Army out of the Protector's Hands, and in order thereunto, Desborow was sent to tell him, that the Army was filled with many Jealousies and Fears of Designs against it, which would put them into Mutiny, and inevitably hazard the Subversion of the Government, unless some speedy Remedy were taken for Prevention; and that no better way could be thought on, than putting the Command of the Army into the Hands of some Person that had served with them, and of whose Courage and Integrity to their Cause, they might have Confidence and Assurance; and immediately named Fleetwood to be the Man, adding, that this would not only satisfy the Army, but give great Content to the Godly Party, (which was a Name much used by all these Novelists) and free him from much of the Trouble, which rendered him now less intent in the more necessary Parts of Government. To this he replied, That as to the Fears and Jealousies of the Army, when he knew their Grounds, he would give them what Redress could be desired, not doubting but the Parliament, now ready to sit down, would take care both for his and their Security, and the Peace and Quiet of the Nations: But as to the Command of the Army, he freely told them, he should not think himself able to protect himself or them, if he should part with it; which his Father's Example confirmed him in: And with this Answer dismissed him. His Father, as was before mentioned, was much perplexed before he died, with many seditious Anabaptist-Officers of the Army, who were impatient of his Government; but the Fear and Danger of a Division, and respect to his Person, kept them in some Degree of Obedience: He displaced many of them before he died, and had reduced the rest, and wholly modelled the Army to depend on him, if he had lived a few Months longer: He had introduced his Son, the Lord Faulconbridge, and many others into Chief Commands, who were allied to him in Blood, or by their Advancement wholly depending on him. All this while Matters were carried without much Heat, and not out of Possibility of Accommodation when the Parliament 1659. sat down.

At the prefixed time the Parliament meets, A Parliament consisting as the last Parliament had done in his Father's time, of two Houses, the Commons and the Other, (which now began to be called the Upper-House) for the first was chosen Speaker Chaloner Chute, a Lawyer, who, within a short while, fell sick unto Death; as also Sir Lislebone Long, Recorder of London, who was chosen pro tempore in his stead; for the latter was chosen Nathaniel Fiennes, Lord Keeper of the Seal. The Act of Recognition of the Protector to be chief Governor of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging, was many Days debated in Parts, and at last, part of it was resolved in these Words, viz. That it be part of this Bill to recognize and declare his Highness Richard Lord Protector and Chief Magistrate of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging. And it was added, That neither this, nor any other Vote that is or shall be passed, in order to this Bill, shall be of Force or binding to the People until the whole be passed. The Protector liked well these Proceedings, and thought himself towards a good Settlement; but of those that were zealous for a Commonwealth, there was in this Parliament such a considerable Number, who had so powerful Influence on publick Transactions, that to procrastinate the time, they cast in several previous Debates, in which, nevertheless, the Assertors of the Protector's Interest being more in Number, carried things to their own Advantage by the major Vote, as particularly in the Business of the Scotch and Irish Members to be continued in among them, and the owning of the Upper-House, and holding an Entercourse with them, after a long Consultation in question of their Authority. However, the factious Counsellors which abetted Discontents in the Army, continued their Meetings to pursue their Purpose of wresting the Command of the Army out of his Hands, and putting it under Fleetwood.

It was a little before Cromwell's Death, that great Preparation was begun for the setting forth of a Fleet to the Help of the Sweeds against the Danes; and that under the Command of General Montague; nor did his Death put a stop thereunto: Sir George Ascough being sent with a Squadron of Ships, tho' hindered from coming up to join with them, by reason of the freezing of those Seas, as hath been already mentioned; whereupon, for the better managing of the Charge, it was thought expedient that the House of Commons should be engaged in it; and a narrative Report was made to them by Secretary Thurloe, about the latter End of February this Year, concerning the State of the War betwixt the Crowns of Sweeden and Denmark, in Relation to the Baltick Sea, and the Command of the Sound. This took so far, as to gain a Vote for the providing a considerable Navy for the Preservation of Trade, which was forthwith equipped, and General Montague sent with it to the Sound about the latter End of March, who was so streightened in his Commission, that he lay there without doing any thing, till he was called back by that Part of the 1659. Long Parliament that subverted the Power that sent him.

Long

The Upper-House as it now began to be called, in a Strain somewhat nearer Lords House, favoured the Military Council of Officers, but the Commons took much Dislike at it, as if it portended a kind of Force upon their Councils. The Protector in the mean time advised with his Friends, how to free himself from the Embarrassments of the Officers of the Army: My Lord Faulconbridge, Colonel Ingoldsby, Colonel Bridge, Colonel Charles Howard, Major Knight, all Officers in the Army, and some few others, counselled him to send a Party to Desborow's House, to seize upon those that met there, which were eight or nine of the Chief Confederates; and immediately after to give their Commands to the next Officers to them, till he could have a fairer Opportunity to put them into better Hands; and to send for all the rest of the Officers to come to him; and to command all of them to repair to their respective Commands, that were not obliged by Service in Parliament to attend that Duty. These Counsels were very agreeable to his Inclination, but the Secretary of State, and some others to whom he brake the Business, diverted him from the first; but to the latter, of dismissing the Officers, he readily consented; and the next Day he sent for them, and dismissed them accordingly: And the same Day that this was by him done, the Commons openly debated against this Assembly of Officers, and voted, That during the Sitting of the Parliament, there should be no General Council or Meeting of the Officers of the Army, without Direction, Leave, and Authority of the Protector, and both Houses of Parliament. And because in the Debate of these Questions, many that favoured the Army, had cunningly cast out some minatory Expressions, insinuating, That this way of proceeding might make them think themselves suspected, and provoke them to break forth into some Act of Opposition and Disturbance, they passed another Resolve; That no Person should have or continue Command in any of the Armies in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or any of the Dominions or Territories thereunto belonging, who shall refuse to subscribe, that he will not disturb or interrupt the free Meeting in Parliament of any the Members of either House of Parliament, or their Freedoms in their Debates and Councils.

The Upper House jealous of the Proceedings of the Commons and the Protector.

The inferior Officers of the Army jealous of the Commons and the Protector.

These were transmitted to the Upper-House, to be confirmed there; but they made a slow Progress in them upon divers late contracted Jealousies, not the least of which was from a late Vote of the Commons, wherein they declared, at the Acknowledgment of their Constitution, That their Acknowledgment of that House for another House of Parliament, should not prejudice the Peerage of the Land, or their Privileges: As also believing that the Protector conspired with the Commons to weaken and divide; or subdue the Power of the Army, in which they were somewhat confirmed; for that these Matters were debated and voted the same Day he had dissolved the Council of Officers, and dismissed them. The Protector had many of the Chief Officers of the Army fixed to him; but the inferior sort, who were of Fanatick Opinions in Religion, and were more numerous, and had most Influence upon the Soldiers, were for Fleetwood and Desborow: For it was artificially instilled into their Heads, That the Protector did intend to cast them out of their Places, and put the Army into the Hands of the Nobility and Gentry of the Nations, thereby to bring in the King, and destroy that Liberty of the Gospel they had so long contended for. The Debate against the Army in the House of Commons, was on the 19th Day of April, from which time the Meetings of the Officers were more frequent than before; and upon the 22d Day the Protector was informed, that they would either themselves dissolve the Parliament, or compel him to do it. He called his Confidants about him, and made Preparations against all Accidents that might happen; and in the Evening many of his Friends encouraged him to take Horse, and appear at the Head of some Troops that were ready to receive him. While this was doing, the other Party had drawn up some Men in the several Avenues to Whitehall, and in St. James's Fields; yet it was believed, if he had appeared with Vigour and Courage amongst them, respect of his Person would have prevailed much with the Common Soldiers; but he was fearful and unresolved, of a Spirit unbecoming the Quality he assumed; and many of those about him were as irresolute as he, some advised one thing, some another, wasting their time in Contradictions; and, as it happens in the Consultations of fearful People, they debated many things fit to be done, till the time was past to put them in Execution. Desborow, his Uncle, came to him from the discontented Officers, and pressed him much to sign a Commission to Fiennes to dissolve the Parliament, which he a great while obstinately refused, till Desborow insolently told him, if he did it not, it should be done without him, and so urged by Threats and Importunities, he at length consented to it.

The discontented Faction of the Army in a Posture of Hostility against the Protector.

He is forced by Desborow to sign a Commission to Fiennes for the dissolving of the Parliament.

The next Morning, the House of Commons having heard of these Transactions at Whitehall, adjourned themselves for three Days: But this their Adjournment proved a total Dissolution; for those that had made this Breach upon them, proceeded further to compleat their Purposes; and besides the aforesaid Commission directed to Fiennes, caused a Proclamation to come forth in the Protector's Name, to publish the Dissolution of the Parliament.

Fleetwood and Desborow having (to get the Power of the Army to them, and their Party) made this Breach upon the Parliament, and in it shaken the Protector's Government, intended of themselves, as it should seem, nothing less than to dethrone him, though by reason of what they had already done, they quickly found it was not in their Power to prevent what they so little intended; they came to him together and apart several times that Day after it was done, and protested to him, That his Power in all things, but the immediate Command of the Army, should be preserved intire; and even in that, nothing should be done, but in his Name, and by his Privy; telling him, They had not taken this Course, but upon certain Assurance of the Designs of the King's Party, and others to disturb the publick Peace, which nothing could prevent, but the breaking up of that Parliament.

He

1659. He received not much Consolation from these Discourses, and gave little Credit to them, well knowing that it was far easier to draw the Officers of the Army into seditious Courses, than to moderate them. He told them, he doubted not of their Intentions, and that they had been practised upon to do that in Haste, which they might have Leisure enough to repent; and that they would find now they had made a Concussion of his Power, it would be a Province too hard for them to re-settle it, and so it proved in Effect; for at the first Meeting of the Officers at Wallingford-House, after the Emission of the forementioned Proclamation, they would not hear of any thing in behalf of the Protector, and were so far from thinking of the Continuance of his Power, that when any thing was moved tending that way, it was obstructed or diverted by Propositions of Government. Yet at last, when they had determined, that the chief Command of the Army should be in Fleetwood, with a Power to dispose of all vacant Offices, till farther Order, they were persuaded to allow the Protector a kind of limited Supremacy (somewhat like that of a Duke of Venice). But the next Day, whilst many of the Superior Officers met at Wallingford-House, in further Consideration of a Model of Government, the inferior Officers being the most numerous, assembled in the Chapel at St. James's; having Doctor Owen, and other Independent Ministers with them to assist at their Devotion, where the Matter was artificially so contrived, that the Prosperity they enjoyed under the latter Part of the Commons House of the Long Parliament, was much magnified; with some Intimations of Advice to return to that Government, with which the Auditors were very much affected, but nothing more was done at that time. This was promoted by Lambert and his Friends, wherein he appeared not openly himself, but set Colonel Lilburn to manage the Business, at whose Chamber his Friends had private Junctoes.

The next Day Fleetwood and Desborow were alarmed with this Countermine against their Designs; for the inferior Officers came now to open Declaration of their Forwardness to restore the latter part of the long Parliament, and to restore to their Commands Lambert, and the rest of the Officers who had been displaced by Oliver Cromwell for Disaffection to him; yet with so much Respect to the Protector, and his Family, that they would have an honourable Provision made for them. Fleetwood endeavoured to oppose this Torrent, suspecting Lambert's Ambition would quickly supplant him, if he got Power: But when he perceived it was already too great to be resisted, the Consideration thereof obliged both him and Desborow to comply, for the Preservation of their Authority. However, to retard their Proceedings, they propose, first, to have the Army settled and modelled in a Way of Unity before they determined upon the Government, which was thought rational; and at a Meeting of a general Council of Officers, in order thereunto, they removed the Protector from his Regiment, and the Colonels Ingoldsby, Howard, the Lord Faulconbridge, and Colonel Bridge, from theirs: Colonel Norton they displaced from the Government of Portsmouth, which they gave to Colonel Whetham, and made Colonel Edward Salmon Governour of Hull in the room of Colonel Smith, who, by the Recommendation of Fleetwood, had the Command of that Garrison given him by Oliver Cromwell. To Colonel Saunders they gave the Protector's Regiment of Horse; to Colonel Rich, that of Ingoldsby; to Sir Arthur Haslerig, Colonel Howard's Regiment of Foot, with the Government of Berwick, Carlisle, and Tinnmouth: To Lambert they gave the Lord Faulconbridge's Regiment; and to Okey, that which was his own before, which was lately commanded by Colonel Bridge: Major Packer, and Captain Gladman, Anabaptist Officers, who had been by Oliver Cromwell displaced, were restored to their Commands. The inferior Officers, in all their respective Regiments, were suitably modelled according to the Opinion of their Colonels.

Thus Lambert was brought into the Army, wherein he quickly recovered much of his former Power. After this, the Council of Officers was reduced to a smaller Number.

The 29th of April there met at Fleetwood's House, Lambert, Desborow, Sydenham, Cooper, John Jones, Berry, Hacker, Lilburn, Ashfield, Salmon, Zanchy, Okey, Sanders, Clark, all Colonels, and Major-General Kelsey, and Barkstead the Lieutenant of the Tower, where they debated the Election of a Council, which should have a Negative upon the Remnant Parliament, when it should be restored: But after much Debate, that was thought fitter for the Debate of the Parliament than them.

They next consult about some Articles for the Security of themselves and their Friends, and for a Foundation, on which they would oblige their Parliament to establish the Commonwealth Government.

These Articles being digested into Form, and agreed to by the General Council, a certain number of the Officers were deputed to meet with Sir Henry Vain, Sir Arther Haslerig, Mr. Scot, and Major Salloway, the prime leading Men in this Parliament, to consider how they might be disposed to consent to them. Vane and those with him had been treated with apart; but when they came to publick Discourse, they were very reserved in their Answers; yet they gave them hopes of their Consents, and of their Endeavours to prevail upon others; but said, they could not undertake any previous Agreement, to oblige the Parliament, without their Authority and Consent, at such time as they were met together.

This Caution of theirs was disliked and suspected by Fleetwood, Desborow, and Lambert; but the inferior Officers were so far possessed in Favour of them, that it was not time to contend. They therefore desired them to use means to draw as many of the Members as they could together with all convenient Haste, because the Government was a kind of Inter-regnum; and the Officers in the mean time drew up a Declaration to invite them to sit, which upon the 6th of May was presented to the Speaker by Lambert, with about thirteen or fourteen Officers of the Army in his Company.

After the Delivery of this, many of the most eminent Members of this Remnant of the Long Parliament, having before consulted with as many

They send to treat with Vane, Haslerig, and others

They agree to accept of the Invitation.

1659. of the rest as were in London, came also and gave a Visit to the Speaker, to signify their Willingness to return to the Exercise of their Trust, (as they call'd it) in pursuance of the Invitation given them by the Army, and that they would meet the next Morning, which was the 8th of May, at eight of the Clock in the Painted Chamber, where they desired his Presence to accompany them from thence to the Parliament-House; which he accordingly did, and they all went together, and took their Places. Thus ended the Reign, or rather the Usurpation of the Cromwell's, being overthrown by those of their nearest Relations, from whom by Interest, they might have expected Support: But such was the Fate of this ill-acquired Dominion, to be subverted in its greatest Security, by the Ambition and Malice of those that assisted the Aspirers in the obtaining of it.

And take their Places in the House.

General Monk seems to give his Consent to what was done in England.

They publish their Intentions by a Declaration. The Words of the Declaration extracted out of the Parliament Journals.

Sir George Booth, and others of the old secluded Members claim their Privilege of sitting, but are kept out.

Upon the Dissolution of the Protector's Parliament, Diligence was used by Clarges to acquaint Monk with all Occurrences; but the Officers of the Army in Scotland, then in London, of Fleetwood's Party, had so dispersed Letters amongst their Friends, to engage them for the restoring of this latter Part of the Long Parliament, that when he conven'd some of them at Edinburgh to sound their Tempers, he perceived they had been wrought upon; and therefore he judged it most prudent, to seem to approve of what was done: And to that Purpose he writ a Letter, signed by himself and his Officers, to the Officers at London, which gave them Assurance of his Adherence to them, (but if Richard had not dissolved his Parliament, Monk had then march'd into England in favour of it). They did not fear much any Storms from the Army in Ireland, who of themselves could do little, without Correspondence from England and Scotland.

The first thing the Remnant Parliament did when they met, after Election of their Officers, was the passing a short Declaration, which was ordered to be Printed and Published; in the Close whereof they declared, That they are resolved, through the gracious Assistance of Almighty GOD, to apply themselves to the faithful Discharge of the Trust reposed in them; and to endeavour the Settlement of this Commonwealth.

Sir George Booth, Colonel Rossiter, Mr. Pryn, and some others, Members of the Commons House of this Parliament, (formerly secluded by the Army) attempted to go into the House, but were all kept back by Adjutant Gen. Allen, except Mr. Pryn, who slipt in, but they would do nothing whilst he was amongst them, but adjourned 'till the Afternoon; and when he again would have entered, he was staid by some Officers of the Army.

About four Days after the present small Parliament had sat, which was spent in making a Committee of Safety, and dispatching Intelligence of their being re-instated in their former Power, to several of their Members absent in the Country, whom they had not disabled from Sitting: The Officers of the Army presented themselves with their Petition and Address, containing a sort of Advice, or rather Directions, for their manner of Government. But the Parliament, though they did not much relish this, had yet so great Obligations to them, that they could not decline giving them Thanks for the same; and agreeing to the several Articles thereof.

In the next Place, they applied themselves to Richard Cromwell, of whom they required a formal Submission; which he, without much Delay, delivered to them, signed with his own Hand.

A Schedule of his Debts were annexed: But what was contracted for the Funeral of his Father, they absolutely rejected, and made slow Progress in the rest, and delay'd to settle any Revenue upon him or his Mother, as was desir'd; but gave him two thousand Pounds to discharge Part of his own private Debts, and required him and all his Dependants, to remove from Whitehall in six Days. Fleetwood discovered a little Discontent at this Contempt put upon his Brother Cromwell, and that Family; but as soon as it was ordered that he should be Commander in Chief of all the Armies and Land Forces in England, Scotland, and Ireland, for one Year, in Compliance with the twelfth Article of the Armies Petition and Address, he was less solicitous in the Concernments of his Wife's Family. When the House voted he should command the Armies, they likewise voted, He should have Power to Sign and Seal such Commissions for the Constitution of Officers under him, as should be approved by the Parliament, and nominated by Sir Henry Vane, Sir Arthur Haslerig, Lieutenant General Fleetwood, and the Colonels, Lambert, Desborow, Ludlow, and Berry, or the major Part of them, who were made Commissioners for that Purpose. And for his better Establishment, they directed a Bill to be prepared and brought into the House, to be passed into an Act for his Constitution, which was done accordingly; but upon the second reading of it, they would not admit of that Clause, to authorize him to sign Commissions, but ordered, That all Commissions, both to the Commission-Officers of the Army, and the Captains of the Fleet, should be signed by the Speaker of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, to be written by the Clerks attending the Council of State, and delivered to the Officers Gratis, by the Speaker in the Parliament House. They also at the same time ordered, That the Government of Ireland should be by Commissioners nominated, and appointed by Parliament, and not by one Person; and that Colonel Henry Cromwell should be acquainted with Henry the Order, and required forthwith to repair to the Parliament. This Gentleman had made himself very popular in Ireland, in his Government of that Kingdom, under his Father and his Brother; but in regard there was a Council co-ordinate with him in Civil Matters; many of the Members whereof were of severe and rigid Behaviour; the Generosity of his Disposition was somewhat over-ruled; nevertheless, most People in Distress there did receive such Effects of his Civility, where he had any manner of Capacity to shew it, that they acknowledged he deserved to have been the Son of a better Father.

He had the Irish Army under good Discipline, and was so well beloved of the Officers, that it is probable he would not have consented to the Change of Government, if he had had time to prepare against it; for his Brother gave him no Intimation of what had happened, nor any Commands to appear on his Behalf; what called from the Government of Ireland.

1659. what he had heard, being only from the Intelligence of private Friends. At the first Alarm, he advised with his Confidants what to do, and to prevent Confederacies against him, by any Combinations of the Officers of his Army, he commanded all of them to their Charges, and (to use his own Words) not to hearken to any design of Innovation, how speciously soever the same might be presented to them. Likewise he dispatched Cornet Monk to Scotland to General Monk (who came thither not 'till fifteen Days after the Alteration of the Government) to inform himself how he and his Army stood affected to it; who returned no other Answer than a Copy of the Letters the Officers of his Army had obliged him to send to the Parliament.

In all Probability, if Colonel Henry Cromwell had drawn his Army together, and fixed them to his Authority, and then declared against their Proceedings at London, he might have shaken much the new Foundation of the Commonwealth; for the Armies in England and Scotland were not then modelled, and the Officers, many of them (as hath been said) Relations or Dependants of the Family of the Cromwells; but he was so doubtful of the Success, that he undertook nothing, but peaceably submitted as his Brother had done, (tho' in more generous Terms) to the Authority then introduced.

We purposely omit many Particulars of these Transactions, and others in the Journals of the Parliament, as their Constitutions of a Council of State for the more immediate executive Power of the Commonwealth, the Nomination of Judges, Commissioners of the Great Seal, and Commissioners for the Admiralty, and Government of the Navy, and Colonel Henry Cromwell's Letter to the Parliament, when he submitted to it, as not very essentially pertinent to this History.

Fleetwood and his Friends were troubled at the Restriction of his Commission, yet he dissembled his Passion, and yielded to Necessity, 'till a more favourable Conjunction might give him Opportunity to enlarge his Power; however, both he, Desborow, Lambert, and many of them were dissatisfied with the way of receiving their Commissions from the Hands of the Speaker, and would have remonstrated against it; but by enquiring into the Temper of the inferior Officers, they found them well enough affected towards it, and therefore did not proceed for that time. And Fleetwood himself, to dissemble his Acquiescence, with great Submission and Protestation of Obedience to the Parliament, received his Commission in the House, from the Hands of the Speaker, and after him Lambert, Desborow, Berry, Ludlow, Sydenham, and the rest of them in and about London, who had Commands in the Army.

Fleetwood, Lambert, and others receive their Commissions in the House from their Speaker.

The Parliament now became confident of its Power, and meditated to subject the Army wholly to it (which made them jealous of each other). Although all the Armies and Navy had declared their Concurrence in Obedience to them; yet they displaced those Officers in both, whom they suspected in any manner to have been affected to Cromwell, or monarchical Government. The seven Commissions before named, to whom the Nomination of the Officers of the Army was first committed, were continued in that Authority 1659. and very active in it. Those of the Anabaptist persuasion were by them esteemed most firm to a Commonwealth, and by their Information they were much guided in the Disposition of Places; but where they had been put out by Cromwell, for Dissatisfaction to him, they were restored as of course. Colonel Lockhart, Governour of Dunkirk, had made his Submission; but shortly after, there was a desperate Mutiny in the Garrison, at first suspected to be for the King, but it was quickly appeased, and found to be otherwise. And the better to regulate the Affairs there, and quiet the Place, Lieutenant Colonel Pierfon, Colonel Ashfield, and Colonel Packer, are forthwith sent over. Thus all things succeeded fortunately to them; Embassadors from all Parts making haste to congratulate the Felicity of their Government.

The Governour of Dunkirk submits to the change of Government.

The Embassador, from the united Provinces, was prepared with his Credentials for Audience within a Fortnight after the first Beginning of this new Commonwealth, and at his Audience, in the Name of his Masters, he made a more than ordinary Profession of Amity, and Desire of Unity and Confederacy with them. The Commissioners who had that in Charge, made great Dispatch both in modelling the Army and Navy. Pierfon and Mason, two Anabaptists, Lieutenant-Colonels under General Monk, undertook to know so well the Army in Scotland, that their Information was much credited in the settling of it, and to weaken Monk's Power, they had designed to remove those he most trusted, and put others of their own Creatures into their Places. Of all these Passages the General had very good Intelligence, his Agent Clarges not omitting to acquaint him with all that passed with these Commissioners. And after a while, he took publick notice of it in a Letter to the House, in which, among other Expressions, he told them he had heard of their Intentions to displace many of his Officers, which he conceived they did not from any Knowledge they had of their Persons and Qualifications, but the Informations of others; and that he thought himself as fit to be credited in that Matter as any, and did assure them, they were all honest and stout Men, and such for whose Fidelity and good Behaviour he would be engaged.

The Dutch Embassador courts our restored Senate in a high manner.

Gen. Monk digests not the Funder's Designs of modelling his Army.

This Letter put a little stop to their Career, but did not divert their Revolutions: Yet to give him some Satisfaction, they sent him back Word, they would be very careful in the placing or displacing of his Officers, and that in his own Regiments of Horse and Foot, there should be no Alteration 'till such time as he were consulted in it. Monk was not satisfied with their Answer, but privately advised some of those Officers, whom he heard they would put from their Commands, to go to London, to solicit their own Concernments, and as much as they could, obstruct and retard the Proceedings of the Committee. That which was of most Advantage to the Preservation of his Officers, was an Order made, that such Officers as were new constituted for Scotland or Ireland, because they could not come to the Parliament to take their Commissions, should receive them from such Commissioners as should be appointed

He useth his utmost Industry to obstruct it.

And none being yet appointed for Scotland, that Affair rested a while in Suspence, yet was not so far neglected as to hinder the Designment of the Remove of many, whom nevertheless the General underhand kept still in their Commands, 'till further order.

An old Act of Assessment revived.

In the pretended Parliament begun at Westminster, in the Year 1656. An Act had passed for a three Years Assessment upon England, Scotland, and Ireland, at thirty five thousand Pounds per menssem on England, six Thousand per menssem on Scotland, and nine Thousand a Month on Ireland, to determine the 24th of June 1660, of which one Year's Proportion was yet uncollected, which made the House to pass an Act on the 18th of June this Year, to authorize the collecting of that Money, knowing it to be less Difficult to continue a Tax already imposed, than after the expiring of that to raise a new one. In this Act, they appoint the whole Year's Assessment to be paid into the Treasury, one Moiety on or before the 10th of August, and the other on the 10th of October.

Commissioners appointed for the Government of Ireland.

Having, as is aforesaid, recalled Colonel Henry Cromwell from Ireland, they appoint for the Civil Government of that Kingdom, certain Commissioners, namely, Steele, Robert Goodwyn, Matthew Tomlinson and John Jones; and for the Command of the Army, Colonel Edmund Ludlow, who with the Title of Lieutenant General, was immediately upon Receipt of his Commission dispatch'd away.

The King's Commissioners active endeavours to raise the Country for his Majesty's Service.

In the mean time, the King's Commissioners were not idle in engaging as many as they could for his Service; and Captain Titus was sent by his Majesty to treat with Major General Brown, and such others in the City of London as he knew to be well inclined to his Interest. When he came to London and sent to Brown, he refused to have any Communication with him; and therefore he used the Mediation of Mr. Charlton, and Mr. Beverly of Lincoln's-Inn to treat with him, and they had several Conferences without any Effect; for he being a prudent, wary Man, was unwilling to hazard himself 'till he saw some Body of Men together, to busy the Army, and divert the Forces in London and Westminster. Titus then addressed himself to Mr. Mordant and the rest of his Majesty's Commissioners, and was very assitant to them. So active were these Commissioners, that most of the Nobility and Gentry of England, and Wales, were engaged by them, and a Day in July fixed for the Rising. Sir George Booth was to raise Lancashire and Cheshire; Sir Thomas Middleton, Shropshire and Flintshire; Sir John Carter, Denbighshire; The Earl of Stamford, Leicestershire; The Lord Willoughby of Parham, (who also advanced Money to buy Arms) Suffolk; Colonel Rossiter, Lincolnshire; Colonel Popham, Somersetshire and Wiltshire; and to secure Bristol and Taunton; Mr. Edward Dunch and others, Berkshire; Major General Massey, and the Lord Herbert of Worcester, and Mr. How, Gloucestershire; Sir William Compton, Sir Thomas Leverthorp and Mr. Fanshal, Hartfordshire; Mr. Mordant, Sir Francis Vincent, and Sir Adam Brown, Surrey; with many more in all Places too long to name.

The first Rising was to be of such as had never engaged on the King's Side in the late Wars, thereby to draw the Army to less Opposition; for the Declaration had no Mention of his Majesty, but was called, The Declaration of the Lords, Gentlemen and Citizens, Freeholders and Yeomen, in this once happy Nation. The Words of it were these:

Since it hath pleased Almighty God to suffer the Spirit of Division to continue in this distracted Nation, and to leave us without any settled Foundation of Religion, Liberty, and Property; the legislative Power usurped at Pleasure, and condemned; the Army raised at first for our Defence abused, and misled into unwarrantable Actions by the Cunning and Ambition of some of the superior Officers; no Face of Government appearing either in any single Person, or a Body of Men in Council lawfully constituted, to whom the Grievances of the People may with any Probability of Success be properly addressed. Therefore we being Conscious of our Duty, and sensible of our own and the Nation's Ruin, if these Distractions continue, or issue in a more fixed Oppression by some Settlement inconsistent with the Laws, Peace, and Interest of these Nations, have taken Arms in Defence of our selves, and all others who will partake with us in the Vindication and Maintenance of the Freedom of Parliaments, against all Violence whatsoever of the known Laws, Liberty, and Property of the good People of this Nation, who at present groan under illegal, arbitrary, and insupportable Taxes and Payments unknown to our Ancestors: This being our Duty to GOD and to Man, and our only Design, we cannot despair of the Blessing of him who gives Victory; nor of the chearful Concurrence of all good People; nor of the undeceived Part of the Army, whose Arrears and Increase of future Pay, and Advancement of high Command, we shall by all means procure, suffering no Imposition of Force on any Man's Conscience: And to this we doubt not but all honest Englishmen will say Amen, Amen.

But yet many of the King's Friends in all Parts were to bring in their Aids, Colonel Richard Arundel and Trelauny undertook, if his Majesty would bring five hundred Horse into Cornwall, and Arms for as many more, they would raise the other five Hundred: And Major General Egerton did as much in Staffordshire; and many others in other Parts. The Preparation could not be expedited with that Haste as was intended, so that the Day of Rising was deferred to the 1st of August, and Mr. Cooper was sent by Mr. Mordant to his Majesty to acquaint him with it; who was so soon dispatch'd, that he returned in five Days to those that sent him to let them know his Majesty would be present with them in a short time: With him Colonel Roger Whitely came into England, with some verbal Instructions to Sir George Booth, and some blank Commissions to disperse in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Flintshire: He staid no longer in London than to receive Mr. Mordant's Commands, and some of the forementioned Declarations to carry with him to Booth. Captain Titus was sent to the King, to let him know all was ready: His Majesty thereupon removed privately from Brussels to Calais, about the 1st of August, which was two Days come over.

The Declaration of Sir George Booth omitted at the time of his Rising.

Sir George Booth's Rising aided by the King's Friends from all Parts.

His Majesty removed from Brussels to Calais, to be ready if Occasion were to Days come over.

1659. Days after Titus came to him : He had in his Company only the Marquess of Ormond, the Earl of Bristol, Dr. Quatermaine, Mr. Daniel Oneal, and one Maurice Delaval, a Servant of the Marquess of Ormond's, with two other Servants, one belonging to the Earl of Bristol, and the other to Oneal ; nor did they travel thither together, but by two and two. His Majesty had only Dr. Quatermaine with him, and the first Place he came to from Brussels, was a little Village, where Monsieur Marfin met him, with whom he had much Discourse about his Affairs. Marfin accompanied his Majesty to St. Omers, where they parted ; and then he went directly to Calais, where the rest met him ; but to avoid being known, they dispersed into several Lodgings, and his Majesty had with him only Maurice to wait on him. The Dukes of York and Gloucester were at Breda, and were sent for to Brussels, but they arrived not 'till the Day the King parted from thence, and after he was gone. The Duke of York with Titus, followed his Majesty to Calais, but the Duke of Gloucester by his Majesty's Appointment, continued at Brussels, ready prepared to come over upon the first Intimation. The King staid three Days at Calais, and a Shallop was ready at Bulloign for his Transportation in Kent, upon the first News of any considerable Parties being in Arms.

The Duke of York follows from Breda.

The Main of the Design prevented by Discovery.

Sir George Booth appears with several o-

But in the Height of this Expectation, one Mr. Baron arrived from Mordant, with the ill News of the Disappointment of much of the Design in all the South and West Parts of England, which was thought to be discovered by a Letter, intercepted at Reading, from the Lady Mary Howard, about the latter End of July ; but it was known long before that Letter, to Scot, and some few other Members of the Council of State, which hastened them so much in a more than usual Care in modelling the Army, and settling the whole Militia of the Kingdom, wherein the meanest Commission-Officer in any of the Trained-Bands, Troops, or Companies, was to be approved in Parliament ; and they had privately laid a Contrivance to have Soldiers at most of the Risings of the King's Friends all over England : So that their accidental intercepting of the Lady Mary Howard's Letter, by the officious Diligence of a Post-master, was rather a Service, than a Disadvantage to his Majesty, since thereby his coming to England, which might have exposed his Person to inevitable Peril, was prevented. Notice of this Discovery could not be soon enough dispersed, to prevent the Appearance of many Gentlemen in divers Parts. The Earl of Litchfield, with Sir Adam Brown, my Lord Mordant, (so we now stile him, in Regard he here first declared his having received the Dignity of Viscount), and about twenty five others, rendezvoused near Guilford in Surrey ; but by Reason of the taking of Sir Francis Vincent, an active Servant of the Kings, there was so little Appearance, that all divided to shift for themselves. The Earl of Litchfield, and my Lord Mordant, came disguised by Water, in the common Barge from Chertsey to London, and got privately to Alderman Robinson's House, where they were for a While concealed.

The most considerable Body that got together was under Sir George Booth, who, with the Earl of Derby, the Lord Kilmory, and Major-

General Egerton, were met at the Time appointed at Warrington, at first with a small Party ; but they having the very Flower of the Gentry, and Gallantry engaged among them, their Numbers increased every Minute. Colonel Roger Whitley delivered his Message to Sir George Booth from his Majesty, and the Declarations he had received from the Lord Mordant, with an Account of his Majesty's Preparations beyond the Seas, and his Readiness to come over upon the first Notice ; which was no small Satisfaction and Joy to the whole Party, which then consisted of about five hundred Men. The first Thing they resolved, was to march towards Chester, and the first Night they marched to a Place called Tradsam, where they met Colonel Werden, who assured them that the Gates of Chester would be opened to them : And the next Day they marched thither, and took Possession of the Town, but the Castle was defended against them by Croxton, the Governour thereof, for the Parliament, who had one Company in it. The next Day, Major-General Egerton was sent with a Party to Chirk-Castle, where Sir Thomas Middleton hearing of his Approach, opened the Gates, and joyfully received him. The next Day he went with them to Wrexham, (having left his Son to command the Castle for the King), and there many came in to them. The next Day after, Colonel Whitley was sent with a Party to put a Garrison into Harding-Castle in Flintshire, which was newly left by a Party of the Parliament Soldiers, that marched from thence to Denbigh-Castle, their next Garrison, but were seized by the Country, and brought Prisoners to Sir George Booth's Party. Colonel Ireland at the same Time declared for them in Liverpoole, and Mr. Brooks, one of the present Members of the House of Commons, willing to expiate his former Mistakes, cordially joyned with them for the Freedom of his Country, and met at the first Rendezvous.

1659. there in a considerable Body.

They take Possession of Chester City, but the Castle holds out against them: Chirk-Castle delivered to them by Sir Thomas Middleton.

Col. Ireland and several others declare for them.

They at Westminster prepare for Defence, and send Lambert against Sir Geo. Booth.

The Parliament somewhat apprehensive of these Proceedings, caused all the Houses in and about London to be seized, and all the Avenues to the City to be guarded, and divers Troops and Companies to be placed in all the Way towards the West, and North-west Parts. They had every Hour News of the dispersing of several little Parties, and Lambert was ordered with a Brigade to march to suppress Sir George Booth and his Party. The Lord Mordant, as the most active Agent for his Majesty, was summoned on a great Penalty to appear ; and Mr. Edmond Dunch and Brooks, two Members of the House, whom they suspected to be engaged for the King, were on the Penalty of a hundred Pounds apiece, required to attend the Service of the House.

Mr. Nicholas Monk, a Reverend Minister, a Person of most firm Loyalty to his Majesty, and the only Brother to General Monk, came at this Time to London, in his Way to Scotland, from Sir Hugh Pollard, Sir Thomas Stukely, and other of his Majesty's Friends in the West of England. His Business was to engage his Brother in his Majesty's Cause, to promote the present Design, being directed to receive further Instructions from Sir John Greenville. He came directly to Mr. Clarges before he saw any one, and communicated his Business to him, and afterwards

Mr. Monk, a Minister, sent into Scotland, to solicit his Brother the General, to the embracing his Majesty's Interest.

1659. to Greenvile, who much encouraged his Undertaking, and shewed him two Letters he had received from his Majesty, one to General Monk, and the other to himself.

Mr. Monk negotiates with Mr. Clarges about the forefaid Business.

Greenvile earnestly pressed to have Clarges engaged, and Mr. Monk moved it to him, with a Promise of great Advantage from his Majesty upon his Restitution. Clarges replied, That he needed not these Temptations to oblige him to do his Duty; and refused to have any Discourse concerning those Matters with Sir John Greenvile at that Time, well knowing, that the least Jealousy of his Actions from those in Power, might make him useless for that future Service, which could not be done without him.

Clarges secretly conveys Mr. Monk on Shipboard, for his Transportation into Scotland.

But because all the Ways to Scotland were obstructed, he took Care to provide a Frigate for the transporting of Mr. Nicholas Monk thither, and convey'd him Safe on Shipboard, fully instructed how to manage his Negotiations with Caution, and to communicate with none but the General, except Dr. Samuel Barrow, Physician to the Army, a very discreet Gentleman, and Mr. John Price, his Chaplain: The first of which was ejected out of Trinity-College in Cambridge, for his Affection to his Majesty; and the latter, the Son of a sequestred Minister, always educated in Principles of Loyalty, a good Scholar, and an honest Man; both recommended by Clarges to the General at his first going into Scotland, to be near his Person.

His Majesty removes privately from Calais to Rouen.

The King, when he received the News from the Lord Mordant of the Disappointment of the Design, went from Calais to Bulloign, and from thence, by easy Journeys, and very privately to Rouen. The Duke of York, and Captain Titus, staid behind a While at Bulloign, and the Parts adjacent, to be ready upon all Occasions if any Thing should intervene. His Majesty at Rouen, was in Consultation which Way to move, when Dr. Alestry came to him with the News of Sir George Booth's being in Arms, with Sir Thomas Middleton, and others, with great Forces in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North-Wales, which put him in good Hopes of Success. The first Rumour of this Rising represented it very formidable, forasmuch as his Majesty's Friends that lived at a Distance from it, were willing to receive it with the greatest Advantage, so that the Numbers were believed to be much greater than they were, and by Imagination advanced to what the willing Affections of the Favourers of his Majesty's Cause would have them. His Majesty sent the Marquess of Ormond to Paris to transact some Affairs there, and went himself to St. Maloes by Caen, where he met the Earl of Bristol, and Mr. Oneal.

Thence to St. Maloes.

They at Westminster in the mean Time, were very active in dispatching Lambert on the Expedition against Booth, but first they issued forth a Proclamation to proclaim Major-General Egerton, Colonel Robert Werden, Sir George Booth, Sir Thomas Middleton, and their Adherents, Traytors and Rebels, which was commanded to be proclaimed in all Market Towns, and read in all Churches.

Major-General Massey, the Lord Her-

Major General Massey was very active in Gloucestershire, and if by an Accident of the Interception of a Letter, his Design had not been ruin'd, he had certainly taken Gloucester; 1659. and what with his own Reputation in these Parts, and the Assistance of the Lord Herbert of Worcester, Colonel Barrow, Captain Glainford, and others of the King's Friends, they would have got together about three thousand Men, Miners and others, out of the Forest of Dean, and from about Stroud-Waters, and other Places. There was in Gloucester a Troop of the Army's Horse, under one Dale, and a Militia-Troop, commanded by one Crofts, who, upon this Discovery, caused three hundred Foot to be presently raised, and sent a Party of Horse to take the Lord Herbert, Massey, Barrow and Glainford: They took the Lord Herbert, and brought him to Gloucester; Barrow and Glainford defended themselves in Barrow's House, and upon Parol, to render themselves at Gloucester, were not taken. Massey and his Servant being taken Prisoners, Massey himself was set on a Horse, and a good stout Trooper set behind him to hold him in his Arms; two rode on each Side, and some Troopers before his Horse, and others behind: It was about the Close of the Night, the Evening very dark and tempestuous, with Rain and Hail, insomuch that when they were going down a very steep Hill by Nimpsfield Road, about ten Miles from Gloucester, the Way to Bath, Massey's Horse, with the Man that rode behind him, fell headlong all together, and tumbled down that steep Hill, whereby it happened that the Fellow let go his Hold, and most of the Rest also; so that all the Prisoners, except the Lord Herbert, and Massey's Servant, escaped.

1659. Worcester, and others, for the King in Gloucester.

The Lord Herbert taken.

And Major General Massey.

Massey escapes, together with several other Prisoners.

The Parliament sent to Dunkirk, for three Regiments to strengthen the Army; and Colonel Zanchy brought out of Ireland his Regiment of Horse, and Axtel's Regiment of Foot, which landing at Anglesey, marched to join with Lambert, who at his first March from London, had not above fifteen hundred, but by Conjunction of several Troops and Companies that met him, increased to above five Thousand before he engaged: Sir George Booth had not Half the Number, and those he had were without any Order or Discipline, because many of them being Noblemen and Gentlemen of Quality, were not without great Emulation, every one aspiring his Command, whilst no Body obeyed. Sir George Booth having Intelligence of Lambert's drawing near to him, thought to have got a Day's March before him into Lancashire, to have increased his Numbers; and to gain Time, he and Sir Thomas Middleton sent a Trumpeter with two Ministers, to shew the Ground of their raising an Army, and desired a Treaty to save Effusion of Blood. To which Lambert agreed, on Condition they would first lay down their Arms, and surrender to him the Garrisons in their Power. To this there was no Reply; but some of Lambert's Men pressed so hard the next Morning upon Booth, that at a Bridge near Northwich, a sharp Encounter was made between the Forces of each Party. The Boothians with much Courage defended the Pass, till they were over-powered by Numbers. Captain Morris, a gallant, Loyal Gentleman was killed, and some few others of Booth's Party; of Lambert's very few fell, and those that did, of no great Note; all the Taken Prisoner at Newport-Pannel.

Sir George, although he had the good Fortune at that Time to escape, was not long free, being seized at Newport-Pannel in a Disguise, as he was riding towards London, in Order to his Transportation into some Foreign Part.

The Management of this Rising censured by many.

The Curious, that made Remarks on this generous Undertaking, as commonly Wiser in the Discourse, than Execution of any great Design, did much censure the Conduct of it. They said, that they had many Opportunities to have ruined their Enemies, but omitted all; That Colonel Zanchy from Ireland, landing in Anglesey, might have been met, and with good Probability of Success fought with, e'er he could have joyned with Lambert, they being with all their Force betwixt him and them; and that Colonel Lilburn, who was gathering Men together in Yorkshyre, might easily, by any small Force from Lancashyre, have been broken, and hindred in his Levies; and that many other little Parties, which in small Numbers came from several Parts, might have been met and dispersed, before they united; and that one Blow given to any one of them, would have added so much to their Reputation, that it might have brought great Accessions to their Party. Others were of Opinion, that nothing was more destructive to his Majesty, than these Plots and Contrivances of Rising for him; and that the best Resolution he could have taken, since the End of the first War, was to have fate in Expectation of some favourable Advantage to himself, from the Division of his Enemies: For what could new raised Men do against experienced and successful Soldiers? And where the late King with all his Strength could not prevail, Parties could less expect to conquer. But doubtless this was a great Mistake; for it was nothing else but the restless and invincible Spirit of the Royal Party, that by keeping the Usurpers in a perpetual Distraction and Alarm, hindred them from proceeding to a final Establishment of their Power; and supported the very Life and Credit of the Cause. And certainly, the Generosity of those Noble Persons cannot be enough commended, since they valued no Hazard, in Respect of their Duty to their Sovereign, and the Vindication of the Laws and Liberty of their Country, and have left such an Example of Loyalty to their Posterity, as we hope will be maintained, as long as the Fame of their Vertues and Honour shall endure.

General Monk preparing to have marched into England, and joyned with Sir Geo. Booth.

General Monk in Scotland, was so much prevailed upon, by the Report of Sir George Booth's prosperous Success in his Enterprize, and the Importunity of his Brother, Nicholas Monk, that he resolved to march into England, in Pursuance of Booth's Declaration, which was very suitable to his own Inclinations.

He consulted in this Matter, besides his Brother, only Major Ralph Knight, Major of his own Regiment of Horse, Captain Jeremiah Smith likewife of his own Regiment, Dr. Samuel Barrow, 1659. Physician to the Army, Dr. John Price his Chaplain, and Dr. Thomas Gumble, then Chaplain to the Council of Scotland, in Regard he had many fe- ditious Officers in his Army, who were Spies upon all his Actings, and therefore was obliged to be very wary, and circumspect in his Proceed- ings; insomuch, that when Colonel Atkins, a Royalist of his ancient Acquaintance, came into Scotland to him, about the same Errand that his Brother did, Monk (for Fear of awakening the Jealousy of the Faction about him), durst not shew him any Countenance or Respect, but rather the contrary, sending him away somewhat discouraged: When all was ready for his March, and a Declaration to that End prepared, he de- murred for two Days, upon the Stop of the English Packet, in Expectation of Intelligence from his Agent Clarges, from whom he two Days after received the fatal News of the Defeat of Sir George Booth.

Is diverted by the News of his Defeat.

The King being still at St. Maloes, in Prepara- tion of a Vessel to transport him into England, had the first Notice of these Misfortunes, from Mr. Brett, an English Benedictine Monk, which in a while after was confirmed to him by the Marquess of Ormond, who came to him from Paris, with Particulars of it: The King (always present to himself in the most difficult Accidents of his Life) discovered not much Alteration at this, though it seemed a Cross, that it might very well no less sensibly affect him, than whatever had yet hap- pened to him improsperous, and giving Check to his Fortune; because hereby all his Hopes became desperate, of his being ever restored to his Sub- jects, without such foreign Force as should be able to afford Assistance and Supply to their Endeavours for him, by holding his Enemies so long in Play, 'till by Accession of his Friends, they might be strong enough to resist their greatest Power and Force: Yet even in this Reflection, he had many Doubts in his Mind, for that many late Suc- cesses of the English in Flanders, had made them seem invincible to those, from whom his Majesty was to expect Assistance. But since now nothing but Foreign Aid could visibly raise his Hopes, he re- solved seriously to apply himself to the Treaty now in Agitation, upon the Borders between France and Spain, about a Peace betwixt those two Crowns, which was managed by Cardinal Ma- zarine, and Don Lewis D' Haro, the two Chief Ministers of the two Kings, to which his Majesty had an Eye long since, not doubting but he should in some Measure be comprehended in it, so as to receive Assistance from those Princes his Allies, as soon as they should be freed from their Embarrassments; and in Prosecution hereof, he had commanded Sir Henry Bennet, a Person of great Prudence and Address, his Embassadour Resident in Spain, not to fail to attend Don Lewis D' Haro to the Treaty, and to be pre- sent there to negotiate his Affairs. The Treaty being near Conclusion, his Majesty, for fear it should be ended before he came thither, made all possible Haste to repair to those Parts; and in order thereunto, took his Journey forthwith from St. Maloes to Reimes, where he met Sir George Carteret, and after some small Stay with him, went from thence to Namur, and there his Company di- vided,

His Majesty then immediately hasting by Post to the Treaty, continued incognito (as he had done all his Journey) 'till he came within three Leagues of Fontarabia, where he was attended by Bennet with Coaches to augment his Equipage; and from thence he resumed his State, and went in Publick.

And is honourably entertained by the Spaniards.

He was met by the Baron of Batteville, a Person of great Honour and Civility (Governour of Fontarabia) with a Troop of Horse, a Mile and a Half without the Town; and when he came near it, all the Guns were discharged, and Don Lewis himself met him within the Gate. During his Stay there, he was entertained in as splendid a Manner as the Time and Place would handsomely admit. And during the Treaty, he had frequent Conferences with Don D' Haro, and was every Day visited by him.

The Governing Power in England employed at the same Time to attend on Cardinal Mazarine at this Treaty, and to promote their Concerns, Lockhart, who had continued ever since Oliver's Death, Extraordinary Embassadour in France. The Cardinal lay at St. John de Luz, the nearest Town to Spain, on the French Borders, where he shewed so much Countenance and Respect to Lockhart, that the King thought it not decent to give him a Visit; but he received many from divers of the French Nobility.

General Monk sends a Letter to the House, signifying his Willingness to be dismissed from his Command.

General Monk was inwardly very much troubled at these Disasters; and the more, because he found himself every Day more and more incapable to remedy them: For the House displaced Colonel Daniel, the Governour of St. Johnstons, and many other Officers whom he much trusted, and were about to remove the Rest; so that seeing which Way Things were likely to tend, and thinking it better to resign of his own Accord, than to be worm'd out of his Command; or at least remain but like the Image of a General, and serve only for a Prop to other Mens Designs, he sent a Letter upon the Third of September, to Lenthall the Speaker, to be communicated to the Parliament, to desire a Dismission from his Command; pretending, That he was infirm in his Health, and had long continued in that remote Country; and therefore requesting, now that all Insurrections, which threatened Disturbances to the Peace of the Nations, were allayed, he might be permitted to return into his own Country, to end his Days in Quiet.

This Letter, though it was not sent to Clarges to be delivered, as usually all his Packets were, because he suspected he would have opposed that Resolution of his, and been very backward and dilatory in the Delivery of the Letter; yet Mr. Nicholas Monk giving him Intimation of it, the Matter was so ordered, that the Letter came to his Hands, and by him delivered to the Speaker, with whom he dealt so effectually, that he agreed to delay the offering of it to be read for ten Days, 'till a Packet came from Scotland to contradict it: Yet Clarges was put to great Perplexity in this Business; for Vane, Salway, and those that affected not, or suspected the General (having private Advice of this Letter) often call'd to have it read; and had not earnest and dextrous Prevention been used to divert the House with other Business, by some that loved the General well, and were prepared by Clarges, he had by this Despondency rendred himself incapable of doing that, for which he seemed by PROVIDENCE especially chosen and mark'd out.

The Defeat of Sir George Booth and his Party, heightened much the Spirits of the chief Officers of the Army, who began now to contrive how to restore the Military Power to its former Greatness; which was somewhat of late lessened by the Parliament, and in Designation to be wholly subjected to them. To effect this, there was a strict and private Correspondence held between some of the Officers at London, and Lambert, and those with him in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Parts adjacent. The Difficulty was, how to engage the inferiour Officers (who were somewhat affected with their immediate Dependence on the House, by receiving Commissions from the Hands of the Speaker) to obviate this, it was advised to attempt nothing at the General-Council of Officers in London; but to begin with those of Lambert's Brigade, as most exalted by their late good Fortune; and therefore apter to be seduced by any plausible Advantages of Power. These therefore were all conven'd to the Number of Fifty at Derby, the 16th of September; the first Thing on which they began their Debate, was the Constitution of the Army; the Unity, Discipline, and Conduct whereof, they said was invaded by a Party of Neuters and Malignants: They complained of several Miscarriages in the Civil Administrations of Government, and of the Inactivity and Backwardness of Persons in Authority and Trust in the Counties, and the Defection of many Corporations, both which appeared in the Time of the late Insurrection. They also seemed much to resent the Parliaments Unwillingness to prosecute the Proposals of the Army at their first Sitting, as an Expedient for Settlement, with many other Things of like Concernment. These Things were artificially insinuated into the Minds of the inferiour Officers, who were easily enough drawn to an Opinion of their own Power, and to think themselves qualified to give Laws to all but themselves.

However, these Matters were at first only treated of in Generals, it being moved and agreed, that Colonel Zanchy, Colonel Michael, Major Creed, and some few others, should meet as Committee, for the rest, to reduce them into Form, which was accordingly done. Lambert himself went privately to London, and Lieutenant-Colonel Duckenfield, a great Creature of his, presently followed, to acquaint the General Council of Officers with these Proceedings; and shortly after, the whole Matter being digested into the Form

The said Letter through Clarges's Persuasion, is kept off by the Speaker from being read.

The Army begins to contrive the Recovery and Advancement of their Power.

Consultations among the Officers of the Army, promoted by Lambert, in Dislike of some Miscarriages of the Junto.

Their Designs concluded to be drawn up into the Form of Petition.

1659. Form of a Petition, was sent up in a Letter inclosed to Colonel Ashfield, Colonel Cobbet, and Duckensfield, by whom, or any one, or more of them, it was to be delivered to Fleetwood, to be communicated to the General Council of Officers; and at the same Time, when this was sent to London, an Officer was dispatched with a Duplicate of it to General Monk, and a Letter with it, to desire his Concurrence, and that the Officers of his Army might joyn with them; which Letter was subscribed by fourteen of the chief Officers employed under Lambert.

Haslerig had secret Intimation of these Consultations at Derby; and the next Day after the Petition came to London, which was on the 22d of September, he moved the Parliament, at their first Sitting, against it, exclaiming with much Earnestness against the Officers of the Army, who, (he said,) were attempting Alterations in the Government, to the setting up a single Person over them.

This put the House into a Jealousy of Lambert; to whom, in their private Discourses, they attributed the whole Contrivance; and though he outwardly appeared Passive in it, they said he aspired to succeed Cromwell: And because it was not yet time to effect his Purpose, in his own Person, he would set up Fleetwood to be General of the Armies in England, Scotland and Ireland, and establish himself in the next Command to him, to be thereby able, with less Envy, to compass his Ends. For Fleetwood, they said, was of an easy Nature, and would be contented with the Name of General, allowing Lambert the Power of it, 'till he should find a fair Occasion, to assume it in his own Right; and when he should have so gotten the Sword, he would not long want the Scepter.

Fleetwood confessed he had the Copy of a Petition, but seemed much perplexed at Haslerig's laying such an Imputation on the Officers of the Army, and endeavoured to justify their Innocence, as tending nothing less than what was alledged; but all he said could not allay the Heat raised by Haslerig, inasmuch, that they ordered, that Ashfield, Cobbet and Duckensfield, whom he affirmed to have the Original in their Hands, should that Afternoon attend the House with it, and appointed Fleetwood to give them Notice thereof, and to bring with him the Copy he had. Monk made no Progress in Scotland in this Affair, nor did he think fit to call together his Officers about it; but some of them that were Anabaptists, attempted privately to get Subscriptions, 'till they heard of the severe Reflection that was made upon it by the House: Whom in the Afternoon, the three Officers mentioned, attended with their Petition; the Substance and Scope of which was, to desire the Parliament to make Fleetwood Commander in Chief of the Army, and Lambert next under him; and to proceed to a Settlement according to their late Petition and Address, which they complained was neglected.

After the reading of this Paper, the House adjourned 'till the next Morning, and ordered them to resume the Debate of it, and that no other Business should intervene: And at their Meeting, they Voted, That to have any more General Officers in the Army, than are already settled by the Parliament, is needless, chargeable, and dangerous to the Commonwealth; and that Fleetwood shall acquaint them with this Resolve.

They had it under Consideration, to have imprisoned those that brought the Petition; but because the chief and most remarkable Design of it tended to set up some new General Officers in the Army, they thought it enough to declare against it.

Fleetwood, the next Day at a Meeting with many of the Leading Officers at his own House, informed them of the Parliament's Displeasure signified in their late declarative Vote against the Petition and Proposals, and they thereupon resolved to decline the insisting thereon; but agreed, that some of their Number should draw up somewhat in Writing of a more moderate Nature, to be presented to the House, to profess an Adherence to their Authority, in Opposition to the King and his Party, (whom they stiled the Common Enemy;) and that they would stand by them in the Settlement of the Commonwealth against all Disturbances whatsoever: And that this should be prepared and brought to be read and considered by a General Council of Officers to meet for that Purpose, the 27th of September, in the Chappel at Somerset-House.

And the said Petition was at the appointed Time prepared, and brought into the General Council by those to whom the Care of framing it was committed, with a long Preamble, and many Proposals far different from what was expected by many that were then present; for there seemed at their former meeting, to be a general Sense and Opinion, that they should humble themselves for what they had before done with the Permission and Consent of their Masters, and make some Declaration of their Intention, never to interpose more in Matters of Government. But contrary to this, they arraigned them for what they had done against the Petition of Lambert's Brigade; and for what (they said), had been groundlessly, and without Cause alledged against them; and were so far from acknowledging their Offences, thereby to recover the good Opinion of the House towards them, that they justified their own Proceedings with a Kind of Reprehension of those that mis-informed the House concerning it. Colonel Okey, Colonel Hacker, Colonel Sanders, Major Daberon, Major Barton, and Major Breman, with many others, did much oppose the carrying on of this Representation, which retarded the Progress of it. And some of the dissenting Officers writ to General Monk, and sent him a Copy of what was brought in, with all the Debates thereupon, desiring him to imploy his Credit with Fleetwood and Lambert to put a Stop to it; as that which would, if not prevented, put an irreparable Breach betwixt the Parliament and the Army.

Monk was somewhat at a Stand to know how to behave himself in this Matter, but to avoid Suspicion, he writ to Fleetwood a courteous Letter of his Opinion of the whole Affair, but insisted chiefly on that Part of the Petition, wherein it was proposed, That no Officer or Soldier should be cashier'd, or dismiss'd from their Places, without a due Proceeding at a Court-Martial, or by his own Consent, except in Case of Reducement or Disbanding; desiring they would add, (after the Words Court-Martial), or by Order of the Commander in Chief of the Army upon the Place; alledging, That although

The Officers resolve upon more moderate Proposals.

Another Petition brought into the Council of Officers more high than the former.

Monk writes his Sense of it in a Letter to Fleetwood.

1659. the removing or displacing of Officers or Soldiers, otherwise than by Sentence of Court-Martial, was a thing rarely practised: Yet if a general or the supreme Authority, should be understood to be restrained therein, it might encourage the more inferior Officers and Soldiers to affront the Superior, and the General himself, and would in time, make the Army a kind of separate Corporation from the Parliament.

This Letter came not to Fleetwood, till the greater Part of the Officers had agreed to the Representation to be presented to the House. But Monk's Intention was to make his Advantage of this Division; and to that End, sent his Brother Nicholas to London to Clarges to authorize him principally to acquaint such of the Members as he thought most fit, That if they would assert their own Authority, he would march into England, to justify it against any Opposition.

During this Debate at London of the general Officers, all imaginable Endeavours were used by the Dissenters, to protract and lengthen the Time, but they were by much over-numbered: And the Petition was signed by two hundred and thirty Commission-Officers of the Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland, who were then in and about London.

The leading Members had from Time to Time Notice of the Progress of this Petition, and the Matter of it, so that to prevent the Officers of the Army, even in the most reasonable of their Demands, they made many Orders concerning Pay of the Soldiers, and Mariners, and Provisions for the maimed Soldiers, and Orphans, and Widows, of such as were killed in their Service. To the Soldiers they ordered, that all the Arrears, as well of those of the Army, as the Militia-Troops and Companies, should be paid out of the Moiety of such Monies as should be raised by the Sale, or other Disposition of the Estates of Delinquents sequestered, and to be sequestered upon the late Insurrection, and out of one Moiety of Money to be raised by the Sale of Forests and Chaces, excepting New Forest, and the Forest of Deane; and excepting such Timber and Trees as should be thought fit to be reserved and made use of, for the use of the Commonwealth. And to the Officers and Mariners of the Navy, they order'd the other Moiety of the Money to be raised upon Delinquents Estates: And also that Hampton-Court House, Parks, and Somerset-House, (except the Chapel which was reserved for a French Congregation) and all other Manors, Parks, Houses, and Lands contained in the several Acts for Sale of the King and Queen's Lands, should be sold, and the Money go to that Use. And for the maimed Soldiers, Orphans and Widows, of such as were slain in their Service, they order'd the Committees, formerly constituted for Inspections into the publick Treasuries, to pay two Months Pay to them, and to take care to put such of their Children to be Apprentices as were fit for it. They likewise, to gain themselves the more general Esteem, considered of some Ways to satisfy part of the Debts contracted to raise Arms against the King, at the Beginning of the War, upon the publick Faith of the Parliament, which had been long neglected; and in order thereunto, they ordered, that the other 1659. Moiety of the Money to be raised by the Sale of the Forests, (except as aforesaid) should be employed towards the Payment and Satisfaction of those Debts. The House imagined that these their Proceedings would so far satisfy the Generality of the Officers of the Army, as to divert them from the Delivery of their Petition; and many of the most active Members in Credit, with the leading Men, did what they could to hinder it, but could not prevail.

The Insolency of the Proposals therein contained, gave our present Senators reason to suspect their Authority to be of no long Continuance; but in regard, many Officers of the Army dissented from the representing and proposing Party, they imagined the rest would not be very hasty to make a Rupture: Therefore they resolved to assert their Power at any hazard; in order whereunto they had many sharp Debates about this Representation and Petition; but in the End they concluded with Moderation, and directed their Speaker to call the Petitioners into the House, and acquaint them, "That the Parliament had read their Representation and Petition, and taking notice of the good Expressions therein of their Affections and Faithfulness to this Parliament and Commonwealth, had commanded him to give them the Thanks of their House for them; and to let them know, that they had already taken into Consideration the Relief of the poor Widows, Orphans, and maimed Soldiers, to whom Pensions had been formerly allowed; and had also settled a way for Satisfaction of the Arrears due to the Officers and Soldiers, and would endeavour to bring the same to speedy Effect".

Desborow gives an Account of this Answer to a General Council of Officers who assembled that Afternoon on purpose. It was not unknown to them that the House repented their Address, and that in such a Degree, that it was evident they intended to alter the Constitution of the Army. To provide against this, they thought fit to strengthen their Party, by getting more Subscriptions to their Representation and Petition, and agreed upon the Form of a Letter to be sent for that End to Ireland, and another to Scotland, and to every Regiment in England.

The General had Intimation of this Letter from Clarges before it came to his Hands, with a full Narrative of the Occurrences that passed upon the Delivery of the Representation, which made him resolve to admit of no Subscriptions in Scotland. And when the Letter came to his Hands, he returned in Answer to it: That he thought it unfit to have any Subscriptions made to that, to which now the Parliament had given an Answer, lest it should be understood to make a Party against them. And in pursuance of this Resolution, he sent Orders to all the Regiments under his Command, to forbid them to subscribe.

1659. a Letter to them, (which they received two Days after the Delivery of the Representation of the Army) to acquaint them with the peaceable Condition of Scotland, in Obedience to their Government, wherein he moved something in Favour of some of his Officers, and commended the Temper of his Army: They returned him Answer the same Day with the Thanks of the House, and let him know, The high Esteem they had of the Services, which with so much Valour, Prudence, and Faithfulness, he had performed; and that they had granted the Desire of his Letters, with Assurance to him and his Officers and Soldiers under his Command, of Returns of Favours from the Parliament answerable to their Merit.

And complemented by a Letter with gratulatory Expressions for his good Service.

Upon the 10th of the said Month, they took the Proposals in the Armies Representation into Debate; and answered the same so little to the Content of the Presenters, as filled the Army with strange Rumours. On the other side the Parliament, to provide against all Accidents, consulted, if any Breach should be made upon their Government, how to leave them that did it as destitute as might be of Means and Authority to maintain themselves in such Actings: And since nothing could more weaken them in such Confusion than want of Money, they for a time deferred their further Consideration on the Proposals of the Representation, and made an Act against the raising of Money upon the People without Consent of Parliament.

A Letter to Okey, the chief Cause of the speedy putting forth of this Act.

That which chiefly provoked them to the hasty making of this Law, was a Letter which had been communicated to them under the Hands of Lambert, Desborow, Berry, Kelsey, Ashfield, Cobbet, Packer, Barrow and Creed, directed to Colonel Okey. It was much to the same Purpose with that sent to General Monk before-mentioned, and in the same Form: This Letter was by accident delivered to Okey; for there being many Letters signed, to be sent to the several Regiments, which were left to be disposed of by Fleetwood's Secretary, he, amongst others, directed one to Okey; who, as soon as he had it, shewed it to Sir Arthur Haslerig, and he to the House; who looked upon the Contents thereof, to be such as tended to the fomenting of the Army against them; but respited the Consideration of it till the next Morning, which was the 12th of October.

Mr. Monk arrives from Scotland with private Orders from the Gen. to Clarges.

That Night Mr. Nicholas Monk arrived (after not above four Days Journey from Scotland) and had Orders from the General to tell Clarges, That he was resolved, if the Parliament would be resolute in asserting their own Authority against the Army, he would assist them in it, and if required thereunto, march into England in their Defence.

The Commissions of Lambert, Desborow and others voted void.

Clarges, early the next Morning, communicated this to Walton, Haslerig and Scot, who were so much encouraged by it, that at the first Sitting of the House, they moved, that the Doors might be shut, that none of their Members might go out; and then after a long and brisk Debate, they ordered that the Commissions of Lambert, Desborow, Berry, Kelsey, Ashfield, Cobbet, Packer, and Barrow, who subscribed the said Letter should be void.

They had it in motion, to declare at the same time, that the next immediate Officers to them should have their Commands conferred on them, but delayed that till the next Day, yet ordered the Names of those Officers to be brought to them; and before they parted, they made an Act, appointing Commissioners for the Government of the Army; wherein they first repealed and made void the A C T, Constituting Charles Fleetwood, Lieutenant-General, and Commander in Chief of the Forces raised, and to be raised by Authority of Parliament, within England and Scotland, and all Power and Authority thereby given: And that all the Armies for the future should be governed by Commissioners, in the Place and Stead of a Lieutenant-General. These Commissioners were Fleetwood, Monk, Ludlow, Haslerig, Morley, Walton, and Overton, who were impowered to execute all and singular the Powers and Authorities, incident or belonging to the Office of Lieutenant-General, from the 11th of October, 1659. to the 22d of February, 1659, &c.

An Act appointing Commissioners for Government of the Army, and removing Fleetwood from the Chief Command thereof.

They likewise ordered the Serjeant at Arms to carry the Orders for Discharge of the said Officers Commissions, to the respective Persons whom it concerned: And because Lambert was the most considerable Person, and the next Officers to him were Men they knew, and in whom they confided, they immediately ordered Camfield, his Lieutenant-Colonel, to have the Command of his Regiment; and that Skepper the Major should be advanced to be Lieutenant-Colonel, and Captain Bradshaw to be Major of the Regiment. Three of these lately constituted Commissioners for the Government of the Army, met at Night, in the Speaker's Chamber at Westminster, and ordered Colonel Morley's and Colonel Mose's Regiments, as a Guard to the Parliament, who possessed themselves of the Palace-Yard, and the great Hall. Lambert on the other side, seeing what was like to become of him, if Matters were driven on at that rate, as they were begun against him, thought best to play his Game, while it was in his Power to prevent; and to that End drew some Regiments together, who march'd to King's-street, and possessed themselves of all the Avenues to the Parliament House.

Lambert removed from his Regiment, and the Officers under him successively advanced.

Col. Morley and Mose ordered with their Regiments to Guard the House. Lambert, with the Regiment that adjoyned here, stops the Passages to the Parliament House.

In the Morning the Speaker came with his Coach towards the House; but at the Entry into the Palace-Yard, he was stoppt by Lieutenant-Colonel Duckenfield; and after a little Expostulation was forced to return. The Soldiers on both Sides kept their Station till towards the Evening in a Posture of Hostility, ready to have fired one against the other, only expecting when the Word would be given for Onset; so that it was verily thought the Business would have come to a sharp Conflict between them: But they were better advised, insomuch that the Council of State meeting at Whitehall, and ordering all of them to draw off to their Quarters, both Parties agreed thereunto, and marched away that Night: However, Lambert's Party obtained their Desire; forasmuch as none of the Members were permitted that Day to assemble; and for the future Fleetwood took Care always to keep good Guards at the Door of the Parliament House, to prevent them 1659. them from meeting. The next Day divers of the Chief Officers of the Army met at Whitehall, and chose ten Persons as a Council for carrying on the Affairs and Government of the Commonwealth, 'till further Order. These were Fleetwood, Lambert, Whitlock, Sir Henry Vane, Desborow, Sir James Harrington, Major Salway, Berry, Sydenham, and Archibald Johnson a Scotchman, commonly called the Laird of Warreston; and at Wallingford-House, the same Day, the General Council of Officers agreed, that Fleetwood should be Commander in Chief over all the Armies; that Lambert should be the next Chief Officer under him; and Desborow Commissary General of the Horse; and that all the Officers to be constituted in the Army, should be nominated by Sir Henry Vane, Fleetwood, Lambert, Desborow, Ludlow, and Berry; but in special Manner they took Care for the preparing of Articles of War, for the good Government and Discipline of the Army, as that which would be most necessary for their Consistence. In this they were very industrious; and in all the time since the first modelling of their Armies, their Discipline was so exact, that the Carriage of their Soldiery was very tolerable to the People; and that made their Enormities, in reference to the Government, less obnoxious to vulgar Censure. Some mentioned General Monk to be considered in their Distribution of Offices, but were not hearken'd to; and those that opposed it, assured the rest, that he had little Power over the Officers of his Army; and if he disagreed to their Counsels, he might easily be displaced: They had not yet received his Resolution concerning the Subscriptions about which they writ, to be made by his Officers to their Representation and Petition, and therefore were ignorant of his Dissent from their Actions: So that in Confidence of his Concurrence, they dispatched Colonel Cobbet to him, with a large Narrative of the Reasons of their Proceedings.

The prevailing Party of the Army no great Favourers of General Monk.

The Lord Mordant, and some others of the King's Friends lying at Calais, immediately upon the News of these Disorders in England, dispatched Mr. Nicholas Armorer to his Majesty who was then at Fontarabia, industriously soliciting for Supplies of Men and Money, of which he had large Promises from the Spaniards; and for the defraying the Expences of his Journey, he received from Don Lewis D' Haro, a Present of twenty thousand Crowns: His Majesty had once a Purpose to have gone directly to Madrid; but upon the Advice brought to him by Mr. Armorer, in hopes that something might fall out in England to his Advantage, he chose to return to Bruxels. The Earl of St. Albans coming up to the Borders to the King, just upon the Dissolution of the Treaty, met his Majesty at Bayon, in his Return from Fontarabia: Cardinal Mazarine being before departed from St. John de Luz, not having received any Visit from his Majesty before his Departure.

The Earl of St. Albans conferred much with the King whilst he staid with him, which was not long, and then he went to Paris, whither the King followed him incognito by easy Journeys; and after some Stay there, went from thence to Bruxels.

At this time such of the King's Friends as had Opportunity, were very Active in his Service; amongst whom the Endeavours of Mr. Evelin of Say's Court near Deptford in Kent, is not to be omitted, who having some Acquaintance with Colonel Herbert Morley, one of the five Commissioners for the Command of the Army, whose Birth, Education, and Interest in his Country, rendered him unlikely to be cordially inclined to prostitute himself to the Ruin of his Country; he attempted with just and honest Arguments, to draw him to the Royal Party, to which he believed he might be very useful, as having a greater Credit than any of his Party in Suffex, where he lived, in case his Majesty should Land there, and having also a good Influence upon the Fleet, and two of the Army Regiments.

Morley, after some Hesitation, was persuaded by Mr. Evelin to return to his Allegiance, and he desired him to intercede with the King for a Pardon to himself and some few others of his Relations, which he named, and then departed into his Country, and gave him Notice how to correspond further with him.

The Council of Officers had frequent Meetings at Whitehall, and a Juncto of the wisest of them were in deep Consultation how to make such a Frame of Government as should be durable and lasting against all Attempts whatsoever. They found most of the Gentry in England to be some way or other involved in the late Endeavours for the King, and were advising of a way to seize all their Estates, and divide them amongst their own Party; whereby the Riches of the Nation, the most powerful of all Interests, would be absolutely changed into the Hands of Persons irreconcilable to Monarchy. This was such Advice, as if it had succeeded, might have proved fatal, and laid a Foundation to Slavery, never to have been subverted.

The Council of Officers consulted about a Frame of Government.

The General Council, on the 26th of this Month, nominated twenty three Persons to be intrusted with the Management of Publick Affairs, whom they called a Committee of Safety; and the next Day they invited them to sit, and gave them Powers and Instructions; of which the Chief were,

A certain Number of Persons called to take upon them the Government, under the Title of a Committee of Safety. Their Instructions.

1. To execute all the Powers of the late Council of State, together with Authority to call all Delinquents to account, that were in the late Insurrection, and to proceed to a bringing them to Justice, and to give Indemnity to all Persons that had acted for the Service of the Commonwealth, since the Year 1649.
2. To oppose and suppress all Rebellions and Insurrections.
3. To treat with Foreign States and Princes.
4. To raise the Militia in the several Counties.
5. To dispose of all Places of Trust that are void, and to remove such as are scandalous.
6. To make Sale and Compositions for all Delinquents Estates.

The

1659. The Names of these Governours, were Bulstrode Whitlock, lately made Keeper of their Great Seal; Fleetwood, Lambert, Desborow, Steel, Chancellor of Ireland; Sir Henry Vane, Ludlow, Sydenham, Salway, Walter Strickland, Berry, Lawrence, Sir James Harrington, the Laird of Warreston, Alderman Ireton, Tichborn, Hewson, Clark, Bennet, Colonel Lilburn, Cornelius Holland, Henry Brandriff, and Robert Thompson.

The Exorbitancy of their Actions somewhat restrained by the Mixture of some moderate Men among them. These unreasonable Men, impatient of all Government, thought by these Insinuations, to silence all Gainfayers, and to make the People believe, they could frame any Government, and not be obliged to submit to it. Their Confidence was great, and their frequent Invasion of several Constitutions so successful, that they thought they were not by any to be opposed, in the most extravagant of their Actings; yet in this Design of theirs, they had the better grounded Hope, in Regard Vane, Whitlock and Salway, and some others of the most Prudent of their Party, assisted in their Councils.

Whitlock indeed, was much censured for his Conjunction with them; but some wise Men, that marked his Demeanour, and the Moderation he used, did believe, that if he had not in a great Measure restrained the Exorbitancy of their Intentions, they had in the short Time of their Tyranny, done much Mischief to many of the King's Friends.

The Substance of General Monk's Letters to Fleetwood and Lambert. That which put the greatest Check to their Career, and gave some Life to the fainting Hopes of all good Men, was the Arrival of Letters from General Monk in Scotland, to Fleetwood and Lambert, which came to them the twenty-eighth of October in the Evening. He complained therein, Of their Violation of Faith to the Parliament, and declared his Resolution to endeavour to restore them to their Power, against all Opposition whatsoever.

Clarges dispatched away into Scotland by the Grandees of the Army, together with Col. Talbot, to solicit Monk to a Treaty. Fleetwood, Lambert and Desborow, immediately met at Whitehall in much Confusion, and about Twelve at Night they sent Major Haynes to desire Clarges to come to them; who, when he came, after some Question of his Knowledge of the General's Proceedings, (to which he made very wary Answers,) they desired him to go into Scotland with Colonel Talbot, (whose Regiment was then at Edinburgh), to prevail with Monk for a Treaty of Mediation, to prevent the Effusion of Blood. They said, They chose Talbot to accompany him, because he was very grateful to the General.

Clarges was very glad of this Opportunity to get away, (for he feared to be much worse treated,) and they were so pressing for his Departure, that they allowed him but three Hours Preparation for his Journey.

Monk well inform'd of all Passages in England. In the mean Time, Monk in Scotland, had by an Express from Clarges, which came to him the 17th of October, received exact Information of the Interruption of the Parliament; and at several times before, he had Notice of all the Proceedings introductory to it, which made him expect no less, and therefore gave him Time to prepare for what happened.

What Forces he had, and how disposed. He had in Scotland at this Time ten Regiments of Foot compleat, each consisting of a thousand Soldiers, besides Officers; except four Companies, which had been drawn into England, a little before, upon the Alarm of Sir George Booth's Rising; his Numbers of Horse were but small, having had two Regiments of them likewise removed upon the same Occasion; so that there remained with him but two Regiments of Horse, viz. his own, and Colonel Philip Twisleton's, and one Regiment of Dragoons, commanded by Major-General Morgan. The Foot were dispersed at great Distances; eight Companies of his own Regiment lay at Edinburgh, and two of them at Dalkeith, where his Residence usually was: All Colonel Talbot's Regiment was quartered in Edinburgh; nine Companies of Colonel Wilks's Regiment were in the Citadel at Leith, and one of them in the Castle at Edinburgh; nine Companies of Colonel Read's Regiment were at Sterlin, and the tenth in England; eight Companies of Colonel Overton's Regiment at Dundee, and two of them in England; Colonel Daniel's Regiment lay at St. Johnston's; Colonel Sawries's Regiment at Aire; Colonel Cobbet's at Glasgow; nine Companies of Colonel Fairfax's Regiment at Aberdeen, and the other in England; and Part of Colonel Smith's Regiment at Inverness; and the rest of the Garrisons in the Highlands: The Horse and Dragoons lay in several Places near the Foot-Quarters; but at such Distances as might not incommode the Country.

The late Commissioners of Nomination, whilst they sat at Whitehall, had much changed the Officers in all the Regiments both of Horse and Foot, which raised great Discontents amongst them: They had given Colonel Daniel's Regiment to Pierfon his Lieutenant-Colonel, an Anabaptist; they had also displaced Hubblethorn, who was Major to Colonel Talbot's Regiment; Hughes, who was Major to Wilks's, they had reduced to be but Captain, and preferred one Knolles an Anabaptist, to his Command; Johnson, the eldest Captain in his own Regiment of Horse, they put out, (and many more too long to mention,) in all the Regiments; few or none of those new Officers chosen at Whitehall, to supply the Places of those removed, were yet come into Scotland: So that General Monk taking that Opportunity to retain all the displaced Officers in their respective Commands, made them, who had been thus obliged before, thereby intirely depend on him.

Having resolved to stand upon his Guard, and declare against the Army in England, the first Thing he did, was to consult which Way best to secure these Regiments, and the several Garrisons with least Hazard; and knowing that in Actions of great Concernment, there was more Use of Execution than Council, he made very little Hesitation in what he intended to act: He was most disident of his own Regiment of Foot, (which, during his Absence in the Dutch War, had been so transformed, that most of the Officers were become Anabaptists;) and the three Regiments in Glasgow, Aire, and St. Johnston's.

The first Minute that he had Notice of the Disorders at Westminster, which was on the before-mention'd 17th Day of October, he sent Captain Jeremiah Smith of his own Regiment

And removes those whom he himself distrusted.

1659. of Horse, to Edenburgh and Leith, to signify his Pleasure to Major Hubblethorn, Major Hughes, and Captain Johnson, to have them come to him to Dalkeith: The first was Major to Talbot's Regiment of Foot; the other to that of Wilks's, quarter'd at Leith; and Johnson commanded a Troop in his own Regiment of Horse.

The General signifies his Resolution to send over of his Officers, to march into England, to re-establish the Parliament, and hath their Consent and Encouragement.

Great Preparations in Monk's Army, for the fortifying themselves against the prevailing Faction in England.

These came immediately upon Summons to the General, and there they met Captain Morgan of his own Regiment of Foot, and Miller of Wilks's Regiment, who had the Guards of Dalkeith House: The Lieutenant-Colonel, and Major of the General's Regiment, were both Anabaptists, and at that Time absent; Lieutenant-Colonel Cloeberry of Read's Regiment, was by Chance there, and was advised with. The General communicated his Intelligence to them, and his Resolution to march into England with a Part of his Army, to re-establish the Parliament; to which they all freely consented: Hubblethorn gave him perfect Assurance of all Talbot's Regiment, of which he had now the Command; because the Colonel, and Pourel the Lieutenant-Colonel were both in England: And indeed much must be attributed to the Courage and Diligence of that Gentleman, whose Regiment was by him intirely, both Officers and Soldiers, made at the General's Devotion; which being then quartered at Edenburgh, gave a great Reputation to the whole Undertaking: For although some in all the Regiments, and many in most, were ready upon the Confidence they had in the General's Courage and Conduct, and were well inclined towards him; yet they were all apter to follow in any Design, (as most naturally are,) than to begin the Action: Captain Johnson had been by the Nominators at London removed from his Troop, but was now by the General restored to it; and as he was the eldest Captain of the Regiment, by the Absence of Major Knight, he had the Command under the General of all his Regiment of Horse, and was well beloved by them: Major Hughes gave him Hopes of making all Colonel Wilks's Regiment at his Service: Hubblethorn (whom he made Lieutenant-Colonel of the Regiment) was ordered to draw it early the next Morning into the High-Street at Edenburgh, and to let all the Musqueteers have Matches lighted, with Powder and Bullet; and Johnson was commanded to be ready in Edenburgh at the same time, with his own Troop, and that of one Captain Symnel's, an honest stout Officer: Hughes was appointed in the Absence of his Colonel, and Lieutenant-Colonel, who were sent for the next Morning, to confer with the General, to secure the Citadel at Leith. He had, upon some Kind of Expectation of Change, kept Captain Witter, (of the Regiment lying at St. Johnston's), and Captain Robson, (of the Regiment of Aire), both at Edenburgh, and had sent for them to him; and upon Conference with them, they both undertook, one to secure the Citadel at St. Johnston's, and the other at Aire; which was very difficult Service to perform, in regard that most of the Officers in those Regiments were very ill-disposed towards the General: Little more was done that Night, but the sending an Express to Major Knight, who was then in Yorkshire at his own House, to hasten him to his Command.

The next Day after Dinner, the General marched to Edenburgh, with only Captain Smith's Troop of Horse, having before dispatched away Witter and Robson. Morgan had been sent before to Edenburgh, to draw up his Regiment, but had Orders to give them neither Match, Powder nor Ball. As soon as he came into the High-Street, and found the Regiments in that Order he expected, he retired a little into his Quarters, to model his own Regiment, and sent for Morgan to him, whom he immediately made Lieutenant-Colonel; Captain Nicholas he promoted to be Major, and at the same Instant displaced all whom he knew to be disaffected to him, and such of them as were dangerous to be imprisoned; which done, he marched with both the Regiments to the Gray-Friers Church, where he called together the Officers, and told them, That the Army in England had broken up the Parliament, out of a restless, uncontrollable Disposition of being pleased with nothing that tended to the Welfare and Happiness of the People; that though they had lately taken Shame to themselves (in their publick Declaration,) for their former Apostacies, yet now, finding the Parliament unapt to humour them in all their Extravagancies, they were weary of them. He said, He was resolved to make the Military Power subservient to the Civil, and that since they had their Protection and Entertainment from the Parliament, it was their Duty to serve and obey them against all Opposition; which should be his Practice; and he expected their Concurrence and Assistance to joyn with him. But if any were dissatisfied, and would declare it to him, they should have free Liberty, without Reflection, to leave the Service, and have Passes to go Home.

Upon this, Colonel Wilks, and his Lieutenant-Colonel, with all that were present, unanimously declared to live and dye with him. Captain Johnson was then dispatched to Berwick, to secure that Garrison, which was then under the Command of Lieutenant-Colonel Mayers; and he did it very effectually, and it was a Service of great Advantage to Monk's Designs; Captain Hatt, and Captain Dennis, two well approved Officers of Colonel Cobbet's Regiment, being both at Edenburgh when these Transactions were, and having received private Orders to model that Regiment then quartered at Glasgow, and to march with it to Edenburgh, came thither before any Knowledge of the Alterations, at the Headquarters, and privately consulted with such of the Regiment as they were confident of, before they publickly discovered their Orders: Lieutenant-Colonel Young, who was there in Chief, in the Absence of the Colonel and Major, did as much as he could to oppose it; but he being presently secured, Hatt and Dennis performed their Instructions, and immediately marched the Regiment to the General.

Captain Witter, as soon as he came to St. Johnston's, drew up two Companies, whom he most confided in, upon the Sands before the Citadel, and proposed to them what he had in Charge from the General; whereupon they all shouted in Consent to it, at the Noise whereof, the Soldiers coming in Confusion out of the Citadel, he marched with the aforesaid Companies into it, and took Possession thereof: He made

His Speech to his Officers.

Captain Johnson secures Berwick.

Capt. Hatt and Dennis bring off Col. Cobbet's Regiment to the General.

Capt. Witter takes Possession for the General of the Citadel of St. Johnston's.

1659. made Lieutenant-Colonel Keine, and Major Kelk Prisoners; the first whereof was afterwards upon his Consent to joyn with the General, released from his Imprisonment, but Kelk was still detained. Of this Regiment at St. Johnstown, Witter, for his handsome Performance of this Undertaking, is by the General advanced to be Major.

And is made Major of the Regiment.

And is made Colonel of the Regiment.

Robson at Ayre, was more deliberate in the Execution of his Orders: he dealt so with the Officers, that most of them except the Colonel and Lieutenant-Colonel, agreed to comply with the General. The Lieutenant-Colonel privately got away to Carlisle, and secured that Garrison for the Army in England; the Colonel temporiz'd a While, but finding his Arts successless, and thereupon flying away into England, the General gave the Command of the Regiment to Robson, for his good Service; and sent into England for Colonel Daniel, who had been a little before displaced, (and Pierfon, his Lieutenant-Colonel, advanced to the Command of that Regiment,) to take again his Command of Colonel thereof.

The Settlement of these two Regiments, gave much Encouragement to the General, in reference to the carrying on of his Design; and the rather, in regard he himself had look'd upon it as none of the easiest Works to compass.

He made no Alteration at first in those Companies which belonged to Colonel Overton at Dundee, because he had Hopes to gain him to declare for him, with the Garrison at Hull, then under his Command; and in regard they were on that Side of the River Tay, they could not have done much if they had opposed. He sent to Colonel Fairfax, who quartered with his Regiment at Aberdeen, to haste with it to Edinburgh; and Lieutenant-Colonel Cloeberry was sent to Read, his Colonel at Sterlin, to appoint him to march to the General with all his Men, except two Companies, which were to be left for the Safety of the Town and Castle. And at the same time he sent a Commission to Inverness, to Colonel Man, to be Colonel of that Regiment, in the Place of Smith, who adhered to the Army in England, and appointed him to send three of his best Companies to Edinburgh. He dispatch'd also some trusty Officers to the Horse-Troops, and then went himself to Leith, to settle the Citadel and Regiment in Obedience to him. Upon his first coming, he displaced Knolles, and confined him, and restored Hughes to be again Major to the Regiment, and likewise some other Anabaptist Officers were put out, and others placed in their rooms. Captain Clifton, who with a Company of this Regiment from Leith, had the Command of Edinburgh Castle, upon Promise of Faithfulness and Service to the General, was by him continued in his Command with Trust and Confidence. And thus these three Regiments of Foot at Leith and Edinburgh, were in one Afternoon pretty well settled, till more Time could be allowed to refine them.

Smith's Regiment at Inverness, given to Colonel Man.

The General march'd to Leith, to settle the Citadel and Regiment there.

And thence to Linlithgow.

Upon the 21st, he marched some Companies of Horse and Foot to Linlithgow, intending to go thence to Glasgow, to settle Cobbet's Regiment, of which he was in some Doubt; but he there received Intelligence of what was done by Hatt and Dennis, and therefore went no further.

He there also had Notice of the Submission of 1659. the Citadel at Ayre, and that Berwick was rendered to him, where Colonel Cobbet was stayed and detained in Prison, as he was coming into Scotland with his Regiment, and it was seasonably done; for if he had been permitted to pass, the Opinion which was had of him by the Soldiers, might have much hindered the General's Proceeding. He was brought with a Guard to Edinburgh Castle, and kept there, the General being much incensed against him, upon private Advice that he had Instructions to have seized him, if he had not agreed to the Armies Actions in England. At Linlithgow, at a Council of Officers, it was advis'd that some Way should be used to draw off the Independent Churches in England, from favouring the English Army, which would have much weakened that Party, if it had succeeded, for most of the inferiour Officers were of that Persuasion; for the effecting of this, a Declaration was framed, agreed to, and published, and dispersed all over England: And at the same time, another Declaration was also made to satisfy the Kingdom in general, with the Reason of his taking Arms; alledging, that he did it for the Vindication of the Rights and Liberties of the People, and the Freedom of Parliaments.

Col. Cobbet detained Prisoner at Berwick.

Two Declarations published by the General, in Vindication of these Proceedings of his.

Two Expostulatory Letters were also writ, the one to Fleetwood, and the other to Lambert, blaming the Violence of their Proceedings against the Parliament, and another to the Speaker, to be informed of the Condition wherein the House then was; declaring therein, that whereas there ought to be a right Understanding between the Parliament and the Army, he would be ready, in Case the Army persisted to disobey their Orders, to assist them with the Forces under his Command, according to his Duty.

By this Time, Major Knight was returned out of England; for hearing of the Disorders at London, and that some Jealousies had been entertained of him, upon an Information that he had been some Months before engaged with the Lord Castleton, in Sir George Booth's Rising, he thought best for his own Security, to make all possible Haste down to his Command; his Arrival fell out to be three Days after the General had first declared; Morgan's Regiment of Dragoons, was made a Regiment of Horse; and Major Farmer was sent with a Troop to secure Carlisle, who, when he came thither, did not march into it with Confidence, as Johnson did into Berwick; but sent in to treat with the Governour, and was so long doing it, till Elton, that commanded the Town, had fixed the Soldiers to a Resolution of keeping him out. Moreover, Monk considering that his Army could not be got together in six Weeks Time, to march into England, he, therefore to amuse the Faction there, sent Major Knight, with four Troops of choice Horse, and six Companies of Foot, to surprize Newcastle. The Horse-Troops were commanded by Knight, Johnson, Wilmot, and Simnel; and the Foot by Miller, Mansfield, Collins, Witter, Seymour and Belcham, all gallant and well resolved Men. But being come as far as Morpeth, he had Advice, that some Forces were got into Newcastle before him, which being intimated also to the General, he presently counter-

Major Knight arrives in Scotland.

Maj. Farmer sent by the General to possess Carlisle, is kept out by the Soldiers.

Major Knight sent with a Party to seize Newcastle, but is prevented.

1659. countermanded him and his Party to Anwick, where he staid for some Time: The not taking Newcastle, was no Discouragement to the General or his Army; for upon more deliberate Consideration, he thought the Miss of it rather fortunate, than prejudicial to him, since if he had taken it, it would in all Probability have been immediately besieged by Lambert: And then he must have been obliged to attempt the Relief of it, and fought before he could have been well enough prepared for it, and thereby have hazarded his whole Design.

Monk invites Lieutenant-General Ludlow in Ireland, to a Conjunction with him.

Col. Lilburn in Yorkshire, makes all possible Opposition against General Monk.

He endeavours to seduce the General's Secretary from his Service, but prevails not.

He intercepts the General's Letters to Maj. Gen. Morgan.

Talbot and Clarges arrive at Edinburgh, and are well received by the General.

The General at the same Time that he sent the before-mentioned Letters to London, did likewise send a Messenger with Letters to Lieutenant-General Ludlow, who commanded the Army in Ireland, to move him to joyn with him, or at least to represent to him so fair an Account of his Action, as might induce him not to be his Hinderance in any of his Undertakings.

Colonel Lilburn, who lay at York with some Forces, upon the first Rumour of Monk's Declaration, drew what Forces together he could, and without staying to be well informed of the Reasons of Fleetwood and Lambert's breaking up the Parliament, he drew all the Officers in those Parts to enter into an Association against Monk, and to joyn with the Army at London, in whatsoever they designed.

He also writ to Mr. Clarke, the General's Secretary, who was an active, useful Instrument in his Affairs, to seduce him from his Service: The Truth is, the greatest Part of Clarke's Estate was in England, and he was a Man of so civil and ingenious a Conversation, that he might have been the better excused in a Neutrality to both Parties, and his Interest did direct him to it. But he was resolved to hazard all his Fortunes in the General's Bottom, and would not by Threats, or Cunning, (which were both used by Lilburn to him), be prevailed with to quit his Party. For which, his Fidelity and Constancy at this Time, he was ever after so much esteemed by the General, that he trusted him with his most secret Transactions.

Major-General Morgan had lain long sick of the Gout at York, and began about this Time to recover his Health. The Letter which Monk sent to him, was intercepted by Lilburn, which Morgan a little repented, but thought it adviseable so far to conceal his Passion, (till he might have convenient Opportunity to get into Scotland) as to seem to Lilburn rather to dislike, than approve of the General's Proceedings.

Colonel Talbot and Clarges, came not to Edinburgh till the second of November; they were both very well received by Monk, but especially Clarges, being his Brother-in-Law, with whom he had that Night much Conference in private. The General wondered that Fleetwood and Lambert would send him, and thought it a good Omen to his Success, that he had him to assist his Designs. Clarges frankly asked him, What was the true End he aimed at in their Enterprize? telling him that it was impossible for him to be ever trusted after this Rupture, if he patched up a Peace with the English Army; and withal acquainting him, that he observed a great Conternation in the Officers and Soldiers as he passed, and that he believed many of them would fall off to him.

The General (as the most reserved Man then living) was in some Trouble to be pressed to discover his Intentions, and at that Time opened himself no further, than to let him know he was resolved to endeavour to free his Native Country from the Slavery it was under; and to effect it, he thought one of the best Expedients would be to restore the Parliament; but in their Admission to Sit (if it were by his Arms) he would make no Difference betwixt them, but let in as well the secluded Members as others. Having said this, he conjured Clarges to Secresy, being very sensible that the Jealousy had on him by the Army was so great, it having been often cast in his Dish, by some of his ill-Willers, that the King was in the Bottom of his Designs, that all he could contrive, would be little enough to beget a Confidence, even in his own Party, to engage with him.

As to the present Condition of his Affairs, he acquainted him that he had about Seventy Thousand Pounds in Money, Part whereof was already in his Treasury, and the rest would in a short Time be paid into it. And that all his Magazines were very well stored with Ammunition, Arms, and all other Necessaries; and that he had in Part modelled his Army fit for his Purposes, and should in a While perfect it. Clarges let him know, that the Wants in Fleetwood and Lambert's Army were very great; and that upon Lambert's Expedition they were not able to advance one Month's Pay, for his Army, which would make them by free Quarter, be very burthensome and distastful to the Country: So that if by a Treaty, or any other Means, he could protract Time, his Business might be done without Hazard.

The General replied, That he thought the Overture of a Treaty from Fleetwood and Lambert, might be improved to his great Advantage, for he could not in a Month's Time draw his Men together: And that his sending Knight with a Party to lodge at Anwick, was to make them think him in greater Readiness than he was, the more thereby to distract their Levies. The General then resolved upon a Treaty, and the next Morning summoned his Chief Officers together, to nominate Commissioners, and to resolve upon Instructions for them: He chose to advise with his Officers in all these Matters, to free them from Suspicion. Colonel Talbot was very glad his Journey was so successful to obtain a Treaty so easily. The General and his Officers met, and at the first Proposition they consented to the Motion for a Treaty; and when he put them to name fit Persons to be Commissioners, they referred it to him. He then appointed Major Knight, and Lieutenant Colonel Cloberry to be Two, and put it to them to name a Third, and they proposed Colonel Wilks, who was reputed to be a good Religious Man, and acceptable to Fleetwood, and the Officers in England. They then came to consider of Instructions, and were so hot in Debate, that the Question was not without much Contest carried for allowing them a Fortnight's Time for the Treaty. The General was perplexed in his Mind at this; for he would not have them limited to Time, because that was the only Thing he wanted,

He discovers to Clarges some Glimmering of his Intentions.

The present Condition of Monk, for Money and Ammunition.

Lambert's Army in great Want of Money.

Gen. Monk takes Hold for his Advantage, of Lambert's Overture for a Treaty.

Mr. Knight, Col. Cloberry, and Col. Wilks, made Choice of to be the General's Commissioners in this Treaty.

1659. wanted, yet he discovered no Displeasure: However, in the rest of the Instructions, he so invented Matter to confound their Debates, that they had no Power given them to conclude any thing; and they were to insist upon the restoring the Parliament: But if the Members should refuse to sit, then to debate of some other Form of Government. They were likewise to provide for an Act of Indemnity for all Acts done since the 1st of October, and to take Care that the Arrears, of such part of the English Assessment as was appropriated to the Pay of the Army in Scotland, should be forthwith paid; and that a godly, learned and faithful Ministry, with competent Maintenance, and other Encouragements, should be continued in the three Nations: The like Regard being had to Schools and Universities, with many other Matters sufficiently remote from the present Affair. Moreover, it was particularly inserted, that they should provide, that the Acts of the Army in England, should not be deemed the Acts of a General Council of the Army, without the Concurrence of the Officers of the Armies of Scotland and Ireland.

These Commissioners were hasted away, and Lambert was so far advanced with his Army, as to meet them at York, where he told them he had full Power from Fleetwood, the Officers of the Army, and the Committee of Safety, to treat and conclude with them of all Differences. They seemed not averse to it; but when they began to enter upon the Matter, and proposed the Restitution of the Parliament, he told them, Fleetwood and the Officers at London had agreed with him and his Officers not to conclude of any thing concerning that Matter, without the common Consent of all, and so they went forwards towards London. Nevertheless, as a thing previous to the Treaty, it was by both Parties accorded, that the Forces of neither should advance from their Quarters, and that there should be a free uninterrupted Intercourse of Letters during the Treaty.

The Army of Horse and Foot with Lambert did amount to near twelve Thousand, and Monk had not above half the Number; nevertheless, he had this Advantage, that he paid all his Men, and the other did not. The way he had for providing Money, was very accidental: The late Parliament (so called) about the latter End of June (as is before expressed) had made a short Act to authorize the Payment of a Year's Tax upon England, Scotland and Ireland, appointed to be raised by one of Cromwell's Parliaments; and they in that Act directed One Moiety of Money to be paid by the 1st of August, and the other the 10th of October following. The Proportion for Scotland to pay of this Tax, was six thousand Pounds a Month; and in regard, the Country was poor, and burthened with many other Payments, the General writ to all the Commissioners of Shires, and indulged them so far as to grant them Forbearance of Payment 'till the 10th of October for the first Moiety, and two Months after for the rest, which they readily undertook to do, and performed it for the most part: And this he had represented so effectually by Clarges's Agent to the Parliament, that he got twenty thousand Pounds in Money to be sent into Scotland towards the Pay of his Army, 'till that Money could be collected.

And that was the Bulk of all the Money he had in this Undertaking; but it was increased by Excise and Custom, and other Duties; for after he declared, he seized on all: And of this we make the more particular Mention in this Place, because some ignorant of these Transactions, have published, that the General had an Assessment raised for him at a Convention of the Nobility of Scotland; which was first invented by the Seditious in England to his Prejudice, and afterwards, because uncontradicted, believed for a Truth.

Lambert was informed by his Confident Lillburn, Major Gen. that Major General Morgan, who had been some time sick of the Gout in York, was dissenting from General Monk's Proceedings, and that he would be unwilling to go to him to dissuade him from the Pursuit of them; and therefore he dealt with him to take a Journey thither (on Pretence of repairing to his Charge, which was then in Scotland) to use the Credit he had with him to an Accommodation betwixt them: Morgan (who waited only for an Occasion to get away) was glad of this Overture, and undertook to do his Part in this Business, so that at a Day's Warning he began his Journey from York towards Edinburgh. He had with him one Troutbeck, a Chirurgeon (upon Pretence of taking Care of his Health) a very subtle intelligent Person, excellent in his Profession, and withal, of great Discretion, and much beloved by the Soldiers of both Armies, and of considerable Interest among them. These got safe to Edinburgh about the 7th or 8th of November; and the coming of Morgan was a good Accession to Monk's Party, and a great Encouragement to all the Officers and Soldiers: For he was esteemed by them to be next the General, a Person of the best Conduct of any then in Arms in the Three Nations, having been near Forty Years a Soldier, and present in the greatest Battles and Sieges of Christendom for a great part of that time; and particularly in Flanders, where he commanded a Brigade of Foot, he acquitted himself to the Astonishment of his Enemies, and the Admiration of Marshal Turenne, and all the French Commanders in that Service with him. At his first coming to the General, he asked him aloud, merrily, If he would lay down his Arms, and be Friends with Fleetwood and Lambert? To which he was answered by him, if they would restore the Parliament, he had little more to say, and if he pleased, he might let them know as much. Morgan replied, I promised to ask you the Question, but not to return to them that sent me, if you denied it: I am very glad I am here with you to assist you, and follow your Fortunes in all your Undertakings: You know I am no Statesman; I am sure you are a Lover of your Country, and therefore I will join with you in all your Actions, and submit to your Prudence and Judgment in the Conduct of them.

This generous Friendship was kindly received by Monk, and it was the more valuable, in that it was done in a Time when the Army in England was at its greatest Height; and that in Scotland very inconsiderable in respect of the other, and not yet well settled; for a Day or two before, one of the Troops of Morgan's own Regiment ran over Tweed to Lambert.

Major Gen. Morgan takes his Journey into Scotland to Gen. Monk.

His joining with Monk a Matter of much importance.

The Discourse between the General and him at their first Meeting.

1659. In the Evening Morgan was private with the General, and delivered him a Letter which he brought from Mr. Bowles a Minister of York, a very eminent Man of those Parts, and of great Credit with my Lord Fairfax, and many others of good Note in that County, (Clarges being yet at Edenburgh, and consulted with in the Business). The Letter imported, That the Lord Fairfax, and many others of good Interest in Yorkshire, were willing to join with the General, but that they disapproved of his Declaration which was restrained to the restoring of that Part of the Parliament only which sat after the Seclusion of the rest; and was filled with many Protestations for the asserting of no other than a Commonwealth Government. To this the General answered, That Clarges could witness his Intentions in those Particulars, That what was printed in his Name, was not (at that Conjunction) to be regarded as the Result of his own Reason, because his Writings were drawn by other Hands; and 'till his Affairs had a firmer Consistency, and he more Power in his Hands, it was unreasonable for him to contradict what was done, since all that was writ could scarce prevail with the Army to believe he had not a Design to set up the King in his Government. The Conclusion of this was to send Clarges to Fairfax, Rossiter, and several others, to engage them; it being thought expedient at the same time, to imploy all possible Care to amuse the Parliament and Army, 'till the General could get a Power in his Hands to justify other Counsels. Clarges was dispatched to Bowles, with a Letter of Credit to him, to cause a Belief in him of what he should acquaint him with, on the part of the General, and another Letter to the same Purpose to my Lord Fairfax, from whom he was to have an Address to Rossiter in Lincolnshire.

Clarges sent to Fairfax, Rossiter, and others to engage them to General Monk.

Col. Talbot prevailed upon by Lambert to take part with him.

Talbot knew nothing of these Traverses, but carried himself with much Moderation all the time of his Stay, and with so much Profession of respect to the General, that he assured him, If he would go to London and be a Neuter, he would preserve his Regiment for him: Which he promised to do, but was afterwards, by the Importunity of Lambert, prevailed upon to act contrary to that Engagement, and (some think) to his own Inclinations; for he was esteemed by all that knew him, to be a Person not averse to a better and more just Government than he at that time lived under, and was obliging to all the Gentry where he lived, that needed his Assistance and Help.

Cap. Dean, Mr. Caryl, Col. Whaley and Goffe sent by Fleetwood to G. Monk.

Fleetwood could not conceal his Fears; for the same Week that Talbot and Clarges were sent to endeavour a Reconciliation, before he had any Return from them, Captain Dean, one of the Treasurers, and not long after, Mr. Caryl the Minister, with Colonel Goffe and Whaley, were sent to the General on the same Errand: Likewise Mr. Hammond and Mr. Barker were deputed in the Name of the Independent Congregations in and about London, to mediate a Peace betwixt the two Armies.

Mean while, Clarges and Talbot took their leaves of the General to return home. The Presence of Dean's coming into Scotland before Caryl and Whaley, was to look after his Charge; for he was one of the Treasurers at War; but he privately dispersed Tickets as he travelled, to seduce Monk's Soldiers from him, bringing him withal a Letter from Fleetwood, which contained an Offer of what Command in the Army he should desire, upon the least private Intimation of his inclining to take Part with him. This made the General to believe there was some Jealousies betwixt Lambert and him, which he might have improved to the breaking one of them; but he chose the more generous way, and refused the Offer; letting him know, He sought not himself, but the Good of the Nations, and when that was obtained, he would rather lay the Command he had down, than seek to enlarge it.

Lieutenant-Colonel Barret came at the same time from Ireland, with a Letter from Sir Hardress Waller, John Jones, and the ruling People of that Country, (for Ludlow was then in England) declaring their Refusal to join with the General; but he was not at all discouraged at this, having at the same time received Advice from Cornet Monk by another Hand, That Sir Charles Coot, Sir Theophilus Jones, and a very considerable Part of the Army were resolved to assist him; that Sir Hardress Waller himself might in time be drawn to join with them; and that he doubted not in a short while to receive good Effects of their Endeavours.

But in the mean time, upon Notice that Dean and Barret were active to withdraw the Affections of the Soldiers from their Duties, they were thereupon sent away from Scotland with a severe Rebuke; the General being unwilling to punish them by Imprisonment or any severe Course, because they came to him on publick Business.

These Men did much Mischief amongst the Soldiers, who were many of them by their Inveiglements seduced; two Troops of Twistleton's Regiment of Horse, commanded by Ashley and Dean, refused to join with the General, and thirty three of them were dismounted, disarmed and cashier'd, and Foot Soldiers put on their Horses; but forty of Dean's Troop, with their Colours, ran into England; and two Companies of Foot, of the Regiment which came from St. Johnston's, being quartered at Dunbar, had like to have been betrayed to Newcastle by one Captain Guillim, who had been lately of that Regiment, and was discharged: This Guillim procuring leave to go into England, came to Dunbar, where he made the Soldiers believe that he was by the General restored to his Command, and had Order to secure Captain Thomson, who then commanded them, and to carry them in Boats to Berwick: Some of the Serjeants so far gave Credit to him, that they placed a Guard upon Thomson, whilst he in the mean time was hiring Boats to carry them, and was so earnest in it, that he would have taken any, though never so leaky, for their Conveyance: This put the Men into some Jealousy, insomuch, that they desired to see his Orders, whereupon he leaped upon his Horse, and rode away.

Cap. Guillim endeavours to betray two Companies of the General's Men, but is found out.

At Sterlin, a Troop of Colonel Sanders's Regiment were in the like Disorder, and about thirty of the Men dismounted, and others put in their Places. This obliged the General to be more circumspect in the reforming his Regiments; so that he discharged all the Officers whom he any way suspected, and sent them into England. In Colonel Fairfax's Regiment, eighteen 1659. eighteen Officers were displaced; and in most of the rest some were put out, in all, to the Number of seven Score Persons: Those Regiments wherein least Alteration was made, were Talbot's and Read's: The first, through the Diligence of Hubblethorn, who a while after deservingly, upon Talbot's joining with Lambert, had the Regiment conferred upon him; and the latter, by the Care and good Example of the Colonel, who was a Person that always loved and esteemed the General.

Clarges excuses Major-General Morgan to Lambert. Lambert was much troubled when he heard that Morgan had deserted him, and when Talbot and Clarges came to York, he complained of it as a kind of Breach of Faith, but was quickly by Clarges better satisfied; for he assured him, he heard him move General Monk to a Peace with him; but being Major-General of that Army, he could not refuse to do his Duty, in staying there where his Charge was, since the Difference between the two Armies was not yet come to that Degree to make it beyond Hopes of Reconciliation; and that he might rather further the same by his Presence, than Absence.

Clarges's Conference with Mr. Bowles. Clarges, as hath been already mentioned, had received a Letter to the Lord Fairfax, from the General, and some Instructions to Rossiter, and several others; about which he was secretly to confer with Bowles the Minister at York, to whom also he brought a Letter of Credit for what he should propose to him: Bowles, with whom he had much Discourse, desired to be fully informed of the General's Intentions, and was by Clarges so well satisfied in them, that he undertook to negotiate with the Lord Fairfax, Colonel Bethel, and several others in Monk's Behalf; and for Evidence of it, he advised him to stay privately in York till he went to confer with the Lord Fairfax at his House at Nun-Appleton, six Miles from thence, (that he might know what Advice to send into Scotland) which he accordingly did: And at his Return, acquainted him, That Fairfax would rise by the midst of January; and he might be confident Bethel and Smithson would join with him, who were Men of good Interest, and well-beloved of the Soldiery in Lambert's Army. On the other side, Bowles pressed to know what Expectations the General had from other Places, and was by Clarges informed, that Colonel Whetham at Portsmouth, was a great Friend to the General, and he doubted not, but he would take the first Opportunity he could to declare with that Garrison for him, which he liked very well, for Whetham was a moderate Man. He told him likewise, that Colonel Hacker, with his Regiment, would raise some Men in Nottinghamshire and Leicestershire; and Colonel Hutchinson, and Sir Arthur Haslerig, would join with them; and that Okey was labouring to make Disturbances in London amongst the Regiments there. Bowles at first was not well pleased that he should make use of these Aids: But when he was acquainted by Clarges with the Reasons which induced him to it, he was satisfied.

The first thing the General designed, was to break Lambert's Forces, to make himself Master of all the Armies; and to effect this, it was requisite to refuse no Help, since the major Part of the whole would be such as he could make use of to model the rest, to any Purpose he should employ them in. Then they found out a secret Messenger to send with Intimation of this Conference to Monk; and Clarges went towards Lincolnshire to pursue his Negotiations; but about Doncaster he had so grievous a Fall from his Horse, as he was riding Post, that his Life was despaired of; but after a little stay there, he was brought to a Village betwixt Tuxford and Newark, where he was forced to stay ten Days ere he was able to travel; nevertheless, in the mean time he sent Expresses several ways; and by the means of one Bristow, a Confident of Colonel Rossiter's, he had Opportunity to send to him, and had his Answer; which was, That he would join with Fairfax, and do what he should direct. When he came to Leicestershire, he heard nothing of Haslerig, but that he had, in Despair of doing any thing, retired to Woodstock; and the Reason he gave for it, was, That if he should raise Forces in his County, it might give Occasion to the King's Party to arm, and thereby hazard the whole Cause; and that therefore it would be better to close with the Army in all their Exorbitances, than venture with so much Danger to oppose it.

Clarges was somewhat troubled at this Discouragement, but omitted not to proceed in his Endeavours; and thereupon sent to many of the Council of State, who were retired, to draw them privately to London, to assist with their Counsels, in promoting the Restauration of the Parliament; which he did, upon Observation amongst the Soldiers of Lambert's Army, that they favoured much the Declaration of Monk, for restoring that Authority, and were only diverted from joining with him against Lambert, upon a Jealousy of the King's being in the bottom of his Design; which was often insinuated by the Council of Officers at London, in their publick and private Debates: So that in the immaturity of that time, nothing could more advance Monk's Purpose of subduing the English Army, than to beget a Confidence in them of his Adherence to his Declaration.

This Practice prevailed so far, as to get the Council of State together in London, where they had many private Meetings: But in the meantime, the Commissioners for the Independent Churches, which were sent into Scotland, were solicitous to divert Monk from the Prosecution of the War. And so far the Business proceeded, that there was a Conference appointed with them at Holy-rood-House, where were present to treat with them, General Monk, Colonel Fairfax, Colonel Syler, Doctor Barrow, the Judge Advocate of the Army, and Mr. Gumble, one of the General's Chaplains.

At this Conference, Mr. Collins, an Independent Minister (who had been one of the Preachers of the late Council in Scotland) was admitted to be present as a Neuter.

Mr. Caryl was the first that spoke, who in a long and studied Speech declared, "That the Commissioners had desired him to speak for them; that they all came, not to deliver their own Sense of the General's Proceedings, but the sense of the Churches, (for so upon every Occasion he called the Independent Congregations) that the Churches had not given them Commission to enter into the Merits

1659. "Merits of the Cause, nor to debate whether Lambert's Action of turning out the Parliament were justifiable or not; but only to present it to his Lordship as their Opinion; That though that Action could not be justified, yet his Lordship had not a Call to appear against it, in that Manner he then did; That his Lordship had only in Charge to keep Scotland in quiet, and was not bound to take Notice of any Differences that should happen in England. (Nor indeed could it reasonably be expected of him, he being in a Place where he could not be supposed to have such true and timely Information, as was necessary in a Business of that Concernment.)" He proceeded to shew Reasons why the General should go on no further, telling him, "That it would put a Strife amongst those that hitherto had been Brethren, engaged all along in the same Cause, Partakers in the same Dangers, and the same Successes, amongst those that still in their Papers, and all their Addresses, called and owned one another for Brethren, and that at a very unseasonable Time, whilst the Canaanites and Perizzites were in the Land." And thereupon he took Occasion to enlarge himself upon all the Advantages the King and his Party would reap by this Quarrel, and all the Dangers the People of God, (for so he called his own Party,) might run into. And at last, by Way of Aggravation, he told the General, "That what Inconveniences soever should happen, would be laid at his Door, in regard he would appear to have been the Beginner of the War."

The General's Answer.

At this the General, in a little Heat, interrupted him, shewing, "That the War was already begun by Lambert and his Party, who had offered Violence to those, from whom they had already received their Commissions; not sparing freely, and at large, to lay open their restless Instability, which would not suffer the Three Nations to enjoy any settled Government at all, but keep them in a perpetual Circumvolution, till they were in Danger to be brought to utter Ruin; repeating much of their Declarations, and many of their Actions, and declaring, "That if they continued in that Course, he was resolved to oppose them to the uttermost, and would (to repeat his own Words,) lay them on their Backs."

The Treaty ended between the Commissioners of the two Armies.

Caryl, and his Fellow-Commissioners, endeavoured to excuse that Expression of theirs which stirred up the General's Anger; and Barrow on the General's Side, did qualify and mitigate his Answer, not thinking it meet wholly to disoblige so considerable a Party as the Independents, as Things stood at that Time; and so by Degrees, Expressions came to be very calm on both Sides, both being in Expectation of the Issue of the Treaty then on Foot, between the Commissioners of the Army of Scotland, and those of the Army in England. But after this Time there was no more Meetings; for upon News from England, that Matters were tending to Accommodation, these Commissioners thought their Business done, and made Haste to return to England.

Clarges, disabled by his Fall, could not get soon enough to London, to prevent the hasty Conclusion of the Treaty there, (which was concluded on the fifteenth of November,) although he endeavoured by several Letters to Major Knight, one of the Commissioners, to prevent it; forasmuch as the rest of them were so prevailed on by the Importunity of the English Officers, or else so terrified with their great Preparations, that he could not hinder the Speed of it. As he came to London, he passed by Cambridge, and settled there a Correspondency with Mr. Pradman, one of the Fellows of King's College, by whose Care and Secrecy, all his Packets were conveyed safe to Scotland, when all the ordinary Ways were obstructed. Mean While, being much troubled to find, that that very Night he arrived at London, the Treaty betwixt the Commissioners on both Parts was concluded, he seriously expostulated with the Commissioners about their precipitant Proceeding, telling them what Progress he had made in his Negotiations, and that by the Midst of January there would be in many Places such strong Diversions made, that the General could not but obtain his Ends: That his Money would last till the Beginning of February, and by that Means his Men would be so united and encouraged, that if he did nothing but lye still, Lambert's Army by their great Wants, (which made them insupportable to the Country,) must break of themselves.

Knight was very sensible of his Error in this hasty Conclusion, and the rest were so far convinced, that in their Letter of the sixteenth of November, to the General-Council of the Officers of the Army in Scotland, giving them an Account of the Conclusion of the Treaty, they confess, they had exceeded their Instructions, out of a Suspicion, as the Posture of Affairs then stood, that the Issue of the Difference, if longer continued, would not be to the Advantage of themselves, or of their Brethren of England, but of the Common Enemy.

The Agreement it self consisted of Nine Articles; containing in Substance, That the Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Fleet and Navy, should depute a certain Number of their respective Bodies, to settle a Form of Government; which was to be without any King, Single Person, or House of Lords.

The Articles of Agreement between the Commissioners of the two Armies.

Wallington and Lloyd, two Captains of the English Army at London, were sent with this Agreement to General Monk to put it in Execution; and as they went, Major Cambridge of Lambert's Army, was sent by him in their Company. But Clarges was careful to send a Copy of it to him some Days before they arrived; and the General was in much Perplexity at the Receipt of it, as that which distracted his Design almost past Recovery; he was resolved not to accept of it, but could not well tell how to decline it.

To take any Pretence from those Articles which excluded the King's Government, would confirm the Suspicion which was fomented of his secret Intentions for the ROYAL FAMILY; and to ground his Dissent from the Subscription of the Commissioners, where they assume an Authority, (which they never had,) and undertook for the Performance of that Agreement, for the General and all his Officers would not be thought material enough to continue the Breach betwixt them: That which was most plausible, was to break it upon the Sixth Article, where it was provided, That all the Officers displaced by General Monk, might 1659. might be in a Capacity of being restored to other Commands; and all those put by him in their Place, (wherein his Strength consisted) be removed; he called together a few of his Confidants to advise what to do; these were Major-General Morgan, Colonel Fairfax, Colonel Lydcott, Doctor Barrow, and Mr. Gumble; Lydcott was admitted, because he was from a private Captain newly preferred to the Command of Cobbet's Regiment, and therefore by Interest supposed to be averse to this Agreement. The General and these Gentlemen having had much Discourse of the Business, they all thought it fit to disapprove of the Agreement, but differed in the Manner; but at last it was by Barrow proposed, and agreed to by the General and the rest, That they should not declare a positive Dissent to what their Commissioners had done; but urge, that there was something untreated of, further to be agreed upon; and some of those Things consented to by their Commissioners, which without further Explication, could not stand with their Declaration or Instructions; and that therefore it should be desired, that two more might be allowed to be added to their Commissioners, to meet a like Number of theirs to be thereunto authorized, to put a more absolute Period to their Differences.

Lloyd and others sent with a Letter to the Officers at London. The same Evening Wallington, Lloyd, and Cambridge arrived; and the next Morning, at a General Council of Officers at Edinburgh, when the Agreement was communicated to them, they were so artificially prepared, that they unanimously disrelished it, and a Letter was framed, which they all subscribed, to the same Purpose with what was agreed on the Day before, and Lloyd and those with him, went with it to London.

Mr. Atkins and Col. Markham sent by the General with a Letter to the City of London. The City of London was very much discontented at the Committee of Safety, and Fleetwood became doubtful of them: But to heighten them the more, General Monk sent a Letter to the Lord-Mayor and Common Council, which was delivered to them by Mr. Atkins and Colonel Markham, about the 17th or 18th of November, wherein he acquainted them, That having heard of the Force put upon the Parliament, he designed to endeavour their Re-establishment; in which he desired the City to concur.

The Letter look'd upon as fictitious, and the Messengers imprisoned. This Letter was dated the 12th of November at Edinburgh, and did so much incense the Committee of Safety, that the Gentlemen who delivered it were put into Custody: And the more to aggravate the Business, Monk's Commissioners were either so imprudent, or so unsincere, as to declare, That they believed the Letter was fictitious; which made the City less active in Pursuance of the Contents of it.

Whilst Things were thus traversed in London, Fleetwood, Lambert, and all the Officers in England, could not dissemble their Confusion of Mind upon Monk's Refusal to ratify the Treaty, and sending for a blank Pass to insert new Names of additional Commissioners; and many Expostulatory Letters passed betwixt them about it, but more especially betwixt Lambert and his Officers, and him; for they were very apprehensive that this Motion of a blank Pass for adding to their Commissioners, or the naming of new ones, was only meant to gain Time; but at last they did consent to it, though it never came to any Effect, as shall be hereafter discovered.

Nine of the old Council of State met privately in London, the 19th of November; they a little resented, that General Monk's Commissioners did not communicate their Counsels with them, yet omitted not to give him all the Encouragement they could; and in order thereunto, one Captain Elms, with Horton, a Servant of Sir Arthur Haslerig's, was sent with a Letter to him to Scotland; wherein they signified, That they would readily adhere to him.

This was a great Encouragement to the Officers in Scotland; for the wisest of them did conclude from these Appearances of Action at London, that their Party was increased in England, imagining that otherwise they durst not have so openly acted.

Col. Whetham at Portsmouth, was labouring to frame a Design of declaring for General Monk with that Garrison; and Colonel Morley, Walton, and Haslerig, went privately towards him to treat about it: But before they went, the Council of State, at another Meeting before the time appointed by Parliament for their Continuance was expired, framed a Commission, wherein they constituted General Monk absolute Commander in Chief of all the Armies in England and Scotland, which was dated the 24th of November, sealed with their Seal, and left in the Hands of Clarges, 'till a safe Messenger might be sent with it to him.

As soon as Fleetwood had received General Monk's Letters against the Ratification of the Treaty, and his Desire to have two more Commissioners added to his, to renew the Treaty at Newcastle, Wilks, Cloeberry, and Knight, the Commissioners, had their Dispatch, and a Pass to license their Repair thither; but before they got to Newcastle, at a Meeting of all Lambert's Officers, a Letter was framed, and sent by Colonel Zanchy to General Monk's Officers, and one from Lambert to the General himself.

In that from the Officers they write, "That they had advised their General to acquaint General Monk, that if he pleased to appoint two commissioned Officers of his Army to be added to those already in England, and signify their Names to him, a safe Conduct should be forthwith given to them; but without, that nothing in the Agreement be parted from, nor any new Matter, or further Explanations admitted, which are not consentaneous to what is already concluded; and that the general Council (agreed upon in the third Article of the Agreement at London) to meet upon the 6th of December, may accordingly hold their Meeting". And in a Postscript to this Letter, they complained of the Detention of Col. Cobbet, who, they said, was a publick Messenger, and desired therefore he might enjoy his Privilege accordingly, except by some Miscarriage he had forfeited the same. Colonel Zanchy was very kindly received by General Monk and all his Officers; and they met together with all convenient Haste to give him his Dispatch; acquainting him, "That they should not disown any thing in that Agreement that was conformable to the Instructions by which their Commissioners were authorized; but what should appear to be be-1659. "yond, they insisted to have it treated on and explained. As to the third Article mentioned in their Letter, they would not admit of any Meeting in Pursuance of it, 'till the whole should be concluded. And concerning Cobbet, they alledged, "That he came not to Scotland as a publick Messenger, but as a Colonel to command a Regiment (after his Commission had been vacated by the Parliament, the Day before their Interruption) and without any leave from General Monk; and that the General had Intimation from a Person of Credit, that he had a Design to seduce the Army from their Obedience, if not to seize on his Person". This Letter was signed the 7th of December at Night, and the next Day Col. Zanchy was to have return'd with it to Newcastle, but upon Intelligence received, that a Party of Lambert's, consisting of three Regiments of Horse, and a Regiment of Dragoons, with two Drakes, was marched into Northumberland, and that sixty Dragoons had possessed themselves of Chillingham Castle, near the Scotch Borders, the Colonel was staid; and the General, at three of the Clock the next Morning, march'd out of Berwick, and sent Order to draw his Forces together toward Coldstream, a very convenient Pass upon the Tweed, where he settled his Head-Quarters. A little before this, his own Commissioners were come to him to Berwick, where he confined Colonel Wilks for discovering, or at least not pursuing some private Instructions; but after a while he was released, upon Satisfaction that what he did was out of Ignorance, and not Malice.

Col. Whetham at Portsmouth declares for Monk. Colonel Whetham, at Portsmouth, very generously declared for Gen. Monk, with that Garrison, after he had secured Captain Peacock, and Captain Brown, and some other refractory Officers, that he was jealous of.

Commissioners from the several Shires and Burroughs of Scotland, being summoned to wait upon the General, and he having appointed them to be at Berwick the 13th of December, he came on that Day thither to meet them accordingly, releasing Zanchy, and sending by him a Letter to Lambert, wherein he acquainted him, he would by the next Post more fully inform him of his Resolutions.

The Scotch Commissioners appointed five to attend the General, and treat with him, which were the Earls of Glencarne, Rothes, Weams, and Eglington, and Mr. Alexander Bruce. These presented a Paper to the General, consisting of five Proposals.

Their Propositions. 1. That the Lord General may be pleased to appoint a Committee in each Shire, for regulating the Affairs thereof, in order to his Lordship's Commands, and their own Preservation.

2. That his Lordship will allow each Shire presently to raise, for the securing the Peace, and their own Safety, some small Proportion of Horses under the Conduct of such Persons as his Lordship shall think fit to trust.

3. That his Lordship will declare, for the greater Encouragement of the Shires, at the Return of their Commissioners, if the Treaty shall break up and take no Effect, immediately upon the Notice thereof, that he did authorize the Shires to put themselves in the best Posture they can for his Assistance and their own Defence.

1659. 4. That for the said Effect, his Lordship will be pleased to furnish each Shire with some Proportion of Arms, upon Payment of just Rates thereof, within one Month's time after the Receipt of them.

5. That all Gentlemen who are free to comply with his Lordship's Desires, may for themselves and Servants, have Liberty to carry their Arms.

The General, upon the Receipt of this Paper, advised with some select Officers about an Answer to it, viz. Colonel Fairfax, Major Jeremiah Smith, Colonel Lydcot, Colonel Read, and Doctor Barrow. And the chief Question debated on, was, whether they should permit the Scots to arm for their Assistance? Colonel Read was for arming them: He argued, that it was a common Danger, and they ought to make Use of any Aid that could be obtained for their Defence. The General himself told them, that if he should draw all the Men from his Garrisons, he could make his Numbers of Foot quickly equal to Lambert's, but he had hitherto declined that, being unwilling to put Scotland out of English Hands; and that he doubted not, if he could get a few more Horse than he had, even with those Foot he had, without weakening his Garrisons, he should well enough defend himself against Lambert.

Others were of Opinion, that although they should not imploy whole Troops, or Companies of Scots, yet they might safely mingle a good Party of them with the English. But Doctor Barrow was against all Motions of arming the Scots at that time, believing, if it were done, many of their own Men might desert them; but if the General would take an Opportunity, though it were but to beat up any of Lambert's Quarters, so that they might once come to Blood, that the Division being likely to increase after such an Action, he might then strengthen himself with what Accessions he pleased. Nevertheless, he moved that some privately might confer with the leading Men of the Scotch Gentry, to try if they would be brought to provide any Numbers of Horses, on which the General might mount English to re-inforce his own Troops. This last was approved as to the main Question; but upon the whole Debate, they agreed upon particular Answers to every Article in the General's Name.

1. To the first, That he would authorize the Noblemen, and Justices of the Peace of each County, with the Advice and Consent of the Governour of the next adjacent Garrison, to put in Execution such Orders and Commands as his Lordship shall give for securing the Peace of the County.

2. To the second, That he would allow the Counties next adjacent to the Highlanas, viz. to the County of Dumbarton and Sterlin, forty Men to bear Arms; to the County of Perth, forty Men in Arms; to the County of Forfar and Kinkardine, forty Men in Arms; and to the County of Aberdeen, forty Men in Arms, which are to be a Guard for the Security of the said Counties against Thieves and Robbers. And for the rest of the Shires, his Lordship would take Care, if he should have Occasion to remove farther out of Scotland: And he would allow the Heretors of the abovenamed Shires, to make choice of a fit Person to command the said respective Guards, they giving Security to the Governour of the next adjacent Garrison, for their Fidelity 1659. Fidelity and good Behaviour, in six hundred Pounds Sterling.

3. To the third, His Lordship deferred his Answer, 'till the Issue of the Treaty now intended between him and the English Army.

4. To the fourth, That he would furnish them with fit Means for their Defence, whensoever he should apprehend their Peace and Safety to be in imminent Danger.

5. To the fifth, Such Noblemen and Gentlemen as should subscribe to live peaceably, and Act nothing to the Prejudice of England, should have Liberty, with Passes, to wear their Swords, and have four Servants armed for their Attendants.

Glencarne's Arguments to the General for arming the Scots to his Assistance.

At a Conference with the Scotch Commissioners, upon the Delivery of these Answers to their Propositions, they seemed unsatisfied with them; and the Earl of Glencarne, in the name of the rest, told the General, Since they were willing to hazard their Persons and Estates with him, they hoped he would not deny them to arm for his Assistance and their own Safety, since if he should engage and be worsted, they should be exposed to great Ruin for their Affection and Respect to him, from which otherwise, by a Neutrality, they might be secure. To which he answered, That if that should happen, they should then arm to what Numbers they pleased. To this the Earl replied, That the Country were now willing to rise in Confidence of his Conduct and Courage: but if his Force should be defeated, they would not be persuaded to it. And besides, they could not under six Weeks time make their Levies: And if Permission were now denied, the Enemy, if Victorious, would be in their Bowels before they should be in a Posture of Defence.

The Scotch Nobility depart home from Berwick.

The cautious General would not be prevailed on with these Arguments, and so they departed; he returned to Coldstream to his Quarters, and the Scotch Noblemen and Gentlemen to their several Counties.

They had absolutely refused the raising any Horse to mount English, yet this came to no Breach between them and the General, in regard before they left Berwick, the General acquainted them with Intelligence he had received from England, of the Distractions in the English Armies and other Affairs, which made them to fear less than before, their own Peace at Home; and so all parted with mutual Respect.

The General prepares to make Defence against Lambert, if Occasion were.

After this Meeting, the General was contriving how to break off the Treaty with Lambert, which he had hitherto, not without great Artifice, delayed; but he considered, that as soon as that should be done, Lambert would march towards him; and therefore he made Preparation to fight him, if Occasion should urge him to it. In order to which, he sent an Express to Clarges, to provide him some good Horse Officers, and send them by Sea in a nimble Bark. Mean while, in Northumberland the Oagles raised him two compleat Troops, and more Horse were raising. He increased his Number of Pikes in each Company, to be equal to his Musquets, as thereby to be better able to make Defence against the Horse, in which Lambert's greatest Strength was placed.

What Advantages he had against Lambert's Army.

Coldstream was nine Miles from Berwick upon the Tweed, and he had quarter'd all his Men so conveniently, that he could draw them altogether in six Hours; for the Villages are much thicker upon the Scotch than English Borders.

And if Lambert marched towards him, the Villages in Northumberland being thin, he must have quarter'd at such Distance, that his Men would have been exposed to great hazard of being often disturbed in their Quarters: And if he had marched to fight, the General, being upon the defensive Part, could have brought as many Hands to Action as he: Or if he had marched to Carlisle, to have invaded Scotland that way, Monk would then have marched directly to London, and should have been two or three Day's March before him: Or if he had divided his Army, the General would have presently fallen on the nearest Part to him. In this Posture he lay at Coldstream, when he received Intelligence from Clarges, "That there were many great differences in London, betwixt Fleetwood and the City: That the Apprentices, and several others in favour of him, had many Consultations to make Disturbances; that they were framing a Petition to the Lord Mayor and Common-Council, to press their Interposition for the restoring the Parliament, and Preservation of Magistracy, which was endeavoured to be suppress'd by the Committee of Safety, who emitted a Proclamation to prohibit all gathering of Hands to Petitions, which incensed the young Men so much (being fomented by wiser Heads) that they rose in many Places in a tumultuous Manner. And thereupon, Colonel Hewson was sent into London to suppress them, whereby a Rumour was raised, that Soldiers came to plunder them, and all Shops were shut up, and many reproachful Words passed in the Streets, between the Soldiers and Apprentices, to that heat of Passion, that two of the Apprentices were slain, and about twenty wounded, and the rest for that time dispersed. But the Soldiers were so vilified, scorn'd and hiss'd, that they were ashamed to march; and many Officers, when they went into the City, durst not wear Swords, for fear of Affronts, and that many of the private Soldiers, especially the Horse, wished themselves with him: Captain Izod, and others, being active to draw them from Fleetwood's Party: That he had sent Captain Goodwin with some Horse Officers to him by Sea to Berwick, and that Goodwin had his Lordship's Commission for Commander in Chief, of all the Armies in England and Scotland: And that he had treated with Mr. Philip Howard, who had undertaken to raise an hundred Gentlemen well armed and mounted in Northumberland and Cumberland, on Condition to command them for his Life-Guard, which he had promised his Lordship should consent to; but that just as he was preparing for his Journey, he was taken with the Small-Pox, but his elder Brother in the mean time, had writ and undertook to promote the Levies of the Men: That he had treated with Colonel Redman, a gallant Horse Officer, and Colonel Bret, who had been both by Ludlow removed from their Commands, to draw off the Irish Brigade from Lambert, many of the Men having been before commanded by them, and therefore easily persuaded; and that Colonel Morley, Sir Arthur Haslerig, and Colonel Walton, were

A Letter of Advice from Monk

 Lambert
 broke off.

Lambert's

 Appearance of the Portsmouth Commissioners,

Upon Receipt of these Letters, the General writ to Lambert, by Major Bannister, one of the Officers at Berwick, acquainting him, That since his last by Zanchy, he had certain Advice, that three of the Commissioners appointed by Act of Parliament, for the Government of the Army, were now in Portsmouth, acting by Virtue of the same Authority, upon which he acted, and declaring for the same Ends: And that he and the Army were thereby obliged, in Honour and Duty, to take their Advice and consent in all Affairs that relate to the Cause they are now engaged in, which he doubted not, but he would judge reasonable and necessary; and therefore he desired a safe Conduct for the Major, to acquaint them with what had passed in the several Overtures betwixt them; but withal, he told him freely, he could not think it adviseable to proceed further in Treaty (and he expected the other Commissioners would be of the same Mind) 'till he remanded all those Troops he had sent into Northum- berland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, during that time.

Lambert, upon Advice with his Officers, would not let Bannister pass, but sent him back to Ber- wick, for he began now plainly to perceive, that the General intended nothing less than to treat further; whereupon both sides prepared for War: But Lambert was so daily alarm'd with the Success of the Commissioners at Portsmouth, and the daily Submission of several Troops and Companies of Men, that he thought it more necessary to march Southward to assist his Friends in London, than hazard a Battle with General Monk.

Fleetwood, and the rest of the Committee of Safety, were in no less Disorder than Lambert, but that which most amused them, was the Declaration of Lawson, with his Fleet for the Parliament, (which was chiefly transacted by the Endeavours of Colonel Streater, an active Instrument for the King in all these Revolutions, who was forced to fly thither upon Discovery of a Design he had to seize on the Tower) for they thought themselves sure of Lawson, and by his Defection (added to the 1659. rest) their Authority came to be generally def-pised, even by their own Soldiers, so that they abandon'd all; and Fleetwood, with great Contri-tion and Submission, in behalf of his Confederates, sent to the Speaker to desire him to send to the rest of the Parliament Members, and with them to return to the Exercise of their Trust and Power for the Government of the Nation; acknowledging, That the Lord had blasted their Counsels, and, (to repeat his own Words) spit in their Faces.

Upon this several Members met privately in the Speaker's House, and gave Colonel Okey, Colonel Markham, Colonel Allured, and Colonel Moss, orders to draw the Regiments about West- minster to a Rendezvouze in Lincoln-Inn-Fields; which being performed accordingly, the Soldiers declared to live and die with the Parliament, and march'd down Chancery-lane, where at the Rolls they made a halt 'till the Speaker came to them, and received their Acknowledgments, and from thence by his Orders, they went to their Quarters, having first from him received the Word.

And two Days after, that is to say, on the 26th of December in the Evening, the Speaker, and the Members of Parliament, resumed the Government, and sat in the Parliament-House, having met first at Whitehall in the Council-Chamber, from whence they went on Foot thro' Channel-row, (the Mace being carried before the Speaker) to Westminster-Hall, where as they pass'd, the Soldiers upon the Guard stood in Ranks, and made Acclamations. At their first Meeting, they ordered Colonel Alexander Pop-
ham, Colonel Thompson, Mr. Scot, Colonel Okey, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Colonel Matthew Al-
lured, and Colonel Markham, or any three of them, to order, direct, and conduct the Forces of the Army, and all other Forces, and to command the same to suppress all Tumults, Insurrections, and Rebellions, and all such Forces which shall oppose or resist the Command of the Parliament, and to observe such Orders and Directions as they should receive from time to time from the Parliament, or the Commissioners appointed by Act of Parliament, to command the Army, or any three of them, 'till they shall come to London or Westmin- ster, or until the Parliament shall take further Order.

From these Commissioners an Order was sent to Lambert to disperse his Forces, but they were upon breaking before Notice thereof came to him.

We made some Relation of a Treaty betwixt Mr. Evelyn and Colonel Morley, which at this time Mr. Evelyn thought to bring to some advantageous Issue; for Morley upon this Change had his Regiment restored, and with it the Government of the Tower conferred on him, and his Brother Colonel Fagg had also a Regiment; Mr. Evelyn had done for him towards his Majesty, all he desired, for Pardon of him and his Friends; but when he came to him with the Report of it, he was very reserved, and would not entertain any Discourse with him of that Matter; and after one time would rarely admit him into his Company, which made him suspect he had altered his Intentions, and put him to the hazardous Experiment of a sharp and expostulatory Letter; but he was newly involved with General Monk, and Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper in Intrigues

The Irish Brigade brought off to Monk by Redman and Bret.

The manner of surprising Dublin Castle.

When the Parliament thus reconvened, and Lambert in his Declension, the Irish Brigade submitted to Redman and Bret, and was brought off by them; and at the same time, the Soldiers of two Dunkirk Regiments then with Lambert, were in Mutiny for the General, who scarce had received Information of these Actings, when Captain Campbell also arrived at Coldstream with Letters from Sir Hardress Waller, and others from Dublin, with Intelligence of the Surprisal of Dublin Castle, by Captain Joyer and Captain Bond, which was thus performed: One of Bond's Men softly knocking at the Gates, the Centinel opened the Door, and as he opened it, the rest presently rushed in, and on a sudden surprised them within, and seized on Colonel John Jones, Miles Corbet, Colonel Matthew Thomlinson, Colonel Richard Lawrence, Lieutenant-Colonel Henry Jones, Mr. Standish the Treasurer, and Tombes the Store-keeper: The Design was chiefly managed at Dublin, by Sir Theophilus Jones, Trevor, the three Warrens, Colonel Bridges, Thompson, Lisle, Wor-der and Temple, having been two Months in Agitation, and was the more dangerous, because but in one of five Foot Companies that quartered in the City, they could repose any Confidence; neither durst they communicate their Intentions with more than one Officer of that Company, and some few Officers of Horse, whom they engaged out of three Troops; and so much they differed about the time of putting the Business in Execution, that 'till the Night before the Action they had not resolved it: The Pretext made use of for the Business, was their Meeting to promote a Petition in the Army to call a General Council, which so dazled the Eyes of the Commander in Chief, and several other of his Confidants, that they suspected no other Thing to have been intended: And that which the Execution was most remarkable is, that not one Drop of Blood was shed. The next Day after, the City of Dublin drew out their Militia, and declared with them; and although they had but eight Hours Notice, there appeared above two thousand Foot besides Horse.

Sir Charles Coote reduceth all Connaught to a Compliance with the present Design.

Cornet Monk was privy to the Design, and sent to Wexford, Waterford, and those Parts, to incline them to join in it: But Sir Charles Coote and his Brothers had the hardest Task in the Province of Connaught; but they overcame all Difficulties, and in a very short time brought the whole Soldiery and Garrison there to Obedience, and in less than a Week's Space, Limerick, Clonmel, Youghal, Ross, Kilkenny, Drogheda, Dundalk, Antrim, and many other Places declared their Concurrence.

1659. The General always carrying an even Temper in his Behaviour, seem'd not much exalted with this News; yet since it was likely to prove of no small Concernment to himself, he presently dispatched Captain Campbell back, with great Acknowledgements of these Services, and desired to be supplied by them with six Troops of Horse with all convenient Speed: This good News was seconded with Advice from Bowles, of the Lord Fairfax's Rising in Yorkshire, which was somewhat sooner than his Promise, but very seasonable to make a Diversion to Lambert's Forces, with whom Colonel Lilburn's Regiment joined by means of Major Smithson, who was a great Lover of General Monk; and Colonel Redman, came in to them with the Irish Brigade; Colonel Bethel, Sir Henry Cholmley, Captain Strangwaies, and Mr. Arthington also joined with them; the said Messenger also informed him, that the Parliament was again sitting, and that Fleetwood had submitted to them; which made the General immediately march (for he heard that Lambert kept his Brigade together, and intended to oppose the Lord Fairfax and his Friends; and having quitted Newcastle, was marched towards them,) wherefore on the 2d of January at Night, he advanced with two Regiments of Horse and two of Foot, and marched to Wooller: He had the Day before sent Colonel Knight with three Troops to Morpeth, to whom he that Night sent Orders to seize on Newcastle, which he did by six of the Clock in the Morning. Major General Morgan was left sick; and Colonel Read, who commanded the Rear of the Army, marched the next Day with two Regiments of Horse, and three Regiments of Foot; with which his whole Number amounted in all to five thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse. By that time he came to Morpeth, he had Information that Lambert's whole Party was of themselves dispersed into several Quarters in Submission to the Parliament's Orders. And to assure him of the Parliament's sitting, he received a Letter from the Speaker, dated the 27th of December, of Thanks for his Service; wherein the Restitution of their Authority was wholly attributed to his Fidelity, Care and Courage.

The Lord Fairfax, and several of Monk's Party joining with him, rite in Yorkshire.

General Monk begins his March into England.

He receives a Letter of Thanks from the Speaker.

The Knowledge of this did more than any thing perplex the General, as one of the most fatal Accidents that could happen to him; for by their over-hasty Resumption of Power, back'd with a great Army newly returned to their Obedience, he despaired of doing the Good he intended to his Country, and thought no longer of continuing in Arms than 'till a fair Opportunity should be offered him to lay them down and retire, without making them jealous of him; for he expected they would not have thought their sitting safe, 'till his Arrival at London with his Army, and then he would have restored all the other Members with them, without undertaking to judge of the Difference betwixt them.

When he came to Morpeth, Mr. William Man, the Sword-Bearer of London, came to him, with a very respectful Letter from the Lord Mayor and Common-Council of London; to which he made a civil Return the next Day from Newcastle, and thence he marched with continued Journeys to York, where he continued five Days; and all the way as he marched from Coldstream, he

He receives an Address at Morpeth from the City of London by their Sword-Bearer.

1659. he was met by the Gentry, and saluted by all the People as he passed, with great Acclamations of Joy. Colonel Waters, the Sheriff of Yorkshire, met him betwixt Allerton and Topcliffe; several of the Gentry having attended him the Day before at his first Entrance into the County. At York he was visited by the Lord Fairfax, whom he received with much Kindness and Respect, and very civilly acknowledged Mr. Bowles's diligent and industrious Acting in his Concerns: There he modelled Lambert's and Lilburn's Regiments of Horse, and gave the first of them to Colonel Bethel, and the latter to Smithson; and changed most of the other Officers.

The new restored Members begin very actively in settling their Affairs; and on the 2d of January, they name one and thirty to be of the Council of State, passing an ACT for their Constitution, and several Instructions for them to act by: Amongst which it was provided, that none should sit but such as should take an Oath of Abjuration of the King, his Family, and Government.

This Oath being stricter than any that had ever been imposed, was by many disliked; however, the leading Men that promoted it in Parliament affirmed, That without this, they could have no certain Assurance of Power; and that the Hollanders, and those of the confederated Provinces, could never be fixed in their Government, till they had made a Renunciation of the King of Spain. And to that height this Business was brought, that not thinking it enough for the Council of State, they drove on to have it ordered, that every Member in the House should also take the said Oath: This was strongly opposed by Colonel Fielder, Weaver, Dove, Hutchinson, both the Puries, Ingoldsby, and many more of the soperer sort, who alledged, it would be a confining of Providence to make such an Oath, a Snare to many good Men, and a Terror to such as were truly Conscientious, who might suspect this to be a fore-runner of many Oaths to fetter their Consciences. Of these more moderate sort of Men, Fielder and Ingoldsby only were thought Favourers of the King's Party; but the rest were such of whom they had no manner of Jealousy at that time, though afterwards they appeared much inclined to a Conjunction with the secluded Members, and well disposed to Monarchy: So that when the Act for the Council of State came to be executed, in that Part of it which was the Administration of the Oath, Mr. Weaver, Colonel Morley, Oliver St. John, Colonel Fagg, the Lord Fairfax, and many more, even a third Part at least of their Number refused it, and were therefore not admitted to sit and act.

Whilst the General staid at York, he had Intimation that Overton was taking Beds into Hull, breaking the Ice in the Grays, and making such Preparation, as if he took him rather for an Enemy than a Friend; wherefore he sent Major Smith to him, one well known in that Garrison, to inspect into the Condition of it, and writ a Letter to Overton, to expostulate with him about the Matter; who returned an Answer to him, That he perceived Rumour had rendered Hull as doubtful to him, as it had his Design dangerous to them and others; but he was glad to hear that he adhered to this Parliament in their present Constitution, against the Re-admission of the secluded Members, a 1659. free Parliament, or single Person, one of which had been continually charged upon him by the common Cry of the Army.

The leading Members of Parliament finding this Difference growing amongst themselves about the Oath of Abjuration, contrived how to draw the General to their Party; and in order thereunto, Scot and Robinson, two of their Members, were sent to meet him upon the Way to congratulate his Return, but with private Directions to engage him to take the Oath as soon as he came to London, before he took his Place in the Council of State.

Of these their Instructions Clarges having timely Notice, was resolved to be with the General before them; but before he went, he privately got from Quarter-Master-General Butler, a List of all the Quarters in London, for a Purpose which shall be discovered hereafter.

On the 12th of January, the House, to testify their Confidence in the General, passed a Vote to approve of all he had done in order to the Service of the Parliament; and ordered their Vote to be printed: When he removed from York, he sent one of the Dunkirk Regiments of Foot, commanded by Colonel Clark, and Major-General Morgan's Regiment of Horse into Scotland, which, with those he left in Garrison there, he thought enough to secure the Peace of that Kingdom, till time should admit further Consideration thereof. He left Colonel Fairfax's Regiment at York, and disbanded some Companies of Ashfield's Regiment, and mingled the private Soldiers thereof amongst his Regiments to fill up the Companies: And then having given the Council of State an Account of what he had done, he proceeded in his March towards London with four Regiments of Foot, viz. his own, Colonel Read's, Colonel Lydcott's, and Colonel Hubblethorn's; and three Regiments of Horse, viz. his own, Colonel Knight's, and Colonel Cloeberry's, which made his Number in all five thousand eight hundred besides Officers; that is, four thousand Foot, and eighteen hundred Horse: He came the 19th Day of January to Nottingham, where Clarges came to him the Day following, on which Day also Scot and Robinson arrived at Leicester; and, because the next Day was Sunday, they rested there, and met the General upon the Road betwixt Leicester and Nottingham the twenty second.

At Nottingham, Clarges having had secret Conference with the General, communicated to him in what Condition all Affairs stood at London, and that they had there two thousand Horse, and eight thousand Foot, most of them modelled to their own Principles; that the Horse were the Regiments of Okey, Hastervig, Rich and Desborow: And though they had newly given the last to Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, yet all the Officers under him were of the same Mould as the former. The Regiments of Foot were commanded by Ayres, Markham, Streater, Fitch, Moss, Fleetwood, Morley and Fagg; of all which he could have no Assurance but of the two last: For Morley's Men were firm to him, deserted their Officers in the North, and declared for him; and Fagg's was a new Regiment, raised about Portsmouth in his Behalf. He told him, that except he could get all these Horse and Foot out of London, (except Morley's and Fagg's Regiments) and disperse them

The Oath opposed by several of the House.

He disposed of several Regiments and Companies as he came along.

Clarges gives the General an Account how Affairs stood at London.

And gives his Advice as touching the Regiments that were quartered in London.

1659. them into several Quarters, and march his own Men thither, and be Master of London, he could never expect to do any good for his Country; since in all these times it had been experienced, that to whatever was done at London, where they had nine or ten thousand Men to justify their Actions, all the rest of the Regiments submitted.

And if his distinct and absolute Command in Scotland, had not happened in a Conjunction when Fleetwood and Lambert, the two Chief Officers of the Army, were in a Jealousy of each other, and their Treasure quite exhausted, he had never been able to have stood against them; and although there was that Jealousy, and the Principles on which he declared were such, as most of these in Command favoured; yet how slowly did Ireland and the Fleet join with him? And even the Council of State themselves (who had the Temptation of Power to excite them) were backward enough to appear, 'till they saw a Distraction in the other Counsels, for fear, as some of the Chief of them alledged, least the King's Party might have Opportunity to mingle with their Levies, if they should make any. These Considerations took such Impression in the General, as made him apprehend great Difficulties in what he went about, 'till Clarges told him there were yet probable Hopes to make him Master of his Wishes, which he proposed thus: He told him, The Council of State consisted of such only as had taken the Oath of Abjuration; and 'till he should take that, they would be so diffident of him, that whatever he desired of them, of any material Concernment, would be denied: That the major Part in Parliament were against the Oath; and therefore in all his Affairs he was to apply himself to them; and therefore that his best way would be to write them a Letter to this Purpose: That he thought it inconvenient for their Service, that so many of the Soldiery now in London, lately in Rebellion against them, should be trusted with their Guards, 'till the present Officers by them placed upon them, should have by Discipline reduced them to perfect Obedience. The General agreed to this, and a Letter to that Effect was drawn up and signed, but was not to be delivered 'till he came to St. Alban's, that it might seem to come with the Privy of Scot and Robinson; and that the near Approach of the General with his Army might add the more Weight to it.

The next Morning the General marched towards Leicester, and he met Scot and Robinson, the Parliament's Commissioners, in the way to it, and they never parted with him 'till he came to London.

At Leicester the General expected to be attack'd about the Oath of Abjuration, and was much troubled to think how to divert it. Clarges told him, "He had a plain and fair Answer to make to them, which was, That he heard many Men of undoubted Integrity had refused the Oath; and 'till he came to London, to hear the Reasons on both Sides, for the taking and refusing, he could not with Prudence resolve it. This Advice he followed, and succeeded in it. Scot and Robinson at their first Interview told him,

The General's Answer concerning the Oath of Abjuration

Scot and Robinson's Message to him from the House.

"That the Parliament had ordered a thousand Pounds a Year for ever to be settled on him, and appointed them to acquaint him with it; and to let him know the Sense the Parliament had of his great Services, and that they were providing Monies for his Soldiers, and were glad to hear of his repairing to London.

The General was never more put to it than in this Journey to dissemble his Inclinations; for these Men watched every Moment of his time. At Harborough Alderman Fowke, Alderman Vincent, and Mr. Bromfield, met him as Commissioners from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council of London; and at the same time Sir John Norris, with many of the chief Gentry of Northamptonshire, welcomed him into their Country.

The Citizens, after a congratulatory Speech, fell upon Particulars for the general Settlement of the Kingdom; and Mr. Bromfield, in a handsome free Speech, after the Enumeration of the several Calamities it lay under, as the best Remedy, proposed the Re-admission of the secluded Members, that the Parliament might be made full and free. Scot was so impatient at this, that he took the Words out of the General's Mouth, and would not permit him to answer them. He told them, "Now the Parliament had subjected the military Power to a due Subordination to the Civil, they were free; and that having already given their Judgment in the Case of the secluded Members, it did not become them to insist on their Re-admission. Fowke endeavour'd to qualify what Bromfield had propounded, by saying, "He conceived they were not obliged by their Instructions to desire the General's Mediation further, than that they might have all their own Members admitted, since it was unreasonable that they should be governed by a Parliament where they had not their Representatives.

This Discourse, on all Sides, was managed with some Heat; and the General was forced to comply with Scot and Robinson, in their Extravagancies, to preserve their Opinion of him, which made the Citizens part from him somewhat unsatisfied, and so they continued, 'till he sent Clarges privately to give them a better Understanding of his Intentions. But Sir John Norris, and the Northamptonshire Gentlemen, who were prepared to attend him at Northampton, with an Address, were so much discouraged, that they thought to decline it, 'till Doctor Barrow requested Mr. Philip Howard to advise them to proceed in their Intentions, and to assure them,

The General seems to comply with Scot and Robinson.

Sir John Norris, and the Gentlemen of Northamptonshire, make an Address to him.

"That though they had not a satisfactory Answer, they might be sure it would produce a good Effect". At Northampton Sir John Norris delivered his Address; and as he marched to St. Alban's, several of the same Nature were presented to him from the Gentry of Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, Norfolk, and almost all Counties, which did all agree in the same Matter, viz. "For the Restitution of the Members secluded in the Year 1648. and the filling up the Vacancies in Parliament, or else for the calling of a full and free Parliament". All which were answered with much respect by him, although he durst not discover his Approbation of their Desires: And it is very observable, that in all the Counties so much Caution was observ'd, that no Gentlemen signed any of these Addresses that had ever been engaged in his present Majesty's, or his Royal Father's Cause, nor scarce any of the Sons of such.

At

1659. At Dunstable the General consulted Major Knight and Clarges, about the filling up the Blanks in the Letter prepared at Nottingham, having had Thoughts to send it by Clarges, Knight, or Clark his Secretary; but upon further Consideration, it was thought convenient not to part with Knight, because his Presence would be requisite with his Troops, if any Disorders should happen upon their March to London; as for Clark, he was so necessary to be with the General, for the issuing out Orders, that he could not be spared; and for Clarges, it was judged more expedient, that he should be sent before to prepare a Party in the House, so that Lydcott was chosen to be sent as one very grateful to the Speaker, to whom he was near allied; and Friday was the Day inserted for his March into London: And upon the next Day's Consultation, which was Saturday in the Evening, the 28th of January, he was dispatched away: And on Monday the Letter was delivered, which caused a long and violent Debate: Hastlerig told them, the Council of State had before agreed, that four Regiments of those in London should march out, and four of the Generals be admitted; but nothing prevailed that he said against the General's Letter: So that after Debate, from eight in the Morning, to twelve at Noon, the House consented to his Desire.

Lydcott made choice of for the carrying of the General's Letter to the House, about the sending of their Soldiers out of the City.

Lydcott returns to the General with the welcome News of these Votes, as well might it be so to him; for from the Moment of the Execution of them (which gave him the Possession of London) he could not but think his Conduct would prove very ill, if he did not reduce the Armies in the three Kingdoms, to his Obedience.

The General hath constant Intelligence of all Affairs in Ireland by means of Capt. Cuff.

Captain Cuff, an Agent from Sir Charles Coot in Ireland, had attended the General in all his March from Newcastle to London, and given him from time to time, an Account of all Occurrences; by which means the General kept a strict Correspondence both with him, the Lord Brog-hil, and several others of the Chief Officers there; who, although they had reduced all that Kingdom to the Obedience of the Parliament, were nevertheless suspected by them; and Scot insinuated to the General, "That notwithstanding all their Pretences, he had good Grounds to believe they had some other Interest in their Aim, than that of the present Parliament."

The General diverted this Jealousy with Assurances of their Fidelity, and that he would undertake for them, which allayed the Suspicion for that time, or at least so raked it up in Ashes, that no Sparks outwardly appeared.

A Mutiny among some of the Soldiers, that were to depart out of the City. A Rising in the City dispersed by the Soldiers.

The Regiments that were to march from London to give place to the General and his Regiments, had a Month's Pay assigned them, to be paid at their Remove; but that did not hinder them from Mutiny at their Departure, especially those that quartered at St. James's and Somerset-House, which was not without great Industry of the Officers appeased; upon which followed about Midnight an Insurrection in the City, where about six or seven hundred drew together, and by Beat of Drum about the Streets, invited others to join with them for a free Parliament, and the Liberty of the City, in Expectation to have the Soldiers join with them; but two Troops of Horse 1659. suddenly dispersed most of them, and took the rest (about eight and thirty) Prisoners, which were the next Morning committed to Lambeth-House. This Insurrection, together with the Disorders of the Soldiers, so frightened the Council of State, that in the Beginning of the foregoing Night, they had sent to the General to march with all haste into London; but that was afterwards contradicted, and he drew not near the Town till the Morning; and in the Afternoon, the others being all marched out, Tumults quieted, and all, both within and without, in a great Calm, he marched with his Army by Gray's-Inn-Lane into Holbourn, and from thence down Chancery-Lane, and so through Temple-Bar, along the Strand, to White-hall. The three Regiments of Horse marched first, and he in the Head of them gallantly mounted, with his Trumpets richly habited before him, and several led Horses after him, with many of his Chief Officers, and several Persons of Honour and Quality; and after them marched the Foot. The Speaker of the House met him in the Street near Somerset-House, where they complimented each other: After which the General marched on to White-hall, and the Speaker went to the Rolls. As soon as the Soldiers were quartered, and all the Guards set, the General was visited by several of the Council of State; and being invited to take his Place there, he went in Compliance with them: But when the Oath of Abjuration was tendered, he refused it, for the Reasons before-mentioned, and was therefore not admitted; whereupon he returned to his Apartment. The next Day was spent in Visits to him from all the Members of Parliament, and many other Persons of the highest Quality. Mr. Scot told him, The Parliament did intend on Monday, publicly in their House, to give him their Acknowledgments of his Service, and that they expected he should there make publick Professions of his Affections to their Interest and Authority, and his Dislike of the Addresses to him for the secluded Members and a free Parliament.

Gen. Monk marcheth with his Forces into the City of London.

He refuseth the Oath of Abjuration

Scot instructs him how to receive the intended Gratu-lations of the House.

He made little Answer to him, but that he was much obliged to them for the Honour of so great a Respect; and should endeavour by his future Services, to give Evidences of his just Resentments of it.

It is observable, that from this time in all the Orders to him from the Parliament, they called him only Commissioner Monk, and not General: And although yet no publick Order had superseded the Commission of Commander in Chief, sent to him by the Council of State, they allowed him no Authority, but conjunct with others, whereof he took little Notice, but proceeded as before in the sole Exercise of the Command of the Army. He was somewhat perplexed how to behave himself in the Parliament, in reference to the great Professions and Protestations they expected from him of his Aversions from the King and his Party, to balance his refusing the Oath of Abjuration: But he resolved to act in that Occasion, as moderate as the Season would bear; and yet to temper his Speech so, as not altogether to fail their Expectations.

The Stile given him in their Orders, not General, but only Commissioner Monk.

On Monday February the 6th, he was brought with great Ceremony to the House of Commons, where 1659. where a Chair was set for him within the Bar; and he was desired to sit down: But he modestly declined this Honour, and desired Leave to stand behind it. Then the Speaker, after a Compliment in the Style of those Times, returned the hearty Thanks of the House to himself and his Officers and Soldiers, for the Part they had in restoring the Parliament to their former Place and Dignity. The General returned his Thanks for the great Honour they had shewed him for doing only his Duty. But afterwards he took Occasion to observe to them, that the fewer Oaths and Engagements were imposed, the sooner would the Settlement they proposed be attained. He told them, this would reconcile the sober Gentry to them, and enlarge their Interest; and moved them to keep not only the Cavalier, but the Phanatick Party out of Power. He then added some Things relating to Ireland and Scotland, with which he concluded.

His Speech excepted against by Scot and those of his Party. Scot and some others were much offended that he assumed so much in this Speech, and were once thinking to interrupt him. They complained to their Confidants, That he was too positive in undertaking for the Officers in Ireland, of whose Affections to the Parliament in the present Constitution of it, there was just Cause of Doubt; and that in the whole Speech he seemed to affect Popularity, and gave the Cavaliers a Possibility of being received into the Exercise of Trust, with a total Exclusion of the more strict Parliament-Party, under the Notion of Phanaticks.

The City continue Male-content. But that which at this Time more disquieted these Men than the General's Speech, was the discontented Carriage of the City; for the Common-Council had been in very high Debates about the Government, and were resolved to pay no publick Taxes, 'till the House were filled up with equal Representatives. This they looked upon as drawing towards a Contempt of their Authority, and thought they could not better provide for their own Securities, than by opposing in Time, and punishing such Contumacies; They therefore on the 8th of February, in the Evening, at the Council of State, Order the General to go into London the next Morning with a good Part of the Army, and to seize upon Eleven of the most Active of the Common-Council, and commit them to the Tower; as also to pull down the Posts and Chains, and take down the Gates and Percullices of the City, and Quarter his Soldiers there, 'till they were reduced to Obedience.

The General ordered to march into the City, and pull down the Gates. The General was surprized at this Command, and debated many Things with them in Mitigation or Suspension of it, 'till near One in the Morning the next Day, but nothing could divert their Resolution; so that he was forced to obey their Orders, or quit his Command, for he had no longer Time to deliberate than that very Morning in which they were to be put in Execution; insomuch, that after three or four Hours Repose to refresh himself, he marched into the City, and pulled down the Posts, and Chains, and took into Custody Nine of the Citizens, which he had Orders to secure, the other Two absented themselves. The Nine imprisoned, were Mr. Lawrence Bromfield of Tower-Street; Alderman Vincent; Alderman Bludworth; Mr. Thomas Brown of Wood-Street; Mr. Daniel Spencer in Friday-Street, Mr. Penning in Fenchurch-Street, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Chamberlain, and Mr. Richard Ford. The City was much alarmed at this Proceeding: And the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and several of the chiefest of the Citizens applied themselves to him to moderate his Actions. All the City indeed seemed as People confounded with Wonder and Anxiety: And Colonel Hubblethorn, and others, the General's own Officers, were many of them so much troubled, that they came to him to offer up their Commissions, rather than be employed in such an Action: They told him, The Honour and Respect they had to his Person, engaged them never to serve against him, or dispute his Orders: But in this, since they could not without Horror obey them, they with Tears prayed him to dispose of their Commands to some more necessary Persons. He was moved much at these their passionate Expressions, but privately informed them of his own Dislike of what was commanded; and therefore conjured them to continue their Confidence in him, and execute what he had given them in Charge, as that from which better Effects would ensue than what was convenient at that time to be explained. With this they went away somewhat better contented, tho' not fully satisfy'd. He took his Quarter at the Three Tuns in Guild-Hall-Yard, where, notwithstanding this Accident, he received with much Civility those which came to him: Among whom one Mr. Jolly, a discreet Citizen, with Modesty and Temper represented to him the Inconveniences of what he had undertaken, and told him, "The Affections of the City to him were such, that whatever he reasonably could desire of them, should be easier obtained by Persuasion than Force: That the Controversy between Enemies had nothing in it extraordinary; but to be ill treated by Friends was very grievous. When Hewson marched into the City with a greater Number, he could not compass his Ends, but received Opposition with Contumelies and Affronts both to his Person and Party: But when he came, a general Calm and Kindness was seen in the Countenances of the People; and now that he had put his most rigorous Orders in Execution, they seemed rather amazed with Astonishment to receive it from his Hand, than provoked to resent the Indignity of it".

Mr. Jolly's prudent Speech to the General

This Prudent Speech made great Impression on him, insomuch, that he told them thereupon, "That he had Orders to take down the Gates and Percullices as well as the Posts and Chains, but he would immediately write to the Parliament to mitigate their Commands". And accordingly he writ to acquaint them, "That he had secured all the Persons given him in Charge to imprison, except two that were absent; and that the next Morning the Lord Mayor and Aldermen had appointed a Meeting of the Common-Council, where they doubted not that things would be composed to their Satisfaction, and the Assessment be paid, (which was the chiefest Cause of his March into London) so that thereupon he had forbore to meddle with the Gates and Percullices, 'till he should receive further Orders, because such severe acting would highly incense the City, and he hoped by mild Means to reduce them to Reason". This Letter made them higher than before; for whereas in their former Orders they had appointed him only to unhinge the Gates,

The General writes to the House to mitigate their Commands.

1659. and pull down the Percullices, they now command him to destroy both Gates and Percullices: And to prevent the meeting of the Common-Council, they ordered, That the present Common-Council of the City should be dissolved; and declared them null and void. And without any other Answer, they sent these Votes to the General.

They so much the more stirred up, send more rigorous Orders than before.

The General commands the Gates and Percullices to be broken down.

A Petition to the House from the Sectarian Party of the City.

Clarges counsels the General to endeavour the speedy Recovery of the City's good Opinion.

Dr. Barrow urges the Danger of Delay in this Business.

Upon this Return, he was not a little perplexed in Mind, and very thoughtful what to do; but at last he resolved fully to execute his Orders, that the House might not take Occasion from his Dispute of them, in the unsettled Condition of the Soldiers, to vacate his Commission; and thereupon commanded his Soldiers to break all the Gates and Percullices in Pieces. Which done, on Friday in the Evening he came back to Whitehall; but at his Return, Scot and Hastlerig, and some others of their violent Friends were very much moved, as if he had disobeyed his Orders, by which they said he was to continue with his Army in the City, 'till several Designs of theirs, for the further humbling them to their Purposes, should be effected; and there was a Whisper, as if he were to have been questioned for it. It was also artificially contrived, that the same Day the Gates were pulled down, a Petition from a factious Phanatick Party of Citizens was presented by one Praise-God Barebone to the House, to countenance the Action, and to press an Oath of Renunciation to be taken by all that should be employed in Civil and Military Affairs: Nevertheless, to please the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, they had the Thanks of the House for their Moderation in this time of Disorder in the City.

That Evening Clarges privately went to the General, and represented to him the ill Consequences of his Proceedings in London, "And that the Influence that City had by Commerce, and other Occasions, all over England, would quickly diffuse the Infamy of the Fact: And all the Cities and Towns would be alarmed, believing if that great City should be made a Village, all their Franchises and Privileges would be quickly subverted: So that he had no way to redeem his Reputation, but the very next Morning to return into the City with his Army, and declare for a free Parliament". The General, though he demurred a little upon this Counsel, yet he seemed very sensible of the Contempts they at Westminster had put upon him in the whole Progress of this Affair, and was resolved after a Day or two's private Consultation with some of his Officers, to do something to regain their Esteem he had lost; for the Performance of which, he said, He would take time but 'till Tuesday Morning. This was the Effect of their first Discourse. But a while after, Dr. Barrow came to Clarges, earnestly urging him to renew his Advice to the General, setting forth, "That Delay might give his Enemies time to put out of his Power the doing what he intended; and that it was most necessary to be speedy in the retrieving the good Opinion of the City, to manifest thereby the greater Dislike of what he had done the Day before, as that to which the Necessity of the time (against his own Inclination) pressed him to". Whilst they were in this Discourse, two Officers of the Army in whom the General then had much Trust, came in to them, and they all together went to him again, and, with the same Arguments reiterated, dissuaded him from Delay; 1659. adding, "That they had certain Intelligence that the Council of State began to be jealous of him, for that little Favour he shewed to the City in the Execution of his Orders; and that he ought therefore in Prudence to provide for his own Safety". Barrow was appointed to gain what Intelligence he could against the next Morning; and the General with Clarges, Thomson, Saunders and Barton, which two last were advised with as two Officers that very much inclined to Admission of the secluded Members, consulted what to offer to the House as a ground for their March into London: At last waving all Thought of making any Excuse for marching into the City, they conclude, that Orders should be privately issued for about a dozen of the Chief Officers, in whom he had greatest Confidence, to meet at six the next Morning at the General's Quarters; and for the drawing of some Men together before Whitehall, to be ready to march; and that a Letter should be sent to the House in the Morning, signed by the General and a select Number of Military Officers, to complain of many Irregularities committed by them: Amongst others,

"That they gave too much Countenance to Lambert, Vane, and several that engaged with the late Committee of Safety; and that they had permitted Ludlow, and some others, to sit in their House, that had been by Sir Charles Coote, and some of the Irish Officers, accused of High-Treason; and had countenanced too much a late Petition to exclude the most sober and conscientious, both Ministers and others, by Oaths, from all Employment and Maintenance: And in Conclusion, to request, That by Friday next they should issue out Writs to fill up their House; and when filled, should rise at their appointed time, to give Place to a full and free Parliament.

The General having agreed to these Heads, retired to his Repose, whilst the rest penned the Letter, which he directed to be drawn in his Name, and in the Name of the rest of the Officers of the Army. The next Day the Officers, who had been sent for to meet at Whitehall, repairing thither early in the Morning, the Letter was produced, and read to them, (the General being present) and by all of them approved; whereupon the General signed it, and with him several Colonels; viz. Saunders, Read, Lyd-cott, Knight, Cloeberry, Redman and Hubblethorn, one Lieutenant Colonel, which was Ethelbert and Lydcott Morgan, who commanded the General's own Regiment of Foot, and six Majors, Johnson, Bar-ton, Smith, Bannister, Pryme, and Nicholas. Cloeberry and Lydcott were sent with the Letter to the House, and Clarges at the same time was sent to my Lord Mayor, to acquaint him with the General's Intentions to come and Quarter his Army that Night in the City, and to dispose him and the City to give him a favourable Reception.

These things thus ordered, the General immediately marched away to Finsbury, where he drew up his Soldiers, 'till he should hear from Clarges how the City would receive him: Who finding my Lord Mayor very reserved, and averse to the General's coming, as terrified with his Actions the Day before, had applied himself to Alderman Robinson, and some others that he durst trust, and acquainted them privately, that the

The Substance of his Letter to the House.

The Letter being signed by the General, and several Officers, is sent by Cloeberry and Lydcott to the Lord Mayor, who marches to Finsbury.

Clarges finding my Lord Mayor distrustful, applies himself to Alderman Robinson.

Gene-

1659. General's coming was for good to the City and Kingdom, but did not instance in the Particulars of what was in Agitation, having had Orders to conceal that, 'till it was known how they at Westminster should receive the Letter: Nevertheless, Robinson sends for two or three Aldermen of his Confidants, and with these they go to the Lord Mayor to mollify him, but without any Effect for the present: Nevertheless, Clarges told him, the General was resolved, though he quartered not in the City, at least to be his Guest at Dinner: And accordingly he sent to the General, to desire him to march with all his Men to Leaden-Hall-Street, to the Lord Mayor's Door, which he immediately did. While Matters were thus carried on in the City, the House was in great Disorder at the reading of the General's Letter; but they temporized so far, as to shew no publick Dislike at it, but ordered,

The House dissemble their Resentment of the General's Letter, and give him good Words.

'That the Thanks of the House should be given to the General for his faithful Service in securing of the City; and that, as to filling up the House, the Parliament were upon Qualifications before the Receipt of his Letter, and the same should be dispatched in due time; and that Mr. Scot, and Mr. Robinson, should attend him with their Votes, in Answer to his Letter'.

The General troubled at the Lord Mayor's Diffidence of him.

As soon as the General came to the Lord Mayor, he told him, 'He was very welcome to his House, but that the City was full of Fears and sad Apprehensions of his sudden Return, after such violent Actions as the Day before his Soldiers had been employed in'. The General told him, He hoped to make them of another Mind in a few Hours. Yet was he inwardly somewhat troubled, not knowing what Hindrance this Coldness he found might give to his Designs; inasmuch, that he called Clarges aside, and check'd him, as one who had over hastily pressed him on upon so little time of Consideration, to so great an Enterprize. To which he answered, That he was now too far advanced to go back; and that the best Advice he could give him was, to desire the Lord Mayor presently to appoint the Aldermen and Common-Council to meet him at four a Clock at Guild-Hall, and there to acquaint them with his real Intentions, to comply with the Desires of the whole Kingdom.

Requests the same of a Common-Council.

This Motion pleasing, and the said Request being accordingly made to the Lord Mayor, Orders were immediately sent out: But in the mean time, Scot and Robinson came to him from them at Westminster, with the before-mentioned Answer to the Letter.

Scot made Protestations of the Parliament's Affection to him, and their high Opinion of his Services, thereby to divert him from his Intentions of staying in the City: But Colonel Bridges†, an Officer of Ireland that stood by, told them, The General had no Reason to credit their fair Speeches, since their Words and their Practices agreed not together, as was manifest in their Contempt of those his Friends in Ireland, who for his Sake hazarded themselves in their Service; and now when he came from the Irish Army to impeach Ludlow and Jones of High Treason, he could have no Justice, but was put off from Day to Day, when Praise-God Barebone could be heard, and admitted with a Seditious Petition the first Moment he came to the Door of the House. And Cloe-berry told them, The General and all his Officers could not but perceive that they grew jealous of them, and that they went about to balance them with such as had been their Enemies, which made it high time for them to consult for their own Safeties. 1659.

The General closed all with Moderation, telling them, All would be well, if they strictly observ'd the Advice of the Letter, and issued out Writs on Friday next for filling up their House.

With this Answer they returned to their Fellow Members, not very well satisfied, as was evident by what they did that very Afternoon in the House; for they passed an Act to divide the Government of the Army among five Commissioners; namely, General Monk, Sir Arthur Haslerig, the Colonels, Morley, Walton, and Allured, my.

This was opposed by many of the General's Friends, but they were not enough to hinder its Progress; at last, for an Expedient, it was moved, That General Monk should always be one of the three for the Quorum: But upon putting the Question, 'twas carried in the Negative. When Word was brought him of this their Ingratitude to him, he could not avoid expressing much Indignation at it.

The Lord Mayor and Common-Council being met at Guild-Hall about five of the Clock, the General told them, 'That the Employment whereon he was sent, at his last being in the City, was the most ungrateful to him that he ever undertook, and so much against his Inclination, that if any thing less than quitting his Command, could have prevented it, he had never accepted such Employment; nor did he value his Commission out of any Respect to himself, for he had often desired to lay it down; but as knowing how much it imported both him and them, to keep it out of the Hands of such as most probably would not be so well inclined as he, to the Settlement of these Nations. That what he had now to tell them was, That he had that Morning sent to the Parliament, to issue out Writs within seven Days for the filling up of their House; and when filled, to sit no longer than 'till the 6th of May, to give Place to a full and free Parliament'.

The News of this was quickly dispersed thro' all the City, and received with great Demonstrations of Joy, expressed in Bon-fires and ringing of Bells.

After this, he retired for some time to a House in Cheapside, to give Order, for the quartering of his Soldiers, and went himself to lodge at the Glass-House in Broad-Street, 'till Drapers-Hall could be accommodated for his Reception.

The Monday after his Stay in the City, the Council of State writ to him, to desire his Presence with them, to assist with his Counsels in the carrying on the great Affairs of the Nation; to which he the next Day returned Answer: That 'till the Oath should be taken away, which put a Bar to him, and many others, from acting as Counsellors, his Presence could not be useful to them there: And withal, he informed them, That the Distractions of the City were increased by the Continuance of Arms in the Hands of the Phanaticks, and Persons disaffected to the Parliament, who had seven Thousand lately out of the Stores delivered to them, and were providing more: Wherefore he desired them immediately to recal these Arms; and withal, to excuse his Stay in the City for some longer time, 'till the Minds of the Citizens were composed.

The Mayor and Aldermen of the City, and the chief of the Officers (hearing how earnest the Parliament was to draw him again to Whitehall) importuned his Continuance in the City; and to induce him to it, they assure him, it cannot be safe for him; or them, that he remove; for that they 1659. they had certain Information, that many private Letters were sent from Haslerig and others, to withdraw the Affections of the Soldiery from him; and that certain Men were employed to several Regiments to debauch them. This Information had been enough to induce the General, had he not been resolved before: So that when Colonel Allured came from the Council of State, to persuade him against staying in the City, he acquainted him with what he had heard.

Col. Allured laboured to infuse a Belief in him, of his having been mis-informed of those things. It was answered by the General, That he put no greater Stress on those Reports, than to be vigilant over the Actions and Motions of the several Parties, deferring the Belief of them, 'till time should evince the Truth. But he assured him, He was advertised from Persons of good Fame; that notwithstanding that Lambert was proscribed, and Vane put out of this Parliament, and ordered to leave the Town; yet the Stay of the latter was connived at, and Sir Arthur Haslerig, and several others, corresponded with them both.

Sir Arthur Haslerig writ many Expostulatory Letters, to free himself of these Imputations, but could not sufficiently clear himself of them. And now by more frequent Addresses than ever, the General is from all Counties solicited to the Admission of the secluded Members, which he only delayed, because the Army was not yet in a Temper for it; but to prepare them, he receiv'd Visits from some of the secluded Members, where they were always admitted, to hear by their Discourses, how well they were inclined to the Settlement of the Peace of the Nations.

The General is importuned from all Partsto admit the secluded Members.

He admits of a Conference before him of the sitting Members, with some of the secluded.

In this Method he so far proceeded, as on the 18th of February, to have a Conference before him, of some of the secluded Members, and some of the others. Those of the sitting Members were, St. John, Haslerig, Morley, Thomson, Ashley-Cooper, Weaver, White, Fielder, Hutchinson, and Rawleigh; but Scot and Reynolds also were intended by the General to be there; but for want of some Notice they came not. The secluded Members that met them, were, Sir William Lewis, Sir John Evelin, Sir John Holland, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Colonel Popham, Mr. Annesly, Mr. Knightly, Mr. Crew, Mr. Trevor, Colonel Hawley, Colonel Norton, Sir John Temple, and Colonel Birch. They discoursed of many things in order to a mutual Accord for the Peace and Welfare of the Nations, but came to no Conclusion; because the sitting Members durst not undertake for the rest of the House, without their Consent, which could not be known but by Vote: Yet severally, all of them, who were then present, seemed well satisfied with that Moderation and Temper which they found in those Gentlemen with whom they conferred.

The General was fully bent to promote their Admission so far, that if it could not be done by common Consent, he resolved to admit them without it.

The Officers of the Army consent to the Admission of the secluded, upon certain Conditions. * Mr. Clarges and others, appointed

The Officers of the Army were consulted with, and they were willing enough to have them sit, on Condition they would promise to declare for a Commonwealth Government, and pass an Act for the Confirmation of the Possession of their Lands, disposed of since their Seclusion; and to agree upon a short time for their Dissolution. Wherefore, to try how far they were inclined, to admit of those Conditions, * Mr. Clarges, Colonel Cloebery, and Dr. Gumble, were appointed to treat with some of them, who, when they met, had many Discourses of the whole Matter.

The secluded Members declared, as to Government, they intended no Alteration in it, or to act further than in Preparation for a Parliament to succeed them; and since there was no other way for their Summons, but by Writs, in the Name of the Keepers of the Liberty of England, by Authority of Parliament, they saw not how there could be by that Constitution any other Government introduced: As to Confirmation of Sales, and Dispositions of Lands, they said, they had been all made since the Seclusion, and they would not alter them, but rather mediate with the next Parliament, to pass an Act for their Confirmation; and for the time of their sitting, they were contented it should determine in a Month's time. Cloebery urged the great Insecurity the Army and many of their Friends would be in, if their publick Lands were not confirmed, which was the Price of their Blood; and tho' their not disturbing such Possessions in England, might be a little Satisfaction, yet the whole Nation of Ireland was unsettled, both as to Adventurers and Soldiers. To this it was replied, That they should not think themselves in a Capacity to pass any Acts at all, as being but one House; and to prevent all Jealousy of their Actions, they would consent to be limited to the chief Heads of what they should consult, during the short time of their Continuance.

When the Conference ended, Report was made of the Substance of it to the General, and the rest of the Chief Officers, who approved of every thing proposed by the secluded Members, except the not Confirmation of publick Dispositions of Lands, and their refusing to pass any Acts of Parliament: As to that of Lands, which they would not be drawn to confirm, Clarges told the Officers, they could not answer it to the Kingdom, to break with them for that Consideration, thereby to obstruct the Settlement of it, out of Respect to their own private Interests: He said, the greatest Part of his own Estate was in Ireland, and that it was acknowledged by all, the greatest Insecurity of publick Estates was in that Kingdom; yet he would, for his own Part, submit all his Concerns to the Determination of the next Parliament, rather than by opposing the Admission of these Gentlemen, contribute to the Hazard of the publick Peace. And as to that of publick Acts, he told them, he doubted not but they would alter their Opinions, because no Money could be raised to supply the Necessities of the Government; nor could their own Dissolution be but by an Act.

The General, upon hearing this, seemed very much satisfied, upon which all the rest assented. And it was agreed, that the secluded Members that were in Town, should, before their Admission, sign a Paper to consent to confine their Consultations, chiefly to the four Heads following:

1. To the settling the Conduct of the Armies, in the three Nations, as might be most serviceable to the Peace of the Nations.

2. For the providing Maintenance for the Forces by Sea and Land, and Money for their Arrears, and the Contingencies of Government.

3. To the appointing a Council of State to settle the Civil Government and Judicatures in Scotland and Ireland, and to take Care for the issuing of Writs for the summoning of a Parliament to meet at Westminster the 20th of April.

4. To to treat with some of the secluded concerning the safe Conditions.

1659.

The General meets them at Whitehall in order to their Admission into the House.

4. To their own legal Dissolution.

This Subscription was willingly made, and on Tuesday following in the Morning, the General gave them a Meeting at Whitehall; whence, after a short Speech to recommend to them the Settlement of the Nations; with Assurance, That he would impose nothing on them, they went to take their Places in the Parliament; being conducted thither by Captain Miller who commanded the Guards.

As soon as the Members were gone, the General summoned all the Officers of the Army together that were then in and about London, to consider of a Letter to be sent to all the Regiments in England, Scotland and Ireland, to have their Concurrence to what had been done concerning the Admission of the secluded Members; which was referred to a Committee to be drawn up, with special Directions to satisfy them, That nothing was intended for Alteration of Government, but that it should continue as a free State and Commonwealth. This he did, in regard he knew it impossible, as Affairs stood, to keep the Army in Temper any other way. The Letter was in a little time prepared, and so many Clerks were employed, that Copies of it were that Night signed and dispersed to all the Regiments and Garrisons in England, and to the Commanders in Chief of the Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland.

These Transactions were managed with so much Secrecy, that the Members that were sitting in the House knew nothing of them, 'till they saw the secluded Members come in and sit amongst them. Upon which they being surprized, were at first at a Demur amongst themselves, whether they should keep their Seats, or quit the House; 'till at length the grand Sticklers of them for a Commonwealth, well knowing that it would not be in their Power by staying, to make their Interest good against those who were now the major Party of the House, resolved, since they could not hinder them the partial Possession thereof, to resign it intire unto them, while those of them that were the most moderate and well inclined staid behind, and took their Seats amongst the new admitted Members; who in the first Place applied themselves to vindicate the Honour of their House, as far as in them lay, by nullifying and expunging out of the Journals all Votes whereby they were disabled from sitting as Members therein. Next, they order Mr. Vincent and Mr. Bromfield, and the rest of those Citizens which were committed by the Council of States Orders, when the City Gates were broken, to be released; as also all others who were any where imprisoned upon Sir George Booth's Rising, or for making Addresses for the Admission of the secluded Members. Moreover, they constituted General Monk by Act of Parliament, Captain General of all the Armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and repealed that Act which made him only a joint Commissioner with Colonel Morley, Haslerig, Walton, and Allured, for Government of the Army.

Some there were of these restored Members, who at the first Admission, could not well be present, by reason of their far distant Habitations; of which Number was Mr. William Morrice, whom Mr. Nicholas Monk, the General's Brother, knowing him to be a prudent Person, and well disposed for his Prince's Service, and the good of his Country, writ to Clarges to put the General in mind of sending for him, that being near him, he might be assistant to him in his Counsels: To this the General was easily persuaded, having had long before, by his Brother's Report of him, a good Opinion of his Abilities and Worth; and the rather, for that by his Wife he was somewhat allied to him. Clarges acquainted Mr. Nicholas Monk with what he had done, and inclosed a Letter from the General to Mr. Morrice, to acquaint him with his Admission of the secluded Members, and to desire him to repair to the Parliament; where he arrived whilst they were sitting, and took his Place in the House; wherein he appeared a most useful Instrument by his great Abilities, in promoting and carrying on of the General's Affairs in relation to his Majesty's Interest.

The Parliament repealed the Act for the former Council of State, and the Oath of Abjuration, and passed an Act for another Council to consist of one and thirty Persons: Which were, General George Monk, William Pierpoint, John Crew, Esq; Colonel Rossiter, Richard Knightly Esq; Colonel Popham, Colonel Morley, Lord Fairfax, Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper, Sir Gilbert Gerard, Lord Chief Justice St. John, Sir John Temple, Lord Commissioner Widdrington, Sir John Evelyn of Wilts, Sir William Waller, Sir Richard Onslow, Sir William Lewis, Colonel Edward Montague, Colonel Edward Harley, Colonel Richard Norton, Arthur Ansley, Esq; Denzel Holles, Esq; Colonel George Thomson, John Trevor, Esq; Sir John Holland, Sir John Potts, Col. John Birch, Sir Harbottle Grimstone, John Swinfin, Esq; John Weaver, Esq; Serjeant Maynard; most of them Men of Integrity, and well affected to kingly Government.

The General hearing that Colonel Rich was about St. Edmund's-Bury, and having actually debauched two Troops, was endeavouring to corrupt the rest of his Regiment; he sent the Life-Guard to reduce them, and gave a Commission to Col. Ingoldsby to command the Regiment.

The Life-Guard had been lately in Defection with the rest of the Troops under Lambert, and had not been mustered since the Restauration of the Parliament, nor had hitherto any Commander in Chief: And therefore the General thought fit at this time to model that Troop, and to give the Command thereof to Captain Philip Howard, making Mr. Robert Harley his Lieutenant, and his Kinsman Mr. Henry Monk, Cornet; who were so active, that in six Hours time they displaced all of whom they had any Suspicion, and filled up the Troop with honest and gallant Men; who immediately marched towards Suffolk, to execute the General's Orders upon Colonel Rich; but he having Notice of the marching of that Party towards him, retired privately, and the Regiment quietly received Col. Ingoldsby to command them, who by the General's Appointment, put out all such Officers as were of froward and seditious Principles in Religion or Government.

And to reduce North Wales to a more settled Condition than it was in at that present; the General gave Colonel Carter a Commission to be Governour of Beaumaris Castle, (the Soldiers whereof had been placed there by Colonel John Jones) with Authority to raise Forces to reduce Denbeigh and Conway, which had been in very ill Hands, and to settle that Country in quiet; which he did in a very short time, to the great 1659. Satisfaction of all the Gentry and People in those Parts.

The late Commonwealth Parliament before the Admission of the secluded Members, had given Desborow's Regiment to Colonel Walton; but the General disposed of it to Colonel Charles Howard of Naworth, whom he also made Governour of Carlisle.

The Parliament passed an Act of Assessment for a hundred thousand Pounds a Month for six Months, and proceed with much haste to settle the Militia both in the City and all other Parts of England and Wales, having vacated the former Act made before their Admission, because most of the Commissioners and Officers all over England, were Persons of suspected Inclinations to the Government.

There being at this time an unusual Confluence of Officers of the Army in London, and some Troops and Companies drawing together in several Parts of the Kingdom; the Parliament by Proclamation commanded all Officers to repair to their respective Charges, and not to depart from thence without special Order from the Lord General: And that all such Troops and Companies as had removed from their Quarters without the Lord General's License, should return forthwith to their last Quarters formerly assigned, or to such others as should be assigned them by Directions from the Lord General.

But notwithstanding all this Care in the Parliament, Colonel Overton was designing to make Disturbances in Yorkshire; he drew up a Letter to Colonel Fairfax, Colonel Bethel, and Colonel Smithson, which he caused to be subscribed by all his Officers; exhorting the Soldiers to be watchful, and guard themselves against the abandoned Interest of Charles Stuart, which was now reviving, and would introduce the Bondage they had freed themselves from: With more to the same Purpose.

Many Copies of this Letter was dispersed amongst the Soldiers before the Original was sent, and an Attestation added in these Words: This is Overton's and the Officers of the Garrison of Hulls Letter: And it is hoped, will meet with the Concurrence of all our honest Fellow-Soldiers, who have been engaged in the good old Cause against the Interest of a King and single Person.

If Colonel Fairfax, Smithson, and Bethel, had not been very active, this Practice had perverted many Soldiers, but they were vigilant to prevent it. Upon Knowledge of this Letter, the General writ to Overton by Colonel Allured and Major Smith, to give him Satisfaction in his Proceedings here; and the Council of State, upon his Motion, did the like. Major Smith was well known and beloved in Hull, and, the General having a Design to remove Overton, he was privately to deal with some Officers and Soldiers under him who loved him not, to bring him to Reason, if upon Orders for his Remove, he should be disobedient to them; and as soon as they were gone, he sent private Orders to Colonel Fairfax (to whom he gave a Commission to be Governour of Hull) to draw some Companies to Beverly, and writ to Overton to repair immediately to him.

Colonel Overton was surprized at the Receipt of this Letter; but finding himself in no Capacity to dispute the Order for his Delivery up of Hull, he submitted to it; and sent to Colonel

Fairfax to acquaint him with that his Resolution; and himself at eleven a Clock the same Night, began his Journey towards London to the General.

The General about the same time gave his Commission to Mr. Clarges to be Commissary-General of the Musters of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and to Mr. Maurice to be Governour of Plymouth; and to Major-General Morgan, to be Commander in chief of the Army in Scotland.

Morgan was already upon the Place, but wanted sufficient Authority, till he had his Commission sent him; and all the Army there submitted to the General's Actions in Reference to the secluded Members, except a Company in Garrison in the Isle of Orkney, commanded by one Watson, which was reduced by Captain Man and Watson, and his Officers imprisoned, and his Company disbanded.

Many private Overtures were made to the General by some of the Peers that sat in the Lord's House a little before the Death of the late King, to be admitted to sit; but he thought it inconvenient and hazardous, in Regard, the Army was already so jealous upon the sitting of the secluded Members, that he had Difficulty enough to moderate them.

Every Post brought the General Addresses from all the Regiments in England, of their Consent to his Actions: And Sir Charles Coote in Ireland had with many other Officers, upon the same Day that the secluded Members were admitted, declared at Dublin for them, and had secured Sir Hardress Waller, that had dissented from him.

Those of the former Members who staid in the House after the Admission of the secluded Members, that they might engage the General against the King, promoted an Act for the settling of Hampton-Court, with all the Parks and some other Lands upon him and his Heirs for ever; which so troubled him, that he used all the Friends he had to divert it; and at last an Expedient was found out, by giving him by Act of Parliament a Present of twenty thousand Pounds in Money, and the Custody or Stewardship of that House, and the Parks for his Life. They also conferred upon Commissary Clarges the Hamper-Office; and about the 13th of March they ordered, that the Engagement, appointed to be taken by each Member of Parliament in these Words: viz. I do declare and promise, that I will be true and faithful to the Commonwealth of England, as the same is now established without King or House of Lords, should be taken off the File, and made null.

Scot, Haslerig, and some others, were much alarmed at this Proceeding, which they took to be an inevitable Prognostick of introducing the King; and though they so much affected Power, as to endure no Rivals in it, they chose rather to have the General take the Dominion of the three Kingdoms upon himself, than to have the King restored. They consulted privately with some of the Officers of the Army, whom they trusted most, and these approved so well of the Expedient, that the General was treated with about it in Whitehall, where Haslerig told him, 'That many of his Friends were much troubled at the Parliament's Actions, which tended both to the Ruin of him, and all the good People of the Nation, since it was evident, that by what they had voted the Day before, nothing was 1659. 'was intended but the Restitution of the King. His Overthrow, they said, must needs succeed the Admission of the King; for a Merit too great to be rewarded, could have no Recompence but Death; whereof frequent Examples are to be found in all History, and in none more pregnant than our own; where it is recorded, that the same Stanley, who placed the Crown upon Henry the VIIIth's Head, had his own struck off, upon a very frivolous Pretence, when the Reason was only Excess of Merit. They told him likewise, They found a Commonwealth Government, not agreeable with the Disposition of the People, who are always bad Judges of what is best for themselves; and therefore since a single Person was necessary, there could not be one fitter than he for that Office: To which they had very good Grounds to believe all the good People of the Nation would concur with them".

The General told them, 'He himself was not well pleased at the late unnecessary Vote of Parliament concerning the Engagement, but many of the most discreet Members had been with him, and satisfied him, that they had no Design in it, but to keep themselves free against the next Parliament; for in regard, they said, that he had consented that the final Determination of Government should be referred to that, they were unwilling to anticipate their Councils by determining of it by that Engagement, which would be too great a Snare unto them: Still urging, 'That they knew not any Cause he should have of Fear, for that the very Writ of Summons of the next Parliament, did sufficiently defend the Government, in restraining their Debates to it. As for the Government in his own Person, he said, The Experience of Cromwell's Fate gave him Reasons to avoid the Rock on which that Family was split".

They replied, 'That Oliver Cromwell usurped the Dominion against the Suffrage of the Army, and the Consent of all the good People; whereas he should have it by their unanimous Consent, and under what Name and Title he pleased to accept it".

The General would by no means hear more of these Temptations, resolving not to lose the Honour derived to him from as antient a Stock of Gentry as any was in England, by so treacherous a Prostitution of it.

A little before these Men went to the General, Commissary Clarges had been tampered with by them, to the same Purpose; and observing them to go from him to his Lordship, he deliberated how to extricate him from further Applications of this kind, and punish the Insolency of these Undertakers.

The Council of State sitting at the time of this private Conference, and within two Chambers of the Place where it was transacted, he sent in to the Council to Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper, and informed him of what he knew, and what he further suspected: Upon which it was agreed, that as soon as the General should depart from them, and come into the Council, he should move, That all Clerks and Attendants, that were not Counsellors, should withdraw, and the Doors be locked, and then declare, that he had had Information of a dangerous Design in some seditious Persons, who were contriving to make Disturbances in the Nation; and that they had proceeded so far, as to make some indecent Overtures to him, of which he desired that the Council might receive a full Discovery, that thereupon they might apply themselves to prevent the Consequences of it.

But the General being unwilling to expose those Men to ruin, tho' they deserved not his Favour, because his Purposes were designed to be effected by the most peaceable Ways, told the Council, That there was not so much Danger in Agitation as they apprehended; but that it was true, some had been with him to be resolved in Scruples concerning the present Transactions in Parliament, but they went away from him well satisfied.

Thus the goodness of the General was abused, for these unreasonable Men, when they saw they could not allure him to their Ends by the Temptation of Power, attempted to make a Mutiny in the Army; wherein they prevailed so far, as that the Officers had had one Meeting, and had appointed another. In their first they were so heated, that a Declaration was immediately prepared, and brought by some of them to the General, to oblige him, with his Army, to declare for a Commonwealth, and engage against all them that should attempt the setting up of a single Person; and that he should send to the Parliament to join with them in this Declaration.

Commissary Clarges and Mr. Clark, the General's Secretary, where with him when this was brought to him, and observing great Trouble in his Countenance at the reading of it, moved, That he would defer the signing or giving any Opinion of it 'till the next Morning, because then the Officers of the Army were to have a General Council. This was done, that the General might have time to provide himself of Arguments against it, and prepare some of his Friends to join with him. One of the chief Motives that induced him to make Mr. Morris an Officer of the Army, was to have his Aid in Consultations at such times as these: For there were frequent Meetings of Officers, and one of so good Judgment and Elocution as he, could not but persuade much; so that he had been the fittest Person that could been thought on, had not his being unused to such Assemblies made him not care to be present at them.

The next Morning a great Concourse of Officers met at St. James's, and Colonel Okey opened the Council, with a long Speech, Of the Fears they were in of an Inundation of Evils breaking in upon them, to invade their Civil and Religious Liberties; and if great Care was not used to prevent it, Charles Stuart would be introduced: And that the best Expedient that could be thought of, was to send immediately to the Parliament, to oblige them to declare and engage for a free State and Commonwealth, without a King or House of Lords: And if they refused to do it, to take such a Remedy as God should put into their Hearts to save the Nation from Destruction.

Commissary Clarges answered, That he saw no Cause for those Fears that were insinuated; and that if they sent to the Parliament in such a manner, they would find no pleasing Return from them; for if these Men would have been terrified by the Army, there would not have been fourteen of them impeached at one time of Treason, and two hundred secluded at another; and the first thing they would probably do, upon the Receipt of such a Message, would be to dissolve themselves, and then there would be no Government; but instead of the single Person they were

And as for the General (applying himself to him) he said, he knew he would not assume the Government, having heard him profess, (on Occasion of these Alterations) he would rather be drawn in Pieces with wild Horses, than be so treacherous to the Nation.

The General's Determination of the Latter.

The General concluded, and told them, 'The time of this Parliament's ending was so near, they could not do the Ills some of them (he hoped) causelessly feared: And that from the next Parliament he doubted not they would receive better Satisfaction than they had in this, since it was provided in the Act for their Assembling, that none should be elected that had been against the Parliament since 1641. Withal, He confirmed what Commissary Clarges had said, 'That if by this violent Proceeding they should make the Parliament hastily dissolve themselves, and leave the Nation in Confusion, they must not expect he would take upon him the Government, which he had rather lose his Life than accept.

After this, there was little moved by any of the Officers; only one said, That nothing could be hoped from Qualifications for a new Parliament, for they themselves being to be Judges of them, it might so happen, that the major Part might be of such as were not themselves qualified.

The General knew this to be an unanswerable Argument, (and it was for this Reason he pressed for a new Parliament on any Terms) but was unwilling to hear more Discourse of this kind, and therefore told them, Nothing was more injurious to Discipline, than their meeting in Military Councils to interpose in Civil Things: And from that time he forbid them to assemble again; and within a few Days after, that is to say, on the 17th of March, the Parliament by Act dissolved it self, having before summoned a Parliament to succeed them the 25th Day of April following; and passed two Votes to keep the Royal Party out of both House and Army. The Royal Party, who had suffered so much in the Defence and Service of the Government, and who had behaved themselves so honourably in their Endeavours of extinguishing all Animosities, upon this hopeful change of Affairs; little, I say, did they expect to see themselves turn'd out of Doors by such a Preclusion from publick Office or Employment, upon the very Test of their Fidelity to their Sovereign. But these Votes were little heeded by the Electors, the People having so great an Esteem for the Royal Party, that almost generally wheresoever they stood, they carried it, and kept their Places too in the House of Commons, notwithstanding a Contrivance there also, to have ejected them after they were met.

The Conference between Monsieur de Bordeaux, and Commissary Clarges.

Monsieur de Bordeaux, the French Ambassador, then Resident in London, was very desirous to interest Cardinal Mazarini in this great Revolution of Government; and having had Acquaintance with Clarges, expected by him to discover all the General's Designs; and in order thereunto, sent his Secretary to him, to desire him to move the General to have Licence to give him a Visit, and to confer about some Overtures he had to make to him.

Clarges, upon this Intimation, went to the Ambassador, who carried him into his Closet, and they two being alone, he told him, 'That it was visible to all, that the General had some great Design in Projection, and that most wise Men believed it was, either to advance himself to the Monarchy of these Nations, or introduce the King; and that in either of these, he had the Advantage of being more serviceable to him than any other; for if he should use any Englishman in so important an Intrigue, if he should not have Success, that would be brought in Evidence against him to his Destruction; whereas he as a Stranger, and a publick Minister, could not be questioned. He further said, what he proposed, was not only in Reference to himself, but to Cardinal Mazarini, who would be glad to have the Honour of his Friendship, and assist him faithfully in all his Purposes. He said moreover, that he could not undertake to determine, whether it was not best for him to dignify his Family with the Empire of these Kingdoms, or to restore the King to them; they were both Actions of much Glory; and if the latter were as easy, the Honour of it would be as great: But that he might be confident of the Cardinal, he did assure him, that Oliver Cromwell kept so strict a League with him, that he did not assume the Government without his Privy, and was directed Step by Step by him in the Progress of that Action: And therefore, if he resolved on that Course, he should not only have the Cardinal's Friendship and Counsel in the Attempt, but a safe Retreat and honourable Support in France, if he failed in it. Or if he would admit the King, and put the Manner of it into the Cardinal's Hands, whatever he would desire for himself of Security, or Honour from the Crown, he would undertake to obtain, and in such a manner, that it should rather seem by the Cardinal's Advice, than his particular Inclinations; and the King would gladly receive it, and France should be the Place to which (if he agreed) the King should presently retreat; where he should have a Train provided proportionable to his Greatness, that his People here might, with greater Reverence, apply themselves to him; and by this Way (he said) the General might not only oblige the King of England, but the King his Master also, by making him a Mediator and Instrument in his Restauration".

To this Clarges answered, 'That the Matter was too deep for him to be involv'd in, in regard (as he himself had acknowledged) of the Danger of having such a Secret known to any second Person, a Native of England.

But nevertheless, to satisfy him, he assured him, that the General did not intend to take upon him the Government, but submit all to the Determination of the next Parliament".

He then replied, 'That a Parliament in England was a kind of tumultuary Council, so various in their Debates, that no certain Measure could be taken from them; and therefore for not taking this Course which he advised, he might be hurried by their froward Proceedings, to some sudden Enterprize, neither safe for himself, nor good for the People; and that with him, in any Misfortune, all his Relations would be ruined".

To this Conference Clarges put an End, by telling him, 'He would take a sudden Occasion to sound the General's Inclinations, and tho' he would not directly tell him what had pass'd betwixt them, he should nevertheless guess, whether 1659. whether it might be fit for him to impart it to him: The only difficulty that remained, was the General's want of the French Tongue, which the Ambassador said, 'Was not necessary, for, that he had English enough to be understood, and to understand all that should be said to him; and thus they parted'.

The General refuseth to treat with the Ambassador, or the Cardinal. Clarges told all that pass'd to Mr. Morrice, and to the General himself, who absolutely refused to have any Commerce with the Ambassador or the Cardinal; nevertheless, that he might not appear uncivil, he was contented to receive his Visit, but on Condition, That he should not propose any thing to him in Reference to the publick Affairs of Government.

This was signified to the Ambassador, and he came that Evening to complement the General, making great Professions of his Services to him, on all Occasions, without descending to Particulars.

The manner of Sir John Greenvil's Application to the General. Much more successful was the Application made by Sir John Greenvil, who being an active Agent for the King, and a near Kinsman to the General, was therefore by his Majesty thought a fit Person to be employed to him; but he knowing the wary Temper of the General, was much troubled how to get Access to him; till bethinking himself of Mr. Morrice, his Neighbour in the Country, a Person often conversant with the General, he concluded by his Mediation to do it, and thereupon requested him to let the General know he had something of great Importance to impart to him, and desired he would give him the Opportunity to do it.

When Mr. Morrice informed the General of this, he received it with much Strangeness; for although Sir John was his near Relation, yet by Reason of his Youth, and the General's long Absence from his Country, they had little Acquaintance with each other, and therefore he told Mr. Morrice, Except he would send some Information by him, of the Nature of his Business, he could not admit of any Intercourse with him.

Mr. Morrice told him, He had already desired to know that, but Greenvil refused it. The General in his Mind liked well of this Reservedness in Sir John, and bid Mr. Morrice acquaint him, That if he came the next Day at nine in the Evening to St. James's, he would speak with him. And accordingly Greenvil came to him, at the appointed time, which was the next Evening after the Dissolution of the Parliament.

His Reception. When he came, after he had requested Pardon for the Importunity of his Visit, he desired his Permission to deliver a Message he had to him from his Majesty. The General seem'd surpriz'd at this saying; but seeing that there was no Body in the Room but Mr. Morrice, and he at a good Distance from them, he bid him say what he pleased:

He then presented to him a Letter from the King, and told him, 'That his Majesty had great Confidence in his Affections to him, and since he had complied so far with the Desires of all the sober Part of the Kingdom, for the Admission of the secluded Members, in order to a free Parliament; the Consequences of that could not but give sufficient Evidence of his Inclinations to his Majesty's Service and Restitution, which would naturally flow from his Endeavours, in Conjunction with their Counsels'.

The General replied, 'That he had long lamented the miserable Distraction of his native Country, and waited a fit Occasion to contribute his Assistance to the Redemption of it: And when Lambert and those with him had interrupted the Parliament; considering that the Army had been newly in a great Measure by that Parliament modelled, he supposed by a Declaration for their Restitution he might gain a Power in his Hands for better Purposes, and, as the better to bring these his Purposes about, he resolved if by his Arms the Parliament should be restored, together, with those few Members which sat at their Interruption, to admit those also who had been secluded; intending to that End, by Degrees, to put his Army into such Hands as would favour his Intentions: That it was well known to all, how he was disappointed in that Design, and thro' what Difficulties he arrived to the Station he was then in; nor was he even at that time secure from great Danger of Disappointment, if he should not manage his Affairs with more than ordinary Secresy.

As to the King's Majesty, he said, none wish'd him greater Felicity than he, nor desired his Restauration with more Passion; but if it were not cautiously attempted, it would be out of his Power to serve him in it, since in Counsels of so nice Concernment, there would not be room for two Errors. The People, he told him, had been long seduced by seditious Insinuations, and the Army in the Hands of such, as had always been against his Royal Father; and many of them even against Monarchy it self: But nevertheless, he hoped, if they might find the same Security under his Majesty's Government, as they had under the Usurpers of it, he might not despair of their Reduction to Obedience. And to effect this, it was his humble Advice, that his Majesty should prevent their Fears, by declaring a free and general Pardon to all his Subjects, and engage himself to give it under the Great Seal, to all that should submit to his Authority, except such as should be exempted by the Parliament.

And that he would consent to any Act or Acts of Parliament, that should be presented to him for the Settlement of publick Sales and Dispositions of Lands, to Officers, Soldiers, and others; and the Payment of the Soldiers Arrears: As also for Toleration of Liberty of Conscience to all his Subjects; and that none should be punished for Differences in Matters of Religion who should not disturb the publick Peace'.

Sir John asked him, 'What he would give him in Command for himself, and if he would write to his Majesty? Which he excused at that time, saying, 'If his Letter should be intercepted before he had compleated the Reformation of the Armies, it would be impossible for him to keep them in Temper, or hinder the Subversion of all he had hitherto done; adding, 'That he sought not his own Advantage in his Endeavours for the publick Benefit of his Country; and that having with much Hazard brought Matters near to a fair Issue, in pursuance of the general Suffrage of the Nations, he was unwilling, by Indiscretion, to venture a Relapse, but would chose to involve himself in the same Condition with the Generality of the People, in Expectation of what the next Parliament should bring forth, to the Happiness of his Majesty, and all his Kingdoms'.

The General's Answer.

A further Discourse between them confirming the Sincerity of the General's Intentions.

1659. Sir John Greenville writ down the Substance of this Discourse, and repeated it to the General, to be the better able to maintain it in his Memory; but as soon as he had read it, he entreated him to tear it in Pieces, and conjured him to acquaint no Person whatsoever with their Conference, except the King himself, and to request him also to conceal it. But above all things, he intreated him, To desire his Majesty from him, to go out of the King of Spain's Dominions to Breda, or some other Place under the Government of the States of the united Provinces; for that he had certain Intelligence, he would be detained by the King of Spain's Ministers, if he stayed in his Dominions.

And at Sir John's parting from him, he told him, He was glad that this Occasion of presenting his Duty to the King, was an Effect of his Diligence, whom he was glad to find so industrious and vigilant in his Master's Service; of which he had before some Experience when his Brother Nicholas came from him into Scotland.

Sir John takes his Journey towards Brussels.

He promised to observe all the General's Instructions; and when he came to Ostend, (where he arrived the 23d of March) he put all that had passed betwixt them into Writing, and digested it into Form, to be presented to his Majesty. And in the Conduct of the whole Affair, he was so secret, that the Lord Mordant, who went over with him to his Majesty, knew nothing of it.

He gives his Majesty an Account of his Negotiation, and the Effects thereof.

At Brussels he retired to a private House, to which his Majesty (upon Intimation) very secretly repaired, and with great Satisfaction received the Intelligence he brought, but because he could not prosecute the General's Desire (as to his Removal) without Advice for the Manner of executing it, he consulted the Marquess of Ormond, the Lord Chancellor, and Mr. Secretary Nicholas, being Persons in whom, from just Reason and Experience, he had most intire Confidence; by whose Assistance the Matter was so ordered, that in two or three Days, he took his Journey to Breda; where we shall leave his Majesty in Consultation to return to the Transactions in England of that busy time.

The King removes to Breda.

The Council of State set forth a Proclamation for the preventing of Tumults and Disturbances.

The Council of State took Care to have the Act put in speedy Execution throughout England, for the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, and for putting the Militia into sober Hands: And because many seditious People were endeavouring to debauch the Army, they published a Proclamation to forbid all Persons whatsoever, to correspond with any of the Officers and Soldiers of the Army in the way of agitating, or otherwise, whereby any Dissatisfaction might be raised towards the present Government, to endanger the Peace of the Nation, giving Power to all Officers, both Military and Civil, to seize upon any Persons offending as aforesaid: And for the better Encouragement of all whom it should concern, they declared and promised to give to the Discoverer of any such Person, who should apprehend and secure such Offenders, the Sum of ten Pounds. And this Proclamation was ordered to be published at the Head of every Regiment, Troop and Company of the Army, to the Intent, the same should be the better taken notice of, and put in more effectual Execution: And the General sent it to every Regiment to be proclaimed accordingly. But this did not sufficiently prevent the ill Humours amongst the Soldiers, which made Commissary Clarges consult privately with the General, about some other more effectual Course; he proposed to frame an Engagement for all to subscribe, to acquiesce in whatsoever the next Parliament should do, and to displace all that should refuse: His Lordship liked very well of this Proposition, but thought it very hard to be executed; nevertheless, he encouraged him to go on, and that Night alone he framed it, and immediately advised with Colonel Howard, Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper, Mr. Ansley, and Colonel Knight, (who all of them with one Consent approved it, being all Persons of great Credit with the General) about putting it into Execution. Colonel Knight undertook by the next Day at Noon, to get it signed by all the Officers of his own Regiment, and the General's Regiment of Horse, and the Life-Guard; and Colonel Howard did the like for his Regiment which lay about Croydon; for he had so modelled it, that he was sure of all his Officers; all which by the foresaid time being accordingly effected, they met together at Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper's Lodging; and glad to see their Business so well advanced by the Subscription of these three Regiments, they, in the next Place, thought it expedient to have the Officers of all the Regiments in London, to be summoned to meet that Evening at St. James's, which was accordingly done: And they being all met, it was moved to them by Colonel Knight,

The Officers of three Regiments subscribe:

That at this time, when several Imputations lay upon the Army of Inconstancy, and that many disaffected Persons were endeavouring to divide them, it was requisite they should give some publick Testimony of their Affections and Inclinations; and in order thereunto, some Officers having shewed him an Address, which they had framed to be presented to the General, to testify their Resolution of Obedience and Duty to the Powers God hath placed over them; He could not but approve so well of it, as readily by himself, and all his Officers, to give their Attestations to it, and some more had done the like, it being intended by those who had first advised it, to be tendered to every Regiment of the Army; of which, there being a great Part here, they had by the General's Permission invited them thither, to communicate what was done, and to desire their Concurrence with them in it.

The Substance of Colonel Knight's Speech to the Officers at St. James's, encouraging them to subscribe the Engagement.

Colonel Knight and Clarges had before prepared most of the Officers of the Regiments which came from Scotland, so that they made no Difficulty of it, especially seeing a Subscription of other Regiments to induce them: Moreover, it was intimated, That their Meeting was by the Privy and Permission of the General, which Obligation they knew none would offer to oppose. So that at that very time this Engagement was signed by Lieutenant Colonel Morgan, and all the Officers of the General's Regiment of Foot; by Colonel Hubblethorn, and all the Officers of his Regiment; by Colonel Cloeberry, Colonel Lydcott, Colonel Read, and the rest, with all their Officers; which made up in all, with those that had signed before, ten Regiments of Horse and Foot, besides the Life-Guard, and all the General Officers. Also Colonel Fairfax, and Colonel Bethel, who upon the first Consultation of this Matter had been sent unto, in four Days had returned to the Subscriptions of themselves, and all their Officers; after which it was agreed, that Colonel Howard, with forty Officers, should present it into Scotland to the General, which was done at St. James's the 9th Day of April, and was with much Satisfaction and Content received by him: It was also afterwards recommended to Major-General Morgan

The Address signed by all the Officers about London, and those of two other Regiments.

Presented to the General by Col. Howard. Sent into Scotland to M. General Morgan.

1659. Morgan in Scotland, to have it subscribed by his Officers there, and likewise to all the Regiments in England, with an Account of what had been done in London, and the Names of all those Regiments that had concurred in it.

And because he heard that some disaffected Persons were tampering to seduce the Soldiers in Scotland, he sent another Regiment of Horse, and a Regiment of Foot thither, who were of such as Major-General Morgan might confide in, to assist him, if Need were, to model the rest. In Conclusion, this Address was subscribed by all the Regiments, and the Subscriptions returned to the General; only some Officers refused it, and were immediately displaced, and the General took that Opportunity of giving to the Lord Faulconbridge, Colonel Roffiter, and General Montague, to each of them a Regiment of Horse, and to Colonel Sheffield a Regiment of Foot. And whilst he was thus employed in ordering the Army, the Council of State was active in forming the Militia in all the Cities and Counties of England and Wales, wherein such Care was taken, to have the Arms in good Hands, that from all Parts the Lists of the Officers were sent to the Council of State, to be by the General and them approved.
